CHRONO-GENEALOGICAL CHART OF THE FIRST AGE OF THE WORLD, OR THE ANTE-DILUVIAN PATRIARCHS.

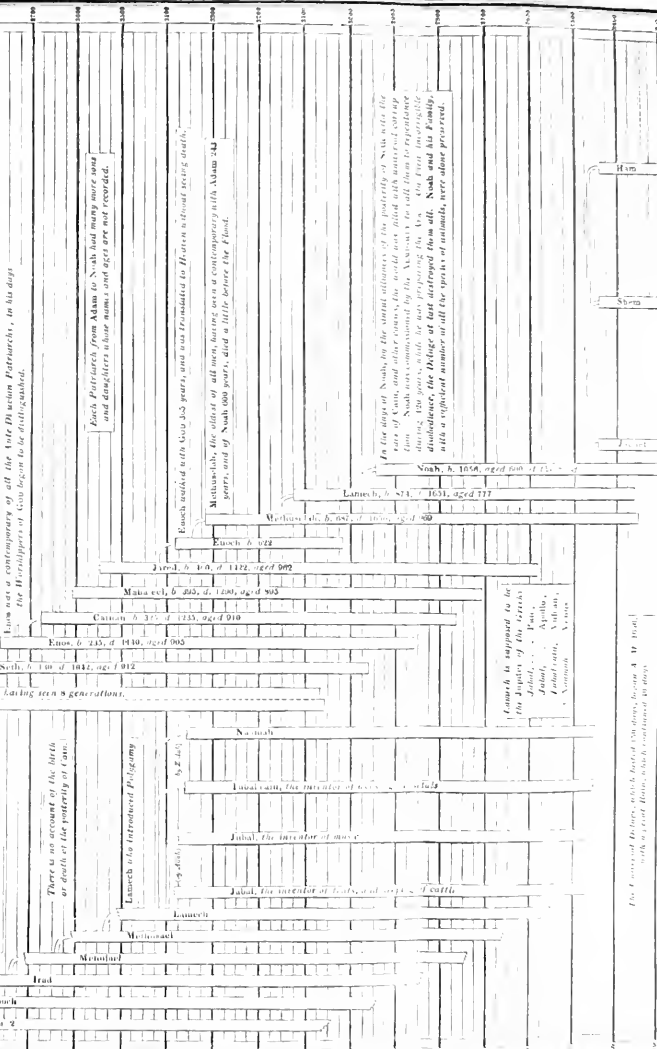

CHRONO-GENEALOGICAL CHART OF THE FIRST AGE OF THE WORLD, OR THE ANTI-DILUVIAN PATRIARCHS.

Cain, the first man born of a woman, was a husbandman, reared a fatted flock, and died in the field of his toil, where he was buried by his brother, Abel, who was a shepherd, and went to live in the land of Nod, where he had a woman to whom he bore a son, called Seth, who succeeded him.

Both the latter was born after the manner of Abel, his posterity were called the Children of God, he was contemporary with all the Patriarchs, except Noah.

Adam the first man, and Eve, the first woman, formed the foundation of the Creation, in a state of purity and happiness, fell into evil and misery by transgressing the Divine command; were banished from their blessed habitation in the Garden of Eden, sentenced to suffering and death, set furnished with the promise of a Victory — Gen. Chap. 3.

There is no account of his birth or death of the posterity of Cain.

Lamech also introduced Polygamy by 2 wives.

Enoch was contemporary of all the Anti-Diluvian Patriarchs, in his days the worshippers of God began to be distinguished.

Methuselah, the eldest of all men, having seen a contemporary with Adam 341 years, and of Noah 950 years, died a little before the Flood.

In the days of Noah, by the various advances of the posterity of Seth into the parts of Canaan, and other parts, the world was filled with increased numbers of the human race, and the earth began to be corrupted during 100 years, till he was preparing the way for the inevitable inundation, the Deluge of God destroyed them all. Noah and his family, with a select number of all the species of animals, were alone preserved.

Enoch walked with God 300 years, and was translated to Heaven without seeing death.

Jacob Patriarch, from Adam to Noah had many more sons and daughters than names and ages are not recorded.

Lamech, b. 674. d. 1631, aged 757.

Methuselah, b. 682. d. 1656, aged 969.

Enoch, b. 922.

Methuselah, b. 922. d. 1422, aged 500.

Enosh, b. 925. d. 1280, aged 355.

Cain, b. 935. d. 1255, aged 320.

Enos, b. 235. d. 1410, aged 905.

Seth, b. 100. d. 1042, aged 312.

Adam, d. 930, having seen 9 generations, Eve, d. 949.

Adam is supposed to be the father of the Greeks, Hebrews, Persians, Indians, Ethiopians, Americans, Africans, and Europeans.

The Universal Deluge, which lasted 150 days, began on 29th Nov. with a great storm, which continued 40 days.

CHRONO-GENEALOGICAL CHART

OF THE SECOND AGE OF THE WORLD, OR THE POST-DILUVIAN PATRIARCHS

FROM THE DELUGE TO THE CALL OF ABRAHAM:

Including the Foundation of Nations, and the Origin of Languages.

Dr Hales in his new analysis of Chronology makes the era of the creation 5411, B. C., and gives the following dates for the principal events of the second age of the world.

	A. M.	B. C.
Deluge	2256	3155
Abraham born	2248	3153
Division of the Earth	3747	2614
Nimrod's kingdom and confusion of tongues	2857	2554
Sargon	2919	2492
Nahush	3049	2362
Laba's Trial	3074	2337

LAM, b. 1560, B

The original number of Languages and Nations appears to be sixty, several of these are probably extinct, and others incorporated or corrupted.

SHEM, b. 1558, B

In this table no names are introduced but those of the founders of families or nations.

JAPHET, b. 1556, B

NOAH, b. 1056, aged 600 at the flood, and 791 at the confusion, c

PUBLISHERS' PREFACE.

THE character, intention, and usefulness, of STACKHOUSE'S HISTORY OF THE BIBLE, are so well known, and so universally acknowledged, that it would be waste of time to enlarge on them. The great object of the Work is to methodize, and bring down to the capacities of all readers, the important historical truths narrated in the Scriptures; to clear difficult passages from seeming inconsistencies; to aid the infirmities of the human understanding by explanation and illustration suited to the limited reasoning powers of man; and to enable the devout Christian to obtain the most satisfactory and comprehensive view of the benevolent purposes of God in Christ, which is the sum and substance of Divine Revelation from the first page to the last.

In proportion, however, as it is unnecessary to explain the design of the original Work, and to insist on its usefulness, it is incumbent on the Publishers to state fully the object they had in view, and the ends they have achieved, by the publication of a New Edition of this book.

A History of the Bible, while it comprises a systematic arrangement of the Scriptural Narrative, is, at the same time, a condensation of the accumulated stores of human intellect and research applied to the explanation of the Volume of Divine Revelation, and unveiling, as it were, the vast effulgence of the Sacred Mind as therein made known to man. It must be obvious, therefore, that a Work of this nature admits of improvement; that facts daily elicited, and inquiries continually pursued, will, in the course of time, furnish many new, important, and striking illustrations, which could not have presented themselves to the writer of the original book.

The attention of the good and learned has been directed in late years, no less than in former times, to the subject of Biblical criticism; and the results of their labours are seen in the elucidation of many passages in Holy Writ, which, though reverently received as truth, being from the Fountain of Truth, had previously been comprehended only to a limited extent. The facilities which are now afforded for visiting the countries—

“Over whose acres walked those blessed feet,
Which, eighteen hundred years ago, were nailed
For our advantage to the bitter cross;”

and the descriptions thence brought by travellers, both Christian and Sceptical, have tended materially to increase the satisfaction of the pious mind, by furnishing it with indisputable proofs of the truth of those things which ignorance and infidelity had chosen for their scoff and scorn; and demonstrating that the predictions of Sacred Writ, have been so literally fulfilled, as to compel the doubter to acknowledge that they could only have been uttered under the guidance of the Spirit of Him who ‘declareth the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done,’ and to whose ken all things, even the thoughts and the heart of man, are naked and bare.

It has been the aim of the Editor and Publishers of this Edition of Stackhouse, to avail themselves, to the fullest extent, of those sources of information adverted to in the preceding paragraph; and they trust it will be found to include new treasures of Biblical criticism, many additional illustrations of Eastern manners and customs, and geographical and topographical descriptions of "the land of the Gospel," more definite and satisfactory than had been previously given. As instances of the attention that has been paid to the last named department, they may refer to the supplemental chapter, on the journeyings of the Israelites, and to the copious descriptions of the mountains, lakes, and rivers of Palestine. But it would be far beyond the compass of this Preface to advert particularly to the great body of information that has been collected for the present Edition. They may only add, that, in the chronological department they have availed themselves of Dr Hales' admirable Analysis of Chronology,—certainly the most successful work in rectifying mistakes, and explaining difficulties, arising from the difference of dates, that has yet appeared: and while alluding to the additions that have been made, the Publishers take the opportunity of offering due acknowledgment to a Friend of high attainments in Biblical learning, to whom they are indebted for much valuable assistance in various departments of this Work, but whose name they are not at liberty to make known.

It remains only briefly to notice the Indexes and Table of Scriptural Passages. The former of these will be found abundantly copious for all purposes, and great care has been taken in the arrangement, to make them of easy and satisfactory reference. The Table of Scriptural passages forms a most important feature in the book. It includes nearly FIVE THOUSAND SACRED TEXTS, which are closely applied, illustrated and explained in the course of the Work.

The Editor and Publishers contemplate the close of their labours with much satisfaction: they feel that they have rendered good service to the Christian cause by the publication of this Enlarged and Improved Edition of Stackhouse, in which they have brought all the past stores, and recent advances of human learning and research, to the illustration of the Sacred Volume. Nor is it the least part of their gratification, that they have produced this valuable book at a price, and in a form, that places it within the reach of all classes of the community.

THE AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

THE Holy Bible itself, being principally historical, the history of an history may seem a solecism to those who do not sufficiently attend to the nature of these sacred writings, whose scope and method, and form of diction, are vastly different from any modern composition: wherein the idiom of the tongue in which it was penned, and the oriental customs to which it alludes, occasion much obscurity; the difference of time wherein it was wrote, and variety of authors concerned therein, a diversity of style, and frequent repetitions; the intermixture of other matters with what is properly historical, a seeming perplexity; the malice of foes, and negligence of scribes, frequent dislocations; and the defect of public records, in the times of persecution, a long interruption of about four hundred years; to say nothing that this history relates to one nation only, and concerns itself no farther with the rest of mankind, than as they had some dealings and intercourse with them. Whoever, I say, will give himself the liberty to consider a little the form and composition of the Holy Bible, and the weighty concerns which it contains, must needs be of opinion, that this, of all other books, requires to be explained where it is obscure; methodized where it seems confused; abridged where it seems prolix; supplied where it is defective; and analyzed when its historical matters lie blended and involved with other quite different subjects. This I call writing an history of the Bible: and hereupon I thought, with myself, that if I could but give the reader a plain and succinct narrative of what is purely historical in this sacred book, without the interposition of any other matter; if I could but settle the chronology, and restore the order of things, by reducing every passage and fact to its proper place and period of time; if I could but, by way of notes, and without breaking in upon the series of the narrative part, explain difficult texts, rectify mis-translations, and reconcile seeming contradictions, as they occurred in my way; if I could but supply the defect of the Jewish story, by continuing the account of their affairs under the rule and conduct of the Maccabees; if I could but introduce profane history as I went along, and, at proper distances of time, sum up to my reader what was transacting in other parts of the then known world, while he was perusing the records of the Hebrew worthies; and at the same time, if I could but answer such questions and objections as infidelity, in all ages, has been too ready to suggest against the truth and authority of the Scriptures; and with all, discuss such passages, and illustrate such facts and events as make the most considerable figure in Holy Writ: If I could but do this, I say, I thought I had undertaken a work which might possibly be of public use and benefit; seasonable at all times, but more especially in the age wherein we live, and, if I may be permitted to apply to myself the apostle's words, such as might make me 'unto God a sweet savour in Christ, in them that are saved, and in them that perish; to the one the savour of death unto death, and to the other the savour of life unto life.'

I am very well aware, that several have gone before me in works of the like denomination; but I may boldly venture to say, that none of them have taken in half that compass of view which I here promise to myself. Blome has given us a very pompous book; but besides that it is no more than a bare translation of Sieur de Roy-amont's History of the Old and New Testament, it omits many material facts, observes no exact series in its narration, but is frequently interrupted by insertions of the sentiments of the fathers, which prove not always very pertinent; and, in short, is remarkable for little or nothing else but the number of its sculptures, which are badly designed, and worse executed. Elwood, in some respects, has acquitted himself much better; he has made a pretty just collection of the Scripture account of things; but then, when any difficulty occurs, he usually gives us the sacred text itself, without any explanatory note or comment upon it; and so not only leaves his reader's understanding as ignorant as he found it, but his mind in some danger of being tainted by the unlawful parallels he makes between the acts of former and later times and by a certain levity which he discovers ^a upon several occasions, not so becoming the sacredness of his subject. Howel has certainly excelled all that went before him, both in his design and execution of it. He has given us a continued relation of Scripture-transactions; has filled up the chasm between Malachi and Christ; has annexed some notes, which help to explain the difficulties that are chiefly occasioned by the mistakes of our translators: but in my opinion, he has been a little too sparing in his notes, and, as some will have it, too pompous in his diction. He has omitted many things that might justly deserve his notice, and taken notice of others that seem not so considerable. Some very remarkable events he has thought fit to pass by without any comment; nor has he attempted to vindicate such passages as the lovers of infidelity are apt to lay hold on, in order to entrench themselves the safer.

^a Vid. his account of the plague of lice; of Pharaoh and his people; the story of Samson's foxes, and that of Esther.

Whatever other men's sentiments might be, these things I thought in some measure essential, and at this time more especially, extremely necessary in an history of the Bible; and to encourage my pursuit of this method, I have several helps and assistances which those who went before me were not perhaps so well accommodated with.

The foundation of a lecture by the honourable Mr Boyle has given occasion for the principles of natural and revealed religion to be fairly stated and the objections and cavils of infidelity of all kinds to be fully answered. The institution of another by the Lady Moyer has furnished us with several tracts, wherein the great articles of our Christian faith are strenuously vindicated, and, as far as the nature of mysteries will allow, accurately explained,

The uncommon licence which of late years has been taken to decry all prophecies and miracles, and to expose several portions of scripture as absurd and ridiculous, has raised up some learned men, (God grant that the number of them may every day increase,) to contend earnestly for the faith, and, by the help of critical knowledge in ancient customs and sacred languages, to rescue from their hands such texts and passages as the wicked and unstable were endeavouring to wrest, to the perversion of other men's faith, as well as their own destruction. The commentaries and annotations we have upon the scriptures, both from our own countrymen, and from foreigners, have, of late years, been very solid and elaborate, the dissertations or particular treatises on the most remarkable facts and events, extremely learned and judicious; the harmonists, or writers, who endeavour to reconcile seeming contradictions, very accurate and inquisitive; such as have wrote in an analytical way, clear and perspicuous enough, and to pass by several others, sacred geography has been fully handled by the great Bochart, sacred chronology sufficiently ascertained by our renowned Usher: and the chasm in the sacred story abundantly supplied by our learned Prideaux; so that there are no materials wanting to furnish out a new and complete history of the Bible even according to the compass and extent of my scheme. That therefore the reader may be apprized of the method I propose to myself, and what he may reasonably expect from me, I must desire him to observe, that, according to several periods of time, from the creation of the world to the full establishment of Christianity, my design is to divide the whole work into eight books. Whereof

The I. Will extend from the creation to the deluge.

The II. From the deluge to the call of Abraham.

The III. From the call of Abraham to the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt.

The IV. From the departure of the Israelites to their entrance into the land of Canaan.

The V. From their entrance into Canaan to the building of Solomon's temple.

The VI. From the building of the temple to the Babylonish captivity.

The VII. From the captivity to the birth of Christ. And
The VIII. From the birth of Christ to the completion of the canon of the New Testament.

Each of these books I purpose to divide into several chapters, and each chapter into three parts. The number of chapters will vary, according as the matter in each period arises, but the parts in each chapter will be constantly the same, namely.

1st, A Narrative Part, which, in plain and easy diction, will contain the substance of the Scripture-history for such a determinate time.

2dly, An Argumentative Part, which will contain an answer to such objections as may possibly be made against any passage in the history comprised in that time. And,

3dly, A Philological Part, which will contain the sentiments of the learned, both ancient and modern, concerning such remarkable events or transactions as shall happen in that time; or perhaps a summary account of what is most considerable in profane history, towards the conclusion of each period.

That the reader may perceive how I gradually advance in the sacred history, and by turning to his Bible, may compare the narrative with the text, and find a proper solution to any difficulty that shall occur in the course of his reading, I shall at the top of the page of each section, set down the book and chapter, or chapters, I have then under consideration, and the date of the year, both from the creation, and before and after the coming of Christ, wherein each remarkable event happened. And that all things may be made as easy as possible to the reader, I shall take care not to trouble him with any exotic words in the text; but where there is occasion to insert any Hebrew expressions, for his sake, I shall choose to do it in English characters, and to reduce every thing that I conceive may be above his capacity, to the notes and quotations at the bottom of the page.

The notes, besides the common references, will be only of four kinds.

1st, Additional, when a passage is borrowed from any other author, whether foreign or domestic, to confirm or illustrate the matter we are then upon.

2dly, Explanatory, when by producing the right signification of the original, or inquiring into some ancient custom, and the like, we make the passage under consideration more intelligible.

3dly, Reconciliatory; when, by the help of a parallel place, or some logical distinction, we show the consistency of two or more passages in Scripture, which, at first view, seem to be contradictory.

4thly, What we call Emendatory, when, by considering the various senses of the original word, and selecting what is most proper, or, by having a due attention to the design of our author and the context, the mistakes in our translations are set right.

The chronological and other tables must be reserved to the conclusion of the work.

INTRODUCTION.

ON THE NECESSITY OF A DIVINE REVELATION, AND THE GENUINENESS, AUTHENTICITY, INSPIRATION, &c. OF THE OLD TESTAMENT SCRIPTURES.

THE collection of writings which is regarded by Christians as the sole standard of their faith and practice, has been distinguished at different periods by different appellations. Thus it is frequently termed the Scriptures, the sacred or holy Scriptures, and sometimes the canonical Scriptures. It is called the Scriptures, as being the most important of all writings; the holy or sacred Scriptures, because the books composing it were written by persons divinely inspired; and the canonical Scriptures, either because it is a rule of faith and practice to those who receive it, or because, when the number and authenticity of its different books were ascertained, lists of these were inserted in the ecclesiastical canons or catalogue, in order to distinguish them from such books as were apocryphal, or of uncertain authority, and unquestionably not of divine origin. But the most common appellation is that of the Bible—a word derived from the Greek Βιβλος (biblos)—which, in its primary import, simply denotes a book, but which is given to the writings of Moses and the prophets, of the evangelists and apostles, by way of eminence, as being the book of books, infinitely surpassing in excellence and importance every unassisted production of the human mind.—Lardner's Works, vol. vi.—Jahn's Introduction ad Vet. Fæd. and Horne's Introduction, vol. i. and ii.

That portion of Scripture which the Jewish church received as of divine authority, is usually called 'The Old Testament,' in order to distinguish it from those sacred books which contain the doctrines, precepts, and promises of the Christian religion, and which are designated 'The New Testament.' The appellation of Testament is derived from 2 Cor. iii. 6, 14. where the words ἡ Παλαια Διαθηκη, and ἡ Καινη Διαθηκη are, by the old Latin translators, rendered antiquum testamentum, and novum testamentum, instead of antiquum fædus, and novum fædus, the old and new covenant; for although the Greek word Διαθηκη signifies both testament and covenant, yet in the Septuagint version it uniformly corresponds with the Hebrew word בְּרִית (berith), which always signifies a covenant. The term 'old covenant,' used by St Paul in 2 Cor. iii. 14. is evidently applied to the dispensation of Moses, and the term 'new covenant,' in ver. 6 of the same chapter, is applied to the dispensation of Christ; and these distinguishing appellations were applied by the early ecclesiastical authors to the writings which contained those dispensations, and from them it has been transmitted to modern times.—Lardner's works, vol. vi.—Horne's Introduction, vol. i.—Bishop Tomline's El. of Theol.

The volume which is made up of the Old and New Testament contains a great number of different narratives and compositions, written by several persons, at distant periods, in different languages, and on various subjects. Yet all of these collectively claim to be a divine revelation: that is, a discovery afforded by God to man, of himself, or of his will, over and above what he has made known by the light of nature or reason.

The objects of our knowledge are of three kinds:—Thus some things are discernible by the light of nature without revelation; of this kind is the knowledge of God from the traces of his wisdom and power exhibited in the works of creation, 'for his invisible things, even his eternal power and Godhead since the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made,' (Rom. i. 20). Other things are of pure and simple revelation, which cannot be known by the light of nature; such is the doctrine of the salvation of the world by Jesus Christ. Others again are discoverable by the light of nature, but imperfectly, and therefore stand in need of revelation to give them further proof and evidence; of this sort are a future state, and eternal rewards and punishments. But of what degree soever the revelation may be, whether partial or entire; whether a total discovery of some unknown truth, or only a fuller and clearer manifestation of truths imperfectly known by unassisted reason; it must be supernatural and proceed from God.—Bishop William's Sermons at Boyle's Lectures.

No one who believes that there is a God, and that he is a Being of infinite power, wisdom and knowledge, can reasonably deny, that he can, if he thinks fit, make a revelation of himself and of his will in an extraordinary way, different from the discoveries made by men themselves, in the more natural and ordinary use of their own rational faculties and powers. For if the power of God be almighty, it must extend to whatever does not imply a contradiction, which cannot be pretended in this case. Can it be supposed that the author of our being has it not in his power to communicate ideas to our minds, for informing and instructing us in those things which we are deeply concerned to know; our inability clearly to explain the manner in which this is done, is no just objection against it. And as it cannot reasonably be denied that God can, if he sees fit, communicate his will to man, in a way of extraordinary revelation; so he can do it in such a manner, as to give those to whom this revelation is originally and immediately made, a full and certain assurance that it is a true and divine revelation. For if men can communicate their thoughts by speech or language, in such a way as that we may certainly know who it is that speaks to us, it would be a strange thing to affirm, that God, on supposition of his communicating his mind and will to any person or persons, in a way of extraordinary revelation, has no way of causing his rational creatures to know that it is he, and no other, who makes this discovery to them. To admit the existence of a God, and to deny him such a power, is a glaring contradiction.—Leland's Advant. and Necess. of Revelation.

Since no man can presume to say that it is inconsistent with any of the attributes of a Supreme Being, or unbecoming the wisdom of the Creator of all things, to reveal to his creatures more fully the way to happiness; to make a particular discovery of his will to them; to set before them, in a clear light, the rewards and punishments of a future state; to explain in what manner he will be pleased to be worshipped; and to declare what satisfaction he will accept for sin, and upon what conditions he will receive returning sinners: nay, since, on the contrary, it seems more suitable to our natural notions of the goodness and mercy of God, to suppose that he should do all this, than not, it follows undeniably, that it was most reasonable and agreeable to the dictates of nature, to expect or hope for such a divine revelation. Accordingly we find it to have been the general belief of mankind in every age, that some kind of commerce and communication subsisted between God and man. This was the foundation of all the religious rites and ceremonies which every heathen nation pretended to receive from their deities, and the generality of the heathen world were so fully persuaded, that the great rules for the conduct of human life must receive their authority from heaven, that their chief legislators, such as Minos, Pythagoras, Solon, Lycurgus, Numa, &c. &c. thought it not a sufficient recommendation of their laws that they were agreeable to the light of nature, unless they gave out also that they received them from God.

Besides, the wisest and best of the heathen philosophers, particularly Socrates and Plato, were not ashamed to confess openly their sense of the want of a divine revelation, and to declare their judgment that it was most natural and truly agreeable to right reason, to hope for something of that nature.—Clarke's Evid. of Nat. and Rev. Relig. Prop. vi.—Boyle's Lectures, vol. ii. fol. ed.

Farther, a divine revelation was not only probable and desirable, but also absolutely necessary.

The history of past ages clearly shows, that mankind, by the mere light of nature, could never attain to any certain knowledge of the will of God, of their own true happiness and final destiny, or recover themselves from that state of moral corruption and depravity into which they had fallen.

If we examine the writings of the most celebrated philosophers and sages of antiquity, we shall find, that they were not only ignorant of many important points in religion, but also that endless differences and inconsistencies prevailed among them with regard to points of the greatest moment; while some of them taught doctrines which directly tended to promote vice and wickedness in the world, and the influence of all in rectifying the notions and reforming the lives of mankind, was altogether ineffectual. But in order to illustrate, and confirm the point, we shall advance a few particulars.

1. The ancients were ignorant of the true origin of the world, and of mankind.

Some of them asserted that the world existed from eternity; others admitted that the formation of the world was owing to chance; others ascribed it to a plurality of causes or authors; while those who acknowledged that it had a beginning in time, knew not by what gradations, nor in what manner the universe was raised into its present beauty and order.

2. They were ignorant of the origin of evil, and of the cause of the depravity and misery which actually exist among mankind.

The wisest and most judicious of the heathen philosophers were not backward to complain, that they found the understandings of men so dark and cloudy, their wills so biassed and inclined to evil, their passions so outrageous and rebellious against reason, that they looked upon the rules and laws of right reason as scarcely practicable, and which they had very little hopes of ever being able to persuade the world to submit to. They saw that human nature was strangely corrupted, but at the same time they were compelled to confess, that they neither knew the origin of the disease, nor could discover a sufficient remedy. They could not assign any reason why mankind, who have the noblest faculties of any beings on earth, should yet generally pursue their own destruction with as much industry as the beasts avoid it.—Clarke's Evid. of Nat. and Rev. Relig. Prop. vi. and Horne's Introd. vol. i.

3. They were ignorant of the manner in which God might be acceptably worshipped, and of the means by which such as have erred from the paths of virtue, and have offended God, might again be restored to his favour; they were utterly unable to discover any method by which a reconciliation might be effected between an offended God and his guilty creatures, and his mercy exercised without the violation of his justice. The light of nature, indeed, taught them that some kind of worship or other was due to the Supreme Being, but in what particular manner, and with what kind of service he will be worshipped, unassisted reason could never discover. Accordingly, even the best of the heathen philosophers, such as Plato and Cicero, complied with the outward superstitious religion of their country, and advised others to do the same, and while they delivered sublime and noble sentiments concerning the nature and attributes of the supreme God, they fell lamentably into the practice of the most absurd idolatry.

The light of nature showed their guilt to the most reflecting of the ancient philosophers, but it could not show them a remedy. From the consideration of the goodness and mercifulness of God, they entertained a hope that he would show himself placable to sinners, and might in some way be reconciled; but what kind of propitiation he would be pleased to accept, and in what manner this reconciliation must be made, the light of nature could not point out. Here nature fails, and expects with impatience the aid of some particular revelation. That God will receive returning sinners, and accept of repentance, instead of perfect obedience, they cannot certainly know to whom he has not made such a revelation; or whether God will not require something further, for the vindication of his justice, and of the honour and dignity of his laws and government, and for more effectually expressing his indignation against sin, before he will restore men to the privileges they had forfeited; they cannot be satisfactorily assured, without a special revelation: for it cannot be satisfactorily proved, from any of God's attributes, that he is absolutely obliged to pardon all the sins of all his creatures at all times, barely and immediately upon their repenting. There arises therefore from nature, no sufficient comfort to sinners, but anxious and endless solicitude about the means of appeasing the Deity. Hence those various ways of sacrificing and those numberless superstitions which overspread the heathen world, but which were so little satisfactory to the wiser part of mankind, even in those times of darkness, that they could not forbear frequently declaring, that they thought such rites and sacrifices could avail little or nothing towards appeasing the wrath of an offended God, or making their prayers acceptable in his sight, but that something seemed to them to be still wanting, though they knew not what.—Plato's Alcibiades, 2.—Clarke's Evid. Prop. vi.

4. They knew little or nothing respecting the necessity of divine grace, and assistance towards our attainment of virtue and perseverance in it.

It was, indeed, a general practice among the heathens to pray to their gods; but then the things they ordinarily prayed for were only outward advantages, or what are usually called the goods of fortune: as to wisdom and virtue, they thought every man was to depend upon himself alone for obtaining them. The Stoics, who were the most eminent teachers of morals among the heathens, endeavoured to raise man to a state of absolute independency, and some of them asserted that the will of man is unconquerable by God himself. (Epicetetus, b. i. chap. 1.). Seneca represents it as needless to apply to the gods by prayer, since it is in every man's own power to make himself happy; and speaking of virtue, and a uniform course of life always consistent with itself, he says, 'This is the chief good which, if thou possessest, thou wilt begin to be a companion to the gods, not a suppliant to them.'—Sen. Epist. 41.—Leland's Advant. and Necess. of Revelation. vol. ii. chap. ix.

5. They had but dark and confused notions of the summum bonum, or supreme felicity of man.

On this topic, Cicero tells us, there was such a disagreement among the ancient philosophers, that it was almost impossible to enumerate their different sentiments, while he at the same time states the opinions of more than twenty philosophers, all of which are equally extravagant and absurd.

6. They had but weak and imperfect notions of the immortality of the soul.

The existence of the soul after death was denied by many of the Peripatetics, or followers of Aristotle, and this doctrine seems to have been disbelieved by Aristotle himself. The Stoics had no settled or consistent scheme on this head, nor had the doctrine of the immortality of the soul any prominent place among the tenets of their sect. But even among those philosophers who expressly taught this doctrine, considerable doubt and uncertainty appear to have prevailed. Thus Socrates, a little before his death, tells his friends, 'I am now about to leave this world, and ye are still to continue in it: which of us shall have the better part allotted to us, God only knows; from the scope of which passage, it appears, that he was doubtful whether he should have any existence after death or not. And again, at the end of his admirable discourse concerning the immortality of the soul, he said to his friends, who came to pay him their last visit, 'I would have you to know, that I have great hopes that I am now going into the company of good men; yet I would not be too presumptuous and confident concerning it.' In his apology to his judges, he comforts himself with the consideration 'that there is much ground to hope that death is good; for it must necessarily be one of these two; either the dead man is nothing, and has not a sense of anything; or it is only a change or migration of the soul hence to another place, according to what we are told. If there is no sense left, and death is like a profound sleep and quiet rest without dreams, it is wonderful to think what gain it is to die; but if the things which are told us are true, that death is a migration to another place, this is still a much greater good.'—Plato in Phæd. Apolog. Socrat. in fin.

The same doubts were entertained by Plato, the most eminent of the disciples of Socrates. Cicero, who ranks among the most eminent of the heathen philosophers, laboured under the same uncertainty. After having advanced a number of excellent arguments in behalf of this doctrine, and stated several opinions concerning the return and duration of the soul, he says, 'Which of these two opinions is true, (that the soul is mortal or immortal), God only knows, and which of these is most probable, is a very great question.'—Cic. Tuscul. Quest. b. i. In another place he says, 'I know not how, when I read the arguments in proof of the soul's immortality, methinks I am fully convinced, and yet after I have laid aside the book, and come to think and consider of the matter, alone by my myself, presently I find myself slip again insensibly into my old doubts.'—Ibid. While these great men and their followers were perplexed with doubts on this great point, others of the heathens entertained the most gloomy notions, some imagining that they should, after death, be removed from one body into another and be perpetual wanderers, and others contemplating the grave as an eternal habitation, and death as the complete termination of man's existence.—Jortin's Discourses.—Horne's Introduction, vol. i.—Clarke's Evidences.

7. The ancient philosophers attained to no certainty respecting the eternal rewards and punishments of a future state, and of the resurrection of the body.

The poets indeed celebrated, in sublime and beautiful verse, the joys of Elysium, or a state and place of future bliss, and painted in dismal colours the miseries of Tartarus, or hell, but these were only regarded as fabulous representations: and although the philosophers and legislators were sensible of the importance and necessity of the doctrine of future punishments as well as rewards, to the well being of society, yet, strange as it may seem, they in general discarded this doctrine, and represented all fears of future punishment as vain and superstitious. Polybius complains that in his time the belief of a future state was rejected by the great men and by the bulk of the people, and to this disbelief he ascribes the great corruption of manners; but even while Polybius blames the great men among the Greeks for encouraging the people to disbelieve and despise future punishments, he himself represents them as only useful fictions. Caesar also treated the notions respecting future punishments as fables, and Pliny, the naturalist, represents them as childish and senseless fictions of mortals who were ambitious of never-ending existence.

As to the resurrection of the body, neither the philosophers, nor the common people among the Greeks and Romans, seem to have had any notion of it. For although their poets made frequent mention of the ghosts of departed men appearing in a visible form, and retaining in the shades below their former shapes, yet by such representations, if they mean any thing, they mean no more than that the soul, after this life, passes into another state, and is there invested with a body made up of light aerial particles, quite different from those of which the former body had been composed. When St Paul at Athens spoke of the resurrection of the dead, we are told his hearers mocked or treated it with contempt as a strange doctrine. (Acts xvii. 18, 20, 32.) The Epicureans and Stoics are particularly mentioned in this passage, but the other sects of philosophers, even those who argued most for the immortality of the soul, held the doctrine of the resurrection of the body in contempt. They could not conceive that the gross matter which they saw laid in the grave, or reduced to ashes on the funeral pile, or blown away by the winds and scattered in the air, should ever be raised or collected again and revived: neither did those who argued for the immortality of the soul, believe that the resurrection of the body, if it were possible, was desirable; for they looked upon the body as the prison of the soul, and considered that the happiness of the soul consisted in its being loosed and disengaged from the body.

When therefore we consider the ignorance and uncertainty which prevailed among some of the greatest teachers of antiquity, respecting those great and fundamental truths which are the chief barriers of virtue and religion, it appears certain that the heathens had no perfect system of moral rules for the conduct of life, or for the promotion of piety. Thus most of the philosophers accounted revenge to be not only lawful but commendable. Pride and the love of popular applause were esteemed the best and greatest incentives to virtue and noble actions; suicide was regarded as the strongest mark of heroism, and the perpetrators of it celebrated as men of noble minds. Theft, as is well known, was permitted in Egypt and in Sparta. Plato taught the expedience and lawfulness of exposing children in particular cases. The exposure of infants, and the putting to death of children who were weak or imperfect in form, was permitted at Sparta by Lycurgus. At Athens the women were treated and disposed of as slaves; and it was enacted that infants which appeared to be maimed, should either be killed or exposed. Nothing could exceed the cruelties which were exercised against slaves both among the Greeks and Romans. Among the Spartans they were not only generally treated with great harshness and insolence, but it was part of their policy to massacre them on several occasions, in cold blood, and without provocation; the gratification of the sensual appetites, and of the most unnatural lusts was openly taught and allowed.

And not only did these sentiments and principles, which were entertained and inculcated by the philosophers and legislators of antiquity, lead to all kinds of immorality and wickedness, but the very religious systems and established forms of worship of the heathens, instead of being calculated to preserve men in the practice of morality and virtue, only served to plunge them deeper in vice and degrading superstition. They paid divine worship to oxen, crocodiles, birds and reptiles. They metamorphosed beasts into gods, and conversely transformed their gods into beasts, ascribing to them drunkenness, unnatural lusts and the most loathsome vices. Drunkenness they worshipped under the name of Bacchus, lasciviousness under that of Venus. Momus was with them the god of calumny, and Mercury the god of thieves. Even Jupiter, the greatest of their gods, they considered to be an adulterer and a rebellious son. The worship of avowedly evil beings at length became prevalent among them, and hence many of their rites were cruel and contrary to humanity, and hence also the licentiousness and impurity of their whole religious system became notorious. Thus, to select one or two instances out of many, the rites of the goddess Cybele were no less infamous for lewdness than for cruelty, and the practice of these rites spread far and wide, and formed part of the public worship at Rome. The aphrodisia, or festivals in honour of Venus, were observed with lascivious ceremonies in divers parts of Greece; and Strabo relates that there was a temple at Corinth so rich that it maintained above a thousand harlots sacred to her service. These abominable customs were not confined to Greece, for Herodotus informs us that they were observed at Babylon, and other authors relate that they existed in Syria and Africa. The feasts of Bacchus were equally impure and licentious, and according to Herodotus, many of the Egyptian rites were cruel and shockingly obscene. The offering up of human sacrifices was, for many ages, very general in the heathen world. It obtained among the Phœnicians, Syrians, Arabians, Carthaginians and other people of Africa, and among the Egyptians till the time of Amasis. The same thing we are told concerning the Thracians, the ancient Scythians, the Gauls, Germans and Britons. And though this horrible rite was never so common among the Greeks and Romans, as among some other nations, yet it continued for a long time to be in use among them upon extraordinary occasions.

In short, when we examine the history of the Pagan nations of antiquity, we cannot but be struck with the accuracy of the description which the apostle Paul, in the first chapter of the Romans, gives of these nations generally, when he tells us that they were 'given up to uncleanness and vile affections; that they were filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness; that they were full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity, whisperers, backbiters, haters of God, despiteful, proud, boasters, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents, without understanding, covenant breakers, without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful.'—Leland's Necess. and Advant. of Revelation.—Clarke's Evol. of Nat. and Rev. Relig.—Gregory's Letters on Christ. Relig.—Horne's Introd. vol. i.—Hartly on Man, vol. ii.

There were, indeed, among the heathens some few philosophers who cherished better principles and inculcated comparatively purer tenets than those already alluded to; and no doubt these men were raised up and designed by God, who never left himself wholly without witness, as instruments to reprove, in some measure, and put some kind of check to the extreme superstition and wickedness of the nations in which they lived, or at least to bear witness against, and condemn these nations. But still the instructions of these individuals were very defective and inefficient. They never were able to reform the world, or to keep together any considerable number of men in the knowledge and practice of virtue. Their precepts were delivered to their own immediate pupils and not to the lower orders of people, who constitute the great mass of society. Besides, the ethical systems of the philosophers were too refined for the common people, most of their discourses upon morals being rather speculative and learned, nice and subtle disputes, than practical and universally useful instructions; and even those things of which they were not only certain themselves, but which they were also able to prove and explain to others with sufficient plainness and clearness, such as are the most obvious and necessary duties of life, they had not sufficient authority to enforce and inculcate upon men's minds so as to influence and govern the general practice of the world. The truths which they proved by speculative reasoning wanted still more sensible authority to back them, and make them of more force and efficacy in practice; and the precepts which they laid down, however reasonable and fit to be obeyed, were still destitute of weight, and were but the precepts of men. They could present no motives sufficiently powerful to animate men's minds and stimulate them to the practice of true virtue, and support them under the trials and calamities of life. In fact, the philosophers never did nor could effect any remarkable change in the minds and lives of men such as was undeniably produced by the preaching of Christ and his apostles. In the original uncorrupted state of human nature, before the mind of man was depraved with false and erroneous opinions, corrupt affections, and vicious inclinations, customs and habits, right reason may be supposed to have been a sufficient guide and a principle powerful enough to preserve men in the constant practice of their duty. But in the present circumstances and condition of mankind, unassisted reason is altogether insufficient to accomplish this end.*

* The four great propositions which the moderns almost universally concede to natural religion, as integral parts of it, are, 1st, That there is but one God. 2d, That God is nothing of those things which we see. 3d, That God takes care of all things below, and governs all the world. 4th, That he alone is the great Creator of all things out of himself. Now they are uncontroversial facts, which cannot be too deeply engraven upon the mind that none of the greatest and wisest men among the Greeks and Romans held all these propositions, and that very few held any of them firmly; that before the Christian era no people in the world believed these propositions but the Jews; and that they

In short, the heathen philosophy was every way defective and erroneous, and if there was any thing excellent or commendable in it, there is great reason to believe that it was not the genuine result of the mental efforts of the philosophers, but derived from a higher source, even from very ancient traditions, to which they themselves usually assigned a divine original, or from scattered portions of the revelations contained in the scriptures, with which they had become acquainted through various channels.

If we direct our attention to the heathen nations of the present age, such as Tartary, the Philippine islands, many parts of Africa, China, and Hindostan, we learn, from the unanimous testimony of navigators and travellers, that they are enveloped in the grossest ignorance and idolatry, and that their religious worship, doctrines, and practices are equally corrupt with those of the Pagan nations of antiquity; yet they also possess the same light of reason which the ancient heathens enjoyed. With regard to Hindostan in particular, the polytheism is of the grossest and most debasing kind. There are not fewer than three hundred and thirty millions of deities claiming the adoration of their votaries! The rites are the most impure, the penances the most toilsome, the modes of self-torture almost innumerable, and as extraordinary and as exquisite in degree as human nature can sustain. The burning or burying of widows, infanticide, the immersion of the sick or dying in the Ganges, and self-devotement to destruction by the idol Juggernaut, are among the horrid practices which flow from the system of idolatry established among them, and which are exceeded in folly and ferocity by none to which paganism has given birth. The manifest effects of this system are an immersion into the grossest moral darkness, and an universal corruption of manners.—Asiatic Researches, vol. viii. And yet the inhabitants of Hindostan are highly celebrated for their progress in the useful arts, and for intellectual acuteness.

But notwithstanding all this mass of evidences in favour of the necessity of a divine revelation, it has been asserted by modern deists, that the book of nature is the only book to be studied, and that philosophy and right reason are sufficient to instruct and to preserve men in their duty. They cannot deny that great ignorance and corruption prevailed in the whole heathen world, but they contend that the ignorance and corruption of former ages have always been owing, not to any absolute insufficiency of the light of nature itself, but to the fault of the several particular persons in not sufficiently improving that light; and that deists now, in places where learning and right reason are cultivated, are well able to discover and explain all the obligations and motives of morality, without the aid of a revelation.

But granting it to be true that all the obligations and notions of morality could possibly be discovered and explained clearly by the mere light of nature alone, yet even this would not at all prove that there is no need of revelation. For whatever the bare natural possibility was, it is certain that the wisest philosophers of old never were able to discover and explain those obligations and duties to any effectual purpose, but always did not discover them, but received them by divine revelation in the basis of the first four precepts of the decalogue.—Dr Gregory's Letters on the Christian Religion.—Ed.

willingly acknowledged that they still wanted some higher assistance. And as to the great pretences of modern deists, it is to be observed that the clearness of moral reasonings was much improved, and the regard to a future state very much increased even among heathen writers after the coming of Christ, and almost all the things that have been said wisely and truly by modern deists, are plainly borrowed from that revelation which they refuse to embrace, and without which they could never have been able to say the same things. They have thus been guided by a torch snatched from the temple of God, while both they and their followers idly imagine their path is illuminated by light of their own creating. Even the possibility of discovering and explaining all the necessary obligations and motives of morality, by the mere light of reason, we deny; for there are several truths of the highest importance to the happiness of men, such as the method in which God might be acceptably worshipped, the way in which he would be reconciled to returning sinners, and a future state of rewards and punishments, which could never have been discovered with any certainty by unassisted reason. Now, indeed, when our whole duty with its true motives is clearly revealed to us, its precepts appear plainly agreeable to reason, and conscience readily approves what is good, as it condemns what is evil. Nay, after our duty is thus made known to us, it is easy, not only to see its agreement with reason, but also to begin and deduce its obligations from reason; but if we had been destitute of all revealed light, the discovery of our duty in all points by the mere light of nature, would have been a work of extreme difficulty; it would have been like groping for an unknown path in the obscure twilight. And what ground have these modern worshippers of reason to imagine, that if they themselves had lived without the light of revelation, they should have been wiser than Socrates, and Plato, and Cicero? How are they certain they should have made such a proper use of their reason, as to have discovered the truth exactly, without being in any degree led aside by prejudice or neglect? If their lot had been among the vulgar, how are they sure they would not have been involved in idolatry and superstition? If they had joined themselves to the philosophers, which sect would they have chosen to follow? Or if they should have set up for themselves, how are they certain that they would have been skilful enough to have deduced the several branches of their duty, or to have applied them to the several cases of life by argumentation and force of reasoning? It is one thing to perceive that those rules of life, which are beforehand plainly laid before us, are perfectly agreeable to reason, and another thing to discover such rules merely by the light of nature. But suppose that these idolizers of reason could by strength of reason alone demonstrate to themselves all the necessary truths of religion, with the utmost clearness and distinctness, yet all men are not equally capable of being philosophers, though all men are equally obliged to be religious. At least this much is certain, that the rewards and punishments of another world cannot be so powerfully enforced, in order to influence the lives and practices of all sorts of men, by one who shall undertake to demonstrate the reality of them from abstract reasoning, as by one who shall assure mankind of the truth and certainty of these things, by showing sufficient credentials of his having been commissioned by God for that purpose.—Clarke's Evid. of Nat. and Rev. Relig.—Gregory's Letters on the Christ. Relig.—Horne's Introd. vol. i.

Besides, the contradictory and discordant speculations of the modern opposers of revelation, who boast that reason is their God, are so great, and so glaring, and the precepts delivered by them for a rule of life are so utterly subversive of every principle of morality, as to demonstrate the absolute necessity of a divine revelation, now (supposing one never had been given), in order to lead men to the knowledge and worship of the true God, and also to impart to them the knowledge of their duties to him and towards one another. If we consult the writings of those, who, in the last century, claimed to be received as the masters of reason, and the opposers of revelation, we shall find ample confirmation of the truth of this remark.*

Since, then, the history and actual condition of mankind in all ages concur to show, that a divine revelation was absolutely necessary to recover them out of this universal corruption and degeneracy, and to make known to them the proper object of their belief and worship, as well as their present duties and future expectations; it remains, that we consider the possible means of communicating such revelation to the world.

There appear to be only two methods by which an extraordinary discovery of the will of God may be made to man: namely, 1. An immediate revelation, by inspiration, or otherwise, to every individual of the human race; or else, 2. A commission accompanied with indisputable credentials, bestowed on some to convince others, that they were actually delegated by God, in order to instruct them in those things which he is pleased to reveal. But it cannot seem requisite, that the Almighty should immediately inspire, or make a direct revelation to every particular person in the world; for either he must so powerfully influence the minds and affections of men, as to take away their freedom and choice of acting, which would be to offer violence to human nature; or else, if we may judge, from the known infirmity and depravity of our nature, men would, for the most part, have continued in their evil courses and practices, and have denied God in their lives, though their understandings were so clearly and fully convinced of his will and commandments, as well as of his eternal power and Godhead. Such revelations, therefore, so far as we can judge, would have been needless and superfluous; they would have been unsuitable to the majesty and honour of God; they would have been ineffectual to the ends for which they were designed, and would have afforded occasion for many more pretences to impostures than there are now in the world; for if every one had a revelation to himself, every one might pretend to others what he pleased; and one man might be deluded by the pretence of a revelation made to another, against an express revelation made to himself.

* See Leland's view of the deistical writers, where the conflicting opinions of the modern opposers of revelation are stated at great length, and the pernicious effects which these opinions are calculated to have on morals, clearly demonstrated. See also Rankin's Institutes of Theology, ch. iii. sect. i. and Horne's Introduction vol. i. pp. 21—31.

The only other way by which we can suppose the divine will to be revealed to man, is that which the Scriptures affirm to have been actually employed; namely, the qualifying of certain individuals to declare that will to others, by infallible signs and evidences that they are authorised and commissioned by God.

But it was not only necessary that a divine revelation should be communicated to mankind, in a way best calculated to accomplish the end proposed, but also that effectual means should be employed, in order to preserve such revelation for the benefit of mankind, and to deliver it down genuine and uncorrupted to posterity. Now we know of no method better calculated for preserving and transmitting a divine revelation, than that of writing; for oral tradition is in its own nature so uncertain and insecure, that a revelation could not really be preserved by such means, without a miracle, without the occasional interposition of Almighty God to renew the memory of it at particular intervals, or his continual assistance and inspiration to keep it always alive and vigorous.

Writing is a much more secure method of conveyance than tradition, inasmuch as it is neither so liable to involuntary mistakes, through weakness of memory or understanding, nor so subject to voluntary falsifications, suppressions or additions, either out of malice or design. It is likewise a mode of conveyance more complete and uniform, more general and diffusive. Farther, experience shows that writing is a method of conveyance more lasting than tradition. Every event or matter of any consequence, we desire to commit to writing. By this, laws are promulgated; by this, arts and sciences are propagated; by this, titles and estates are secured. And what do we know of ancient history, but those memorials which have been transmitted to us by books and writings? The early accounts of nations which tradition has handed down, are so full of fables and prodigies, that it is impossible to separate truth from mere fiction. Tradition passes away like the morning cloud, but books may live as long as the sun and moon endure.

Besides, it is certainly more fair and open, more free from suspicion of any fraud or contrivance, to have a religion preserved in writing, there to be read and examined by all, than to have it committed only to a few, to be by them communicated in discourses to others, and so on, from age to age, as we find that no two persons express the same thing exactly in the same manner, nor even the same person at different times.

Hence we conclude that a divine revelation must necessarily be committed to writing, otherwise it cannot be preserved in its purity, or serve mankind as a certain rule of faith, and of life: and we may add, that the importance of the matter, the variety of the subjects, and the design of the institutions, contained in those books which Jews and Christians account to be sacred, are additional reasons why they should be committed to writing.

The necessity of a divine revelation having been shown, as well as the probability, that such a revelation would be given to mankind, and the most effectual mode of communicating and transmitting it, the next point of inquiry which naturally arises is, whether that collection of writings which professes to be a revelation coming from God, and which Christians have received as such, furnishes sufficient evidence in support of its claims.—Horne's Introd. vol. i.—Bishop Newton's Works, vol. iv.

Now any candid and reflecting person, when he first directs his attention to this wonderful volume, and notices the awful and authoritative language which it often assumes, the sublimity and importance of the subjects of which it treats, the wonderful events and transactions which it records, and the promises and threatenings which it holds forth, will be naturally impelled to inquire, Is this book what it professes to be, the word of God? Were its various authors instructed and commissioned by God to relate the histories, announce the doctrines, enforce the precepts, predict the events, which are the subjects of their respective books? Were these holy men of God who spake as they were moved by his Spirit, or were they impostors? Or to reduce these inquiries into a methodical form, it will be asked generally, Are the books of the Old and New Testaments (excluding those which are avowedly apocryphal) genuine; that is, actually written by the persons to whom they are ascribed? Are they authentic; that is, do they relate matters of fact as they really happened? Are they inspired; that is, were they written under divine influence and guidance, so as to contain the words of God and not of man?

In discussing these momentous topics, writers on the evidences of religion generally prove, first, the genuineness, authenticity and inspiration of the New Testament; and having established its divine authority, they thence infer that of the Old Testament, for if the claims of the New Testament to be received as a divinely inspired book, be once admitted, no reasonable doubt can be entertained of the divine inspiration of the Old Testament; because the writers of the New Testament incessantly appeal to it as the word of God, and make ample quotations from it. This is perhaps the simplest and shortest method, and will be adopted in the introduction to the New Testament part of the present work. (See ch. iii, p. 331). But as it has been the practice of modern sceptics, to endeavour to shake the foundations of Christianity, by undermining the authority of the Old Testament; and as their attacks have been particularly directed against the genuineness and credit of the books of Moses, upon which the other ancient Scriptures greatly depend, it is of importance to prove, that the Pentateuch, or five books of Moses, were really written by him, and are of divine authority. And if we can establish the genuineness, authenticity, and inspiration of these books, the genuineness, &c. of the remaining books of the Old Testament will follow as a matter of course, on account of their mutual and immediate dependance; and in this way also, we might prove the truth of the New Testament, because, if the Jewish Scriptures be true, the dispensation which they contain being introductory to that contained in the New Testament, the latter, as it is founded on, and the perfection of the former, must of necessity be true also.

Let it not be supposed that the question, Whether the books of the Old Testament are genuine or spurious, is one of small importance; for if these books were not written by the authors to whom they are ascribed, or nearly in ages to which they are supposed to belong, but on the contrary, were written by authors who lived at a much later period, that is, if they were supposititious or spurious, the history which is related in them would by no means be worthy of the great credit that is given to it; the design which pervades these books would have been an imposition upon a later age, and the accomplishment of that design in the New Testament would be altogether an extraordinary and singular occurrence; the miracles therein recorded to have been anciently performed, would have been the invention of a later age, or natural events would have been metamorphosed into miracles; the prophecies asserted to be contained in those books would have been invented after the historical facts which are narrated in them; and lastly, Jesus Christ and his apostles would have approved and recommended the works of impostors. Hence it is evident of what great importance the question is, Whether these books are genuine. It is also of equal importance, to determine whether they are authentic, or relate matters of fact as they really happened, and in consequence possess authority. For a book may be genuine that is not authentic; a book may be authentic that is not genuine, and many books are both genuine and authentic, which are not inspired. These three characteristics of genuineness, authenticity, and inspiration, can meet no where but in a divine revelation.

The books of the Old Testament are written in Hebrew, and they are the only writings now extant in that language. The Old Testament, according to our Bibles, consists of thirty-nine books, but among the Jews they formed only twenty-two, which was also the number of letters in their alphabet. They divided these twenty-two books into three classes: the first class consisted of five books, namely, Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers and Deuteronomy, which they called 'the Law;' the second class consisted of thirteen books, namely, Joshua, Judges and Ruth, in one book; the two books of Samuel, of Kings, and of Chronicles, respectively, in single books; Ezra and Nehemiah in one book; Esther, Job, Isaiah, the two books of Jeremiah, in one; Ezekiel, Daniel, and the twelve minor prophets, in one book; these thirteen books they called 'The Prophets;' the third class consisted of the four remaining books, namely, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon, which four books the Jews called Chetubim, and the Greeks Hagiographa, or holy writings; this class was also called the Psalms, from the name of the first book in it. This threefold division was naturally suggested by the books themselves; it was used merely for convenience, and did not proceed from any opinion of difference in the authority of the books of the several classes. In like manner, the minor prophets were so called from the brevity of their works, and not from any supposed inferiority to the other prophets. The books are not in all instances arranged in our Bibles, according to the order of time in which they were written; but the book of Genesis was the earliest composition contained in the sacred volume, except, as some think, the book of Job, and the book of Malachi was certainly the latest. The five books of Moses, namely, Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, usually distinguished by the name of 'The Pentateuch,' from two Greek words pente, five, and teuchos, volume, were originally written in one continued work, and still remain in that form in the public copies read in the Jewish synagogues. It is uncertain when this portion of Scripture was first adopted in the Septuagint version, as the titles prefixed are of Greek derivation; the Pentateuch was, however, distinguished as five books in the private copies used by the Jews in the time of Josephus.

The book of Genesis, which may be considered as an introduction to the rest of the Pentateuch, contains the history of 2369 years, according to the common chronology. It commences from the beginning of the world itself, and concludes with the death of the patriarch Joseph. It has received the name of Genesis, because it describes the creation of the world, the generation of man, and of all other creatures. The book of Exodus relates the tyranny of Pharaoh, the bondage of the Israelites under him in Egypt, and their miraculous deliverance from this bondage, under Moses, from which circumstance it derives its name. It describes also the entrance of the Israelites into the wilderness of Sinai, the promulgation of the law, and the building of the tabernacle. It comprehends a period of about 145 years. The book of Leviticus has its name from its giving an account of the Jewish service and worship, the offices of the Levites, and the whole Levitical order. It embraces only about the space of a month. The book of Numbers relates several remarkable incidents in the passage of the Israelites through the wilderness. It has its denomination from the numbering of the tribes by Moses, according to the command of God. It records the events of about thirty-eight years. The book of Deuteronomy, which signifies a second law, contains a summary repetition of the moral, ceremonial, and judicial laws, which had before been delivered by Moses, accompanied by certain additions and explanations. It contains also many exhortations, admonitions, and warnings, addressed to the Israelites, with the view of inciting them to obedience. The period of time comprised in this book is, according to some, five lunar weeks, and according to others, about two months. The first argument to be adduced in favour of the genuineness of the Pentateuch, is the universal concurrence of all antiquity. The rival kingdoms of Judah and Israel, the hostile sects of Jews and Samaritans, and every denomination of early Christians, received the Pentateuch, as unquestionably written by Moses; and we find it mentioned and referred to by many heathen authors, in a manner which plainly shows it to have been the general and undisputed opinion in the pagan world that this book was the work of the Jewish legislator. Nicholaus of Damascus mentions the deluge, and the resting of the ark upon a high mountain of Armenia, and the preservation of Noah by means of the ark, and adds, this might be the man about whom Moses the legislator of the Jews wrote, (Joseph. Antiq. b. i. c. 3.). We are told that Alexander Polyhistor mentioned a history of the Jews written by Cleodamus, which was agreeable to the history of Moses the legislator (Ibid. b. i. c. 15). Diodorus Siculus mentions Moses as the legislator of the Jews in three different places of his remaining works, and plainly ascribes to him the laws delivered in the Pentateuch, stating also that they were prescribed by divine authority. Strabo speaks of the description which Moses gave of the deity, and says that he condemned the religious worship of the Egyptians. This statement, though not very accurate, is sufficient to show that he considered the Pentateuch as written by Moses. Both Justin and Tacitus admitted the Pentateuch to have been written by Moses. Pliny the elder mentions 'a system of magic,' as he calls it, which was derived from Moses. Juvenal the satirist speaks of the volume of the law written by Moses. Galen makes a reference to the book of Genesis. Numenius, a Pythagorean philosopher of the second century, says that Plato borrowed from the writings of Moses his doctrines concerning the existence of a God, and the creation of the world. Longinus, in his treatise on the sublime, says "so likewise the Jewish legislator, who was no ordinary person, having conceived a just idea of the power of God, has nobly expressed it in the beginning of his laws, 'And God said,'—What? 'Let there be light, and light was. Let the earth be, and the earth was.'" Porphyry, one of the most acute and learned enemies of Christianity, admitted the genuineness of the Pentateuch, and acknowledged that Moses was prior to the Phœnician Sanchoniathon, who lived before the Trojan war; he even contended for the truth of Sanchoniathon's account of the Jews from its coincidence with the Mosaic history. Nor was the genuineness of the Pentateuch denied by any of the numerous writers against the gospel in the first four centuries, although the Christian fathers constantly appealed to the history and prophecies of the Old Testament, in support of the divine origin of the doctrines which they taught.

To this testimony from profane authors may be added the positive assertions of the sacred writers both of the Old and New Testament. Moses frequently speaks of himself as directed by God to write the commands which he received from him, and to record the events which occurred during his ministry. (See Exod. xvii. 14. xxiv. 4. Num. xxxiii. 2.) And in Deut. xxxi. 9, 24. he speaks of himself as the writer of the book of the law, in the most express terms; and it may safely be asserted, that no person who had forged the Pentateuch, or even written it in a subsequent age from existing materials, would have inserted such passages, as they must have excited inquiry, and have caused the fraud to be detected. In many subsequent books of the Old Testament, the Pentateuch is repeatedly quoted and referred to under the names of 'The Law,' and 'The book of Moses;' and in particular we are told that 'Joshua read all the words of the law, the blessings and cursings, according to all that is written in the book of the law; there was not a word of all that Moses commanded which Joshua read not before all the congregation of Israel.' (Josh. viii. 34, 35.) From which passage it is evident that the book of the Law, or Pentateuch, existed in the time of Joshua, the successor of Moses, and was acknowledged by him. In the New Testament also the writing of the Law, or Pentateuch, is expressly ascribed to Moses. In a variety of passages in the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles, Moses is evidently considered as the author of the Pentateuch, and every one of the five books is quoted as written by him.

Thus the books of Moses have constantly been received as his, and have been delivered down to us as his by the consent of all ages, by Jews, Heathens, and Christians; nor was their genuineness ever denied or questioned by those whose interest it was to deny it; by any of the Jews in their frequent apostasies, or by the greatest enemies of the Jews, the Samaritans, and they both certainly would have done so, if there had been the least ground or pretence for it.—Bp. Tomline's Christ. Theol. part i. ch. 1.—Bp. Newton's Works, vol. i. dissert. 1.—Grave's Lect. on the Pent.

It may be observed that we have the strongest possible negative testimony to the authenticity of the Mosaic history. The laborious Whiston asserts, and in support of his assertion appeals to a similar declaration of the learned Grotius, 'That there does not appear in the genuine records of mankind belonging to ancient times, any testimonies that contradict those produced from the Old Testament; and that it may be confidently affirmed there are no such to be found.'—Grot. b. iii. sect. 13, 14, 16.—Whist. Joseph. We are not however confined to negative testimony; for it would be easy to bring forward evidence almost amounting to demonstration, to prove the positive agreement of antiquity with the narrative of the sacred historian; but we can only mention briefly some of the leading facts, concerning which the most ancient historians and earliest traditions very remarkably coincide with the Pentateuch. Thus Manetho, Chereimon, Apollonius, Lysimachus, and many others testify that Moses was the leader of the Jews, as well as the writer of their law, and conducted them from Egypt where they served as slaves. Eupolemus, Artapanus, Strabo, Trogus Pompeius, Chalcidius, and Juvenal speak of Moses as the author of a volume which was preserved with great care among the Jews, by which the worship of images, and eating of swine's flesh, were forbidden, circumcision and the observance of the sabbath strictly enjoined. Longinus, who has been already quoted, expressly mentions the account of the creation of the world, as having been written by Moses the Jewish lawgiver. Diodorus Siculus in his catalogue of those lawgivers who affected to have received the plan of their laws from some deity, mentions Moses as ascribing his to that God whom he calls Jaoh or Jah. And further he speaks of Moses as a man illustrious for his courage and prudence, who instituted the Jewish religion and law, divided the Jews into twelve tribes, established the priesthood among them with a judicial power, &c. Numenius, a Pythagorean, held the Jewish scriptures, and especially the books of Moses, in such great esteem, that his books are full of passages quoted from Moses and some of the prophets with great reverence. He says, 'Plato was only Moses speaking Greek,' and affirms that Moses by his prayers brought dreadful calamities upon Egypt. Justin Martyr enumerates many poets, historians, and lawgivers, and philosophers of Greece, who mention Moses as the leader and prince of the Jewish nation. Berossus and Abydenus mention the deluge; Artapanus, Eupolemus, and Abydenus, speak of the tower of Babel; and the latter of the failure of the attempt to build the tower. Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Tacitus, Pliny, and Solinus, give an account of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, in the main, agreeable to that of Moses. Berossus, Alexander Polyhistor, and others make express and honourable mention of Abraham and some of his family; and even speak of his interview with Melchisedec.—Gregory's Letters on Christ. Rel. let. v. To this enumeration of testimonies on the remains of early writers in favour of the truth of the Mosaic writings, many others might be added. And whether we consider the information to be found in the later works of learned men, as derived from the Jewish scriptures, or from other sources, the credit of the Mosaic history will perhaps be equally established, since they quoted from earlier authors.

For, let it be remembered that Josephus appeals to the public records of different nations, and to a great number of books extant in his time, but now lost, as indisputable evidence, in the opinion of the heathen world, for the truth of the most remarkable events related in his history, the earlier periods of which he professes to have taken principally from the Pentateuch. For a more particular account of heathen testimonies in favour of the truth of the Mosaic writings, see Bishop Newton's Works, vol. i.—Stillingfleet's Orig. Sac.—Marsh on the Divine Authority of the Pentateuch.—Faber's Hor. Mos.—Bishop Tomline's El. of Christ. Theol.

Of the many traditions which accord with the Mosaic history and which prevailed among the ancient nations, and still exist in several parts of the world, the following must be considered as singularly striking: that the world was formed from rude and shapeless matter by the Spirit of God; that the seventh day was a holy day; that man was created perfect, and had the dominion given him over all the inferior animals; that there had been a golden age, when man in a state of innocence had open intercourse with heaven; that when his nature became corrupt, the earth itself underwent a change, that sacrifice was necessary to appease the offended gods; that there was an evil spirit continually endeavouring to injure man and thwart the designs of the good spirit, but that he should at last be finally subdued, and universal happiness restored through the intercession of a Mediator; that the life of man, during the first ages of the world, was of great length; that there were ten generations previous to the general deluge; that only eight persons were saved out of the flood, in an ark, by the interposition of the Deity; these, and many other similar traditions, are related to have been prevalent in the ancient world, by Egyptian, Phœnician, Greek and Roman authors.—See Stillingfleet's Orig. Sac.—Maurice's Hist. of India, and Horne's Introd. vol. i.

It is no small satisfaction to the friends of revealed religion, that this argument has of late years received great additional strength, from the discovery of an almost corresponding tradition, traced up among the nations whose records have been the best preserved, to times even prior to the age of Moses. The treasures of oriental learning which Maurice collected with so much industry, and explained with so much judgment, in his History and Antiquities of India, supply abundance of incontrovertible evidence for the existence of opinions in the early ages of the world, which perfectly agree with the leading articles of our faith, as well as with the principal events related in the Pentateuch. In one passage he says, 'Whether the reader will allow or not the inspiration of the sacred writer, his mind, on the perusal, must be struck with one very remarkable fact, namely, that the names which are assigned by Moses to eastern countries and cities, derived to them immediately from the patriarchs, their original founders, are for the most part the very names by which they were anciently known over all the east; many of them were afterwards translated, with little variation, by the Greeks, in their systems of Geography. Moses has traced, in one short chapter, (Gen. x.) all the inhabitants of the earth, from the Caspian and Persian seas to the extreme Gades, to their original, and recorded at once the period and occasion of their dispersion.'—History of Hindostan, vol. i.

This fact, and the conclusions from it, which are thus incontrovertibly established by the lately acquired knowledge of the Sanscrit language, were contended for and strongly enforced by Bochart and Stillingfleet, who could only refer to oriental opinion and traditions, as they came to them through the medium of Grecian interpretation. To the late excellent and learned Sir W. Jones, we are chiefly indebted for the light recently thrown from the east upon this important subject. The result of his laborious inquiries into the chronology, history, mythology, and languages of the nations, whence infidels have long derived their most formidable objections, was a full conviction that neither accident nor ingenuity could account for the very numerous instances of similar traditions and near coincidences, in the names of persons and places which are to be found in the Bible, and in ancient monuments of eastern literature.—Asiatic Researches, and Maurice's History, vol. i. Whoever, indeed, is acquainted with the writings of Bryant and Maurice, and with the Asiatic Researches, cannot but have observed, that the accounts of the creation, the fall, the deluge, and the dispersion of mankind, recorded by the nations upon the vast continent of Asia, bear a strong resemblance to each other and to the narration in the sacred history, and evidently contain the fragments of one original truth, which was broken by the dispersion of the patriarchal families, and corrupted by length of time, by allegory, and idolatry. From this universal concurrence on this head, one of these things is necessarily true: either that all the traditions must have been taken from the author of the book of Genesis, or that the author of the book of Genesis made up his history from some or all of such traditions as were already extant; or lastly, that he received his knowledge of past events by revelation. Were then all these traditions taken from the Mosaic history? It has been shown by Sir W. Jones and Maurice, that they were received too generally and too early to make this supposition even possible; for they existed in different parts of the world in the very age when Moses lived. Was the Mosaic history composed from the traditions then existing? It is certain that the Chaldeans, the Persians, the most ancient inhabitants of India, and the Egyptians, all possessed the same story; but they had, by the time of Moses, wrapped up in their own mysteries, and disguised it by their own fanciful conceits: and surely no rational mind can believe, that if Moses had been acquainted with all the mystic fables of the East as well as of Egypt, he could out of such an endless variety of obscure allegory, by the power of human sagacity alone, have discovered the real origin; much less, that from a partial knowledge of some of them, he could have been able to discover the facts which suit and explain them all.* His

* It is highly probable, as will be shown afterwards, that both Moses and the Israelites had acquired a knowledge of many of the facts recorded in the book of Genesis from tradition; that Noah was acquainted with the principal events and transactions relative to Antediluvian times; and that these were transmitted by his son Shem to Abraham, from whom they passed to the other patriarchs. Still, it is evident that the book of Genesis could not have been compiled from materials drawn from these traditionary sources; much less from the corrupted traditions here alluded to.

plain recital, however, of the creation, the fall, the deluge, and the dispersion of mankind, does unquestionably develop the origin, and bring to light those facts; and it therefore follows, not only that the account is the true one, but there being no human means of his acquiring the knowledge of it, that it was, as he asserts it to have been, revealed to him by God himself.

We have now seen, from undoubted testimony, that the Pentateuch has been uniformly ascribed to Moses as its author; that the most ancient traditions remarkably agree with his account of the creation of the world, the fall of man, the deluge, the dispersion of mankind, and the departure of the Israelites from Egypt under Moses; that a people with such laws and institutions as he professes to have given them, have existed from remote antiquity; and we ourselves are eye-witnesses that such a people, so circumstanced, exist at this hour, and in a state exactly conformable to his predictions concerning them. But it may be observed, that the civil history of the Jews is seldom contested, even by those who imagine the Pentateuch to have been written in some age subsequent to that of Moses, from a collection of annals or diaries; it is the miraculous part of it which is chiefly disputed. To this observation, however, we may oppose the conclusive argument of a professed enemy to revealed religion, 'that the miraculous part of the Mosaic history is not like the prodigies of Livy and other profane authors, unconnected with the facts recorded; it is so intermixed and blended with the narrative that they must both stand or fall together.'—Lord Bolingbroke. With respect to the annals which are mentioned as the supposed foundation of this history, they must have been either true or false; if true, the history of the Israelites remains equally marvellous; if false, how was it possible for the history to acquire the credit and esteem in which it was so universally held? But upon what is this supposition founded? No particular person is mentioned with any colour of probability as the author or compiler of the Pentateuch; no particular age is pointed out with any appearance of certainty, though that of Solomon is usually fixed upon as the most likely. Yet why the most enlightened period of the Jewish history should be chosen as the best adapted to forgers or interpolation, nay, to the most gross imposition that was ever practised upon mankind, it is difficult to conjecture. Was it possible, in such an age, to write the Pentateuch in the name of the venerated law-giver of the Jews, from a collection of annals, and produce the firm belief that it actually had been written more than 400 years before; and this not only throughout the nation itself, but among all those whom the widely extended fame of Solomon had connected with him, or had induced to study the history and pretensions of this extraordinary people?

The truth of the Mosaic history receives farther confirmation from the character of Moses, from his qualifications as a historian, and from the opportunities he enjoyed of becoming acquainted with the events and transactions which he records.

Moses was well qualified to write his history, in consequence of his having received a princely education in the court of Pharaoh, and it is certain that Egypt was the most famous school of learning in ancient times. His parts and attainments are allowed to have been great, even by his enemies, and several testimonies from heathen authors, in favour of his character as a historian, and as a sublime writer, have already been adduced. Whether we view him as a historian, as a prophet, as a poet, or as a law-giver, we find him varying and accommodating his style to his subject, and few writers excel in any one of these characters so much as he does in them all. It is evident also, that Moses had a chief concern in all the transactions recorded in the four last books of the Pentateuch, as legislator and governor of the Jews. Every thing was done under his eye and cognizance, and therefore he cannot be charged with ignorance of the facts which he relates.

With regard to the book of Genesis, although there are many things in it which could be derived only from divine revelation, yet there are many other events and facts which must have been known in the time of Moses by tradition, and when this book was first delivered many persons then living must have been competent to decide on the fidelity with which he relates those events. They must have heard of, and believed, the remarkable incidents in the lives of the patriarchs, the prophecies which they uttered, and the actions which they performed; for the longevity of man, in the earlier ages of the world, rendered tradition the criterion of truth; and in the days of Moses, the channels of information must have been as yet uncorrupted; for though ages had already elapsed, even 2432 years, before the birth of the sacred historian, yet those relations were easily ascertained, which might have been conveyed by seven persons from Adam to Moses; and that the traditions were so secure from error, we shall immediately be convinced, if we consider that Methusalem was 340 years old when Adam died, and that he lived till the year of the flood, when Noah had attained 600 years. In like manner, Shem conveyed tradition from Noah to Abraham, for he conversed with both for a considerable time. Isaac also lived to instruct Joseph in the history of his predecessors, and Ananias, the father of Moses, was contemporary with Joseph. The Israelites then must have been able, by interesting tradition, to judge how far the Mosaic account was consistent with truth.—Gray's Key to the Old Testament, Introd. to Genesis. As to the hypothesis which some have entertained, namely, that Moses compiled the book of Genesis from written records preserved in the family of Shem, and extant in the time of Moses, we reject it as fanciful and destitute of any proper foundation.

Moses was also an honest and disinterested writer, and has given such proofs of impartiality and veracity, as are rarely to be found in the most faithful historians. Instead of flattering his countrymen, or courting their applause, he rather exposes their infidelity and wickedness; and while he celebrates the virtues of some of their ancestors, he at the same time records the failings and imperfections of the very best of them. He does not spare even his own family and his nearest relations. He freely relates the cruelty and barbarity of Levi, the founder of his family, in the affair of the Shechemites, and the curse entailed upon him on account of it. He gives an exact detail of the conduct of Aaron his brother, with respect to the golden calf, and also of Aaron and Miriam's sedition. Neither does he conceal his own faults, but fairly acknowledges his want of faith and confidence in God; and if at any time he commends himself, it is when he finds it necessary to do so in order to vindicate himself from unjust calumnies.

No one can charge Moses with avarice, or with ambitious motives. He forsook all the pleasures and all the honours of the court of Egypt, 'choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God;' and though he was appointed to a high command, yet it was attended with continual labour and pain, with great trouble and vexation to himself, and with little profit or advantage to his family. The priesthood he settled in the line of Aaron, the supreme command he resigned to one of another tribe, and his own family he reduced to the rank of common Levites.

His excellent moral qualities furnish an additional argument in proof of his fidelity as an historian. Not only does he appear in all his writings to have had an ardent zeal for the glory of God, but also for the service and happiness of his countrymen. He delivered them from the meanest and bitterest slavery in a foreign land, and conducted them safely, through dangers and difficulties, to a land of liberty. Often did he stand between them and destruction, and rather than that they should be cut off, as they had deserved, he prayed and entreated that he himself might be blotted out of the book of life. A man who had so sincere a love for his friends and country, could not be a bad man; and if he had been a Grecian or Roman legislator, those who are now the most forward to traduce him, would then, perhaps, have been the most profuse and lavish in his praises.—Bishop Newton's Works, vol. i. dissert. i.—See also Grave's Lectures on the four last Books of the Pentateuch, Lectures ii. iii. iv.—Blunt's Veracity of the five Books of Moses.—Horne's Introduction, vol. i.

But a more particular consideration of the contents of the Pentateuch, as relating immediately to the Jews, will furnish irrefragable arguments to prove its authenticity, and the truth of its claims to inspiration. The Pentateuch contains directions for the establishment of the civil and religious policy of the Jews, which, it is acknowledged, existed from the time of Moses; it contains a code of laws, which every individual of the nation was required to observe with the utmost punctuality, under pain of the severest punishment, and with which, therefore, every individual must be supposed to have been acquainted; it contains the history of the ancestors of the Jews, in a regular succession, from the creation of the world, and a series of prophecies which, in an especial manner, concerned themselves, and which must have been beyond measure interesting to a people who were alternately enjoying promised blessings, and suffering under predicted calamities; it contains not only the wonders of creation and providence in a general view, but also repeated instances of the superintending care of the God of the whole earth over their particular nation, and the institution of feasts and ceremonies in perpetual remembrance of these divine interpositions; and all these things are professedly addressed in the name, and to the contemporaries, of Moses—to those who had seen the miracles he records, who had been witnesses to the events he relates, and who had heard the awful promulgation of the law. Let any one reflect upon these extraordinary and wonderful facts, and surely he must be convinced, that they could never have obtained the universal belief of those among whose ancestors they are said to have happened, unless there had been the clearest evidence of their certainty and truth. Nor were these facts the transient occurrences of a single hour or day, and witnessed only by a small number of persons; on the contrary, some of them were continued through a space of forty years, and were known and felt by several millions of people: the pillar of the cloud was seen by day, and the pillar of fire by night during their whole journey in the wilderness; nor did the manna fail till they had eaten of the corn in the land of Canaan. We see Moses in the combined characters of leader, law-giver, and historian, not once or twice, or as it were cautiously and surreptitiously, but avowedly, and continually appealing to the conviction of a whole people, who were witnesses of these manifestations of divine power for the justice of their punishments, and resting the authority of the Law upon the truth of the wonderful history he records. And farther, in order to preserve the accurate recollection of these events, and prevent the possibility of any alteration in this history, he expressly commanded that the whole Pentateuch should be read at the end of every seven years, in the solemnity of the year of release, at the feast of tabernacles, in the hearing of all Israel, that all the people, men, women, and children, and the strangers within their gates, might hear, and learn to fear the Lord their God, and observe to do all the words of the Law; and especially, that their children, who had not been eye-witnesses of the miracles which established its claim to their faith and obedience, might hear the marvellous history, which they were taught by their fathers, publicly declared and confirmed, and learn to fear and obey the Lord their God from the wonders of creation and providence, revealed to his servant Moses, and from the supernatural powers with which he was invested. (Deut. xxxi. 10, &c.) Can we require a more striking proof of the existence and designed publicity of the Law, than the command to 'write all the words of the Law very plainly on pillars of stone, and to set them up on the day they passed over Jordan, the day they took possession of the promised land, and to plaster them over to preserve them.' (Deut. xxvii. 2.)—See Patrick in loc. They were commanded also to teach the Law diligently to their children, and explain to them the testimonies, and the statutes, and the judgments, and the history of their forefathers; to talk of them when sitting in the house, when walking in the way, when they lay down, and when they rose up; to bind the words for a sign upon their door posts and gates, and upon their hands, and as frontlets between their eyes. (Deut. vi.) Words cannot express more strongly than these do, the general obligation of the people to acquire an accurate knowledge of the Law, and to pay a constant, habitual attention to its precepts, whether these be taken in a literal or figurative sense. These repeated injunctions with regard to public and private instruction in the Law, also manifestly imply that the book of the Law existed in writing at that time, and that the people must have had easy access to copies of it, and without doubt the office of the Levite, whom every family was 'to keep within their gates,' must have been to teach the law. The command that every king upon his accession to the throne, should 'write him a copy of the law in a book, out of that which is before the priests,' (Deut. xvii. 18.) is a proof not only that the Law existed in writing, but that there was a copy of it under the peculiar care of the priests; that is, deposited in the tabernacle or temple.

Is it credible that any people would have submitted to so rigorous and burdensome a law as that of Moses, unless they had been fully convinced, by a series of miracles, that he was a prophet sent from God? And being thus convinced of the divine mission of Moses, would they have suffered any writing to pass under his venerated name, of which he was not really the author? Had fraud or imposture of any kind belonged to any part of it, would not the Israelites, at the moment of rebellion, have availed themselves of that circumstance as a ground or justification of their disobedience? The Jews were exceedingly prone to transgress the law of Moses, and to fall into idolatry; but had there been the least suspicion of any falsity or imposture in the writings of Moses, the ringleaders of their revolts would have eagerly availed themselves of it, as the most plausible plea to draw them off from the worship of the true God. Can we think that a nation and religion so maligned as the Jewish were, could have escaped discovery if there had been any deceit in their religious polity, when so many lay in wait continually to expose them to all contumelies imaginable? Nay, among themselves in their frequent apostasies, and occasions given for such a pretence, how comes this to be never heard of, nor in the least questioned, whether the law was undoubtedly of Moses's writing or not? What an excellent plea would this have been for Jeroboam's calves in Dan and Bethel, for the Samaritan temple on mount Gerizim, could any the least suspicion have been raised among them concerning the authenticity of the fundamental records of the Jewish commonwealth. And what is very remarkable, the Jews, who were a people strangely suspicious and incredulous while they were fed and clothed by miracles, yet could never find ground to question this; nay, Moses himself, we find, was greatly envied by many of the Israelites in the wilderness, as is evident from the conspiracy of Korah and his accomplices, and that on the very ground that he 'took too much upon him:' how unlikely then is it, that amidst so many enemies he should dare to enter any thing into public records which was not most undoubtedly true, or undertake to prescribe a law to oblige the people and their posterity, or that after his own age any thing should come out under his name, which would not be presently detected by the emulators of his glory? What then is the thing itself incredible? surely not, that Moses should write the records we speak of? Were the people not able to understand the truth of it? What, not those who were in the same age, and conveyed it down by a certain tradition to posterity? Or did not the Israelites all constantly believe it? What, not they who would sooner part with their lives and fortunes, than admit any alteration or variation as to their law?—Stillingfleet's Orig. Sac. b. ii. c. i.

Can we have more undoubted evidence that there were such persons as Solon, Lycurgus, and Numa, and that the laws bearing their names were theirs, than the history of the several commonwealths of Athens, Sparta, and Rome, which were governed by those laws? When writings are not of general concernment, they may be more easily counterfeited, but when they concern the rights, privileges, and government of a nation, there will always be a sufficient number of persons whose interest will lead them to prevent impostures. It is no easy matter to forge a magna charta, and to invent laws; the caution and prudence of men are never so much on the alert as in matters which concern their estates and privileges. The general interest of men lies contrary to such impostures, and therefore they will prevent their obtaining credit among them. Now the laws of Moses are incorporated with the very republic of the Jews, and their subsistence and government depend upon them; their religion and laws are so interwoven the one with the other, that one cannot be separated from the other. Their right to their temporal possessions in the land of Canaan depended on their owning the sovereignty of God, who gave these possessions to them, and on the truth of the history recorded by Moses, concerning the promises made to the patriarchs; so that on that account it was impossible that those laws should be counterfeited on which the welfare of the nation depended, and according to which they were governed ever since they were a nation.—Stillingfleet's Orig. Sac. b. ii. c. i.

Let those then who are disposed to deny the genuineness and authenticity of the Pentateuch, consider its real importance to the Jewish people, and the high veneration in which it was unquestionably held by them, and surely they must be convinced of the impossibility of ignorance or mistake concerning any fact relative to it; and in particular it will appear scarcely credible, that the Jews should err in attributing it to any person who was not its real author, or that they should not know who it was that digested it into the shape in which we now have it from materials left by Moses, had it been compiled in that manner in some subsequent age. The silence of history and tradition upon this point is a sufficient proof that no such compilation ever took place. If we believe that Moses led the Israelites out of Egypt, why should we not believe that he wrote the account of that deliverance? If we believe that God enabled Moses to work miracles,* why should we not believe that he also enabled him to write the history of the creation?—Bp. Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theol. part i. c. i.

The prophecies contained in the books of Moses furnish undeniable evidence of his divine mission, and consequently of the divine authority of these books. These prophecies not only relate to former times, but several of them have been fulfilled in later ages or are fulfilling at this time in the world. God hath 'blessed' and 'enlarged' the posterity of Shem and Japhet, and Canaan, in his posterity, hath been 'a servant of servants unto his brethren,' as Noah foretold. (Gen. ix. 25, 26, 27.) The posterity of Ishmael, the Arabs, are to this day wild men; their hand has been against every man, and every man's hand against them, and they still subsist a rude, unconquered race, notwithstanding the most powerful efforts of their enemies to subdue them; they still dwell in the presence of all their brethren. (Gen. xvi. 12.) The posterity of Abraham obtained possession of Canaan, according to the promise made to that patriarch, 400 years before its fulfilment. The seed of

* The evidence on which the truth of the miracles recorded by Moses, as well as those of our Saviour, rest, will be fully stated in the New Testament part of this history. See b. viii. sect. ii. c. iv. p. 985.

Abraham multiplied as the stars of heaven, and it is computed that they are at this day as numerous as ever they were in Canaan, although they are dispersed into all parts of the world. (Gen. xv. 13. xxii. 17.) The sceptre continued in Judah till the time of the coming of Shiloh, and then departed, as Jacob foretold. (Gen. xlix. 10.) The prophet foretold by Moses has appeared, even Christ, the promised seed. (Deut. xviii. 15, &c.)

In the book of Deuteronomy, Moses foretold that the Israelites should be blessed or cursed, according as they were obedient or disobedient to the commandments and statutes which he had given them; and all their subsequent history abundantly confirms the truth of the prediction. And what can be a stronger proof of the divinity of the Law of Moses? In particular, he foretold that a nation should come against them from far, swift as the eagle flieth, a nation whose tongue they should not understand; that this nation should besiege them in their gates; that they should be greatly straitened and distressed in the siege; that they should be plucked from off their own land; that they should become an astonishment, a proverb and a by-word amongst all nations; that they should be scattered among all people, from the one end of the earth even to the other; and that their plagues should be wonderful, even great plagues, and of long continuance, (Deut. xxviii.) all which predictions the world has seen fulfilled, and still sees at this very day. And how was it possible for an author, who lived above three thousand years ago, to foretel so many particulars, which are transacting in the world even now, unless they were suggested by divine inspiration? Surely all reasonable men must conclude with the apostle, 'that prophecy came not in old time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.' (2 Pet. i. 21.)—Bishop Newton's Works, vol. i.

The intrinsic excellence of the Mosaic writings, and their moral tendency, furnish another strong argument in favour of their divine origin. They give such a description of the Supreme Being, as our natural conceptions would lead us to acquiesce in. We behold him represented as infinite in wisdom, goodness, and power; and expecting from mankind that degree of submission and homage, which, we must easily perceive, is a reasonable service, and consonant with our notions of the relative situations of the Creator and his creatures. They deliver to the world things highly becoming of God to impart, and absolutely necessary for man to know. They explain the formation and origin of the universe, the creation of man, his state of innocence, fall, and expulsion from the seat of happiness; they announce to a guilty world the glorious promise of a deliverer, who should repair the ruin produced by the fall; they describe the propagation of mankind, their general corruption, the deluge, the confusion of tongues, the plantation of families, and their separation into kingdoms; they record the selection of a particular family, out of which the Messiah was destined to proceed; they commemorate the miracles by which God was pleased to redeem his chosen people from servitude, and lead them through the midst of many dangers and difficulties, to the land which he had promised them as their future inheritance. The laws which they enumerate as prescribed by God for the use of his people, are such as are consonant with his wisdom and goodness. Whilst the religious precepts and ordinances required a solemnity, purity, and decency in divine worship, unknown to heathen nations, or unpractised by them, the other institutions, both moral and political, were calculated to promote the prosperity and comfort of all who lived under them. They prohibited idolatry, perjury, theft, murder, adultery, and every species of covetousness and envy, and enforced the opposite virtues of justice, mercy, chastity, and charity, with a due reverence towards our natural parents and accidental superiors. In almost every page, the people are exhorted to amendment and submission to their God and king; they are reminded of their former murmurings and miscarriages, and compassionately forewarned of the grievous punishments that should await their disobedience. The theology of the Mosaic law was pure, sublime, and devotional. The belief of one supreme, self-existent, and all-perfect being, the creator of the heavens and the earth, was the basis of all the religious institutions of the Israelites, the sole object of their hopes, fears, and worship. His adorable perfections, and especially the supreme providence of Jehovah, as the sole dispenser of good and evil, and the benevolent protector and benefactor of mankind, are described in the Pentateuch in unaffected strains of unrivalled sublimity; which while they are adapted to our finite apprehensions, by imagery borrowed from terrestrial and sensible objects, at the same time raise our conceptions to the contemplation of the spirituality and majesty of Him 'who dwelleth in light inaccessible.' In the decalogue, we have a repository of duty to God and man, so pure and comprehensive as to be absolutely without parallel. We recognise in the ten commandments, not the impotent recommendations of man, or the uncertain deductions of human reason, but the dictates of the God of purity, flowing from his immediate legislation, and promulgated with awful solemnity.

The sanctions also of the remaining enactments of the law, point out their divine origin, whilst the moral precepts which are scattered throughout the whole of the Pentateuch, possess such intrinsic excellence, such dignity and authority, as no human precepts ever possessed. The rites and ceremonies prescribed in the law are at once dignified and expressive; they point out the holiness of God, the sinfulness of man, the necessity of an atonement. As to the punishments of the law, they are ever such as the nature and circumstances of the crime render just and necessary; and its rewards are not such as flow merely from retributive justice, but from a fatherly tenderness and regard, which make obedience to the laws the highest interest of the subject. In short, the Mosaic law is calculated not only to restrain vice, but to infuse virtue. It alone, of all other laws, brings man to the footstool of his Maker, and keeps him dependent on the strong for strength, on the wise for wisdom, and on the merciful for grace. It abounds with promises of support and salvation for the present life, which no false system dared even to propose. Every where Moses, in the most confident manner, pledges his God for the fulfilment of all the gracious promises with which his laws are so plentifully interspersed. Who that dispassionately reads the Pentateuch, that considers it in itself, and in its references to that glorious gospel which it was intended to introduce, (see Introduction to the New Testament, ch. i. ii. p. 826.) can for a moment deny it the palm of infinite superiority over all the systems ever framed or imagined by man?—Robison on Revealed Religion.—Dr A. Clarke's Comment.—Horne's Introd. vol. i.—See also the Divine Authority of the four last books of the Pentateuch, established from internal evidence in Grave's valuable Lectures.

Thus we have given a brief statement of the leading arguments in support of the genuineness, authenticity, and inspiration of the five books of Moses. These arguments will serve to confirm the faith of the believer, and when combined together, they present a body of evidence so strong, and so decisive, as cannot fail to remove every reasonable doubt, and satisfy every candid and unprejudiced inquirer, that the writings of Moses are of divine authority, and were dictated by the Spirit of the living God.

The same arguments which prove the genuineness, authenticity, and divine authority of the Pentateuch, are also applicable to the remaining books of the Old Testament, and the divine authority of the latter may be inferred from that of the former; for so great is their mutual and immediate dependence upon each other, that if the authority of the one be taken away, the authority of the other must necessarily be destroyed. The books that follow after Deuteronomy are all historical, devotional, moral, or prophetic. The historical books are those from Joshua to Esther, inclusive. Some of them bear the names of distinguished prophets, and the rest are universally attributed to writers invested with the same character. They contain a compendium of the Jewish history from the death of Moses to the reformation established by Nehemiah, after the return from the captivity, being a period of more than 1000 years. After the death of Moses, Joshua continued to record those miraculous particulars which demonstrated the divine interposition in favour of the Israelites, and to commemorate the events that preceded and accomplished their settlement in the land of Canaan. The period which succeeded the death of Joshua, during which the Hebrews were subjected to the government of the judges, opened a large scope for the industry of the sacred historians; and Samuel, or some other prophet, appears to have selected such particulars as were best calculated to describe this period, and to have digested them into the book of Judges, having doubtless procured much information from the records of the priests or judges,†

* With regard to the marks of a posterior date, or at least of posterior interpolation, so often urged with an insidious design to weaken the authority of the Pentateuch, it will be sufficient to observe, that it may safely be admitted that Joshua, Samuel, or some one of the succeeding prophets, wrote the account of the death of Moses contained in the last chapter of Deuteronomy; and that Ezra, when he transcribed the history written by Moses, changed the names of some places, which were then become obsolete, to those by which they were called in his time, and added, for the purpose of elucidation, the few passages which are allowed to be not suitable to the age of Moses. Now surely, when it is considered that these few passages are of an explanatory nature; that they are easily distinguished from the original writings of Moses; and that Ezra was himself an inspired writer, raised up by God to re-establish the Jewish church after the return from captivity, the cavils founded upon such circumstances can scarcely be thought deserving of any serious attention. The reader, however, will find a complete answer to these objections in the Appendix to Grave's Lectures on the Pentateuch, Sect. I.

† It appears from the testimony of Josephus, (Cont. Apion, i.) that public and circumstantial records were kept by the priests, and other publicly appointed persons, and to such resome of whom were inspired, though prophetic revelations were "scarce in those days," (1 Sam. iii. 1.) and divine communications were made by means of the Urim and Thummim, (Exod. xxviii. 30. Lev. viii. 8.) From the time of Samuel, the Jews seem to have been favoured with a regular succession of prophets, who, in an uninterrupted series, bequeathed to each other, with the mantle of prophecy, the charge of commemorating such important particulars as were consistent with the plan of sacred history; and who took up the history where the preceding prophet ceased, without distinguishing their respective contributions. It is possible, however, that the books of Kings and of Chronicles do not contain a complete compilation of the entire works of each contemporary prophet, but rather an abridgement of their several labours digested by Ezra, in or after the captivity, with the intention to exhibit the sacred history at one point of view; and hence it is that they contain some expressions which evidently result from contemporary description, and others that as clearly argue them to have been completed long after the occurrences which they relate. Hence also it is, that, though particular periods are more diffusively treated of than others, we still find throughout a connected series of events, and in each individual book a general uniformity of style.

But although we cannot determine with certainty the authors of the historical books, yet we may rest assured, that the Jews, who had already received inspired books from the hands of Moses, would not have admitted any others as of equal authority, if they had not been fully convinced that the writers were supernaturally assisted. And although the testimony of a nation is far from being, in every instance, a sufficient reason for believing its sacred books to be possessed of that divine authority which is ascribed to them, yet the testimony of the Jews, in the present case, has a peculiar title to be credited, from the circumstances in which it was delivered. It is the testimony of a people, who having already in their possession genuine inspired books, were the better able to judge of others who advanced a claim to inspiration, and who, we have reason to think, far from being credulous with respect to such a claim, or disposed precipitately to recognise it, proceeded with deliberation and care in examining all pretensions of this nature, and rejected them when not supported by satisfactory evidence—witness their rejection of the Apocryphal books. They were likewise forewarned that false prophets would arise, and deliver their own fancies, in the name of the Lord, and they were furnished with rules to assist them in distinguishing a true from a pretended revelation. (Deut. xviii. 20—22.) The testimony then of the Jews, who, without a dissenting voice, have asserted the inspiration of the historical books, authorises us to receive them as a part of the oracles of God, which were committed to their care.

The object of the historical books was to communicate instruction to his chosen people, and to mankind in general; and to illustrate the nature of God's providence in small as well as in great occurrences, in particular instances as well as in general appointments; they records the sacred writers occasionally allude as bearing testimony to their accounts; or refer to them for a more minute detail of those particulars which they omit as inconsistent with their designs. See Josh. x. 13. 2 Sam. i. 18, and various other passages.

therefore often descend from the great outline of national concerns to the minute detail of private life. The relations, however, of individual events that are occasionally interspersed, are highly interesting, and admirably develop the designs of the Almighty, and the character of those times to which they are respectively assigned. Those seeming digressions likewise, in which the inspired writers have recorded such remarkable events as related to particular personages, or such occurrences in foreign countries as tended to affect the interest of the Hebrew nation, are not only valuable for the religious spirit which they breathe, but are to be admired as strictly consistent with the sacred plan. Thus the histories of Job, of Ruth, and of Esther, though apparently intrinsic appendages, are in reality connected parts of one entire fabric, and exhibit, in minute delineation, that wisdom which is elsewhere displayed in a larger scale, as they likewise present an engaging picture of that private virtue which, in an extended influence, operated to national prosperity. These books then constitute an important part of the sacred volume, which furnishes a complete code of instructive lessons, conveyed under every form, diversified with every style of composition, and enlivened with every illustration of circumstance.

The writers of the historical books everywhere display an acquaintance with the counsels and designs of God; they develop the secret springs and concealed wisdom of his government, and often reveal his future mercies and judgments in the clearest predictions. They invariably maintain a strict sincerity of intention, and in their description of characters and events they exhibit an unexampled impartiality; and from these considerations we derive another argument, that these historians wrote under the influence of the Holy Spirit.

As to the book of Job, whether it was composed or translated by Moses, or any subsequent prophet, it is evident that it contains a true history, and that Job was a real, not a fictitious personage. The real existence of Job is affirmed by the concurrent testimony of all eastern tradition.—Spanheim's Hist. Job.—Schautter's Com. in Job.—and he is mentioned as a real character by Ezekiel (ch. xiv.) and by St James (ch. v.). The style of the author, his mode of introducing the subject, the circumstantial detail of habitation, kindred and condition, the names of the persons mentioned, and the agreement of these circumstances with other accounts of that age and country in which Job is generally supposed to have lived; furnish evidence that this book contains a history of actual events. It is unquestionably to be considered as an inspired work, since it holds a place in the Jewish canon, and it likewise bears every internal mark of a divine origin. It every where abounds with the noblest sentiments of piety, uttered with the spirit of inspired conviction, and discovers to us religious instruction shining forth amidst the venerable simplicity of ancient manners. It is a work unrivalled for the magnificence of its language, and for the beautiful and sublime images which it presents. In the wonderful speech of the Deity (ch. xxxviii. to xli. inclusive,) every line delineates his attributes, every sentence opens a picture of some grand object in creation, characterized by its most striking features. Add to this that its prophetic parts reflect much light on the economy of God's moral government, and every admirer of sacred antiquity, every inquirer after religious instruction, will seriously rejoice that the enraptured sentence of Job, (ch. xix. 23.) is realized to a more effectual and unforeseen accomplishment; that while the memorable records of antiquity have mouldered from the rock, the prophetic assurance and sentiments of Job are graven in scripture, which no time shall alter, no changes shall efface.—Gray's Key to the Old Testament.—Dick on Inspiration.

The book of Psalms is a collection of hymns, or sacred songs in praise of God, and consists of poems of various kinds. They are the productions of different writers, but are called the Psalms of David, because a great part of them was composed by him, who, for his peculiarly excellent spirit, was distinguished by the title of 'the Psalmist,' (2 Sam. xxiii. 1.). Some of them were perhaps penned before, and some after the time of David. Most modern commentators understand the different writers of them to have been Moses, David, Solomon, Asaph, Heman, Ethan, Jeduthan, and the three sons of Korah. Ezra probably collected these Psalms into one book, and placed them in the order in which they are now found. The Levites, as we learn from Josephus, were enjoined to preserve in the temple all such hymns as might be composed in honour of God, and of these, doubtless, there must have been a large collection from which the 150 Psalms we possess would appear to have been selected; but such only could be admitted into the canon, as were evidently inspired compositions, and we may judge of the scrupulous severity with which they were examined, since the numerous hymns of Solomon were rejected; and even, as it is said, some of David's himself were not considered as entitled to insertion. The divine authority of those, however, which we now possess, is established not only by their rank among the sacred writings, and by the unvaried testimony of every age, but likewise by many intrinsic proofs of inspiration. Not only do they breathe through every part a divine spirit of eloquence, and of the purest and most exalted devotion, but they contain numberless illustrious prophecies that were remarkably accomplished, and that are frequently appealed to by the evangelical writers. But the sacred character of the whole book is most completely established by our Saviour and his apostles, who in various parts of the New Testament appropriate the predictions of the Psalms as obviously apposite to the circumstances of their lives, and as intentionally preconcerted to describe them. In the language of this divine book, the prayers and praises of the church have been offered up to the throne of grace, from age to age, and in this particular there ever has existed, and we may say ever will exist, a wonderful communion of saints. The Psalms may be regarded as an epitome of the Bible, adapted to the purposes of devotion. 'What is there necessary for man to know,' says the pious Hooker, 'which the Psalms are not able to teach? from them we may learn heroic magnanimity, exquisite justice, grave moderation, exact wisdom, repentance unfeigned, unwearied patience, the mysteries of God, the sufferings of Christ, the terrors of divine wrath, the comforts of grace, the works of Providence over this world, and the promised joys of that world which is to come. Let there be any grief or disease incident to the soul of man, any wound or sickness named, for which there is not in this treasure-house a present comfortable remedy at all times ready to be found.' Whether the true believer be in joy or sorrow, in prosperity or adversity, in health or in sickness; whether he be a prince or a peasant, rich or poor, young or old; whether he rejoice in the light of God's countenance, or tremble at his rebuke, he will find some of these exquisite songs of Zion adapted to his circumstances and in harmony with his feelings.

The Proverbs, as we are informed at the beginning and other parts of the book, were written by Solomon, the son of David, a man, as the sacred writings assure us, peculiarly endued with divine wisdom. Whatever ideas of his superior understanding we may be led to form, by the particulars recorded of his judgment and attainments, we shall find them amply justified on perusing the works which he has left behind him. This enlightened monarch, being desirous of employing the wisdom which he had received from God to the advantage of mankind, produced several works for their instruction. (1 Kings iv. 32.) Of these, however, three only were admitted into the canon, the others being rejected as uninspired productions. The book of Proverbs, the book of Ecclesiastes, and that of the Song of Solomon, are all that remain of him whose matchless wisdom called forth the wonder and admiration of surrounding nations. If, however, many valuable writings of Solomon have perished, we may rest assured that the most excellent have been preserved, and that we possess all which the Spirit of God judged to be suitable for our spiritual instruction.

The latter part of the book of Proverbs, from the beginning of the twenty-fifth chapter, is considered to have been collected after the death of Solomon, and added to what would seem to have been more immediately arranged by himself. The Proverbs in the thirtieth chapter are expressly called, The words of Augur the son of Jakeh; and the thirty-first chapter is entitled The words of king Lemuel. It seems certain that the collection called the Proverbs of Solomon, was arranged in the order in which we now have it by different hands; but it is not therefore to be concluded that they are not the productions of Solomon. The general opinion is that several persons made a collection of them, perhaps as they were uttered by him; Hezekiah among others, as mentioned in the twenty-fifth chapter; Augur, Isaiah, and Ezra might have done the same. The claims of the book of Proverbs, however, to be admitted into the sacred canon, has never been questioned. Besides the internal evidence of inspiration which we discover in it, the canonical authority of no other book of the Old Testament is so well ratified by the evidence of quotations in the New Testament. The scope of this book is to instruct men in the deepest mysteries of true wisdom and understanding, the height and perfection of which is the true knowledge of the divine will and the sincere fear of the Lord. To this end, the book is filled with the choicest sententious aphorisms, infinitely surpassing all the ethical sayings of the ancient sages, and comprising in themselves distinct doctrines, duties, &c., of piety towards God, of equity and benevolence towards man, and of sobriety and temperance; together with precepts for the right education of children, and for the relative situations of subjects, magistrates and sovereigns.—

Gray's Key to the Old Testament.—Horne's Introduction, vol. iv.

The book of Ecclesiastes, although it does not bear the name of Solomon, was penned by him, as is evident from several passages. (Comp. ch. i. 12, 16. ii. 4—9. xii. 9, 10.) The beautiful descriptions which this book contains of phenomena in the natural world and their causes, and of the economy of the human frame, all show it to be the work of a philosopher. It is generally supposed to have been written by Solomon in his old age, after he had repented of his sinful practices, and when, having seen and observed much, as well as having enjoyed every thing that he could wish, he was fully convinced of the vanity of every thing except piety towards God. Its canonical authority has always been recognised, and indeed, there can be no doubt of its title to be admitted into the sacred canon. Solomon was eminently distinguished by the illumination of the divine Spirit, and had even twice witnessed the divine presence. (1 Kings iii. 5. ix. 2. xi. 9.) The tendency of the book is excellent, and Solomon speaks in it with great clearness of the revealed truths of a future life and of a future judgment. It may be considered as a kind of inquiry into the chief good or highest happiness of man; an inquiry conducted on sound principles, and terminating in a conclusion which all must approve.—Gray's Key.—Horne's Introduction, vol. iv.—See also Holden's Prelim. Dissert. to Ecclesiastes.

The Song of Solomon is universally allowed to have been written by that monarch. Its divine authority rests upon indubitable evidence, although some rash critics have affirmed it to be merely a human composition. In this book the royal author appears, in the typical spirit of his time, to have designed to render a ceremonial appointment, descriptive of a spiritual concern. Bishop Lowth judiciously considers that the Song is a mystical allegory; of that sort which induces a more sublime sense on historical truths, and which, by the description of human events, shadows out divine circumstances. The sacred writers were by God's condescension authorised to illustrate his strict and intimate relation to the church by the figure of a marriage; and the emblem must have been strikingly becoming and expressive to the conceptions of the Jews, since they annexed notions of peculiar mystery to this appointment, and imagined that the marriage union was a counterpart representation of some original pattern in heaven. It is unquestionable that this beautiful composition had a predictive as well as a figurative character. The whole of it is a thin veil of allegory thrown over a spiritual alliance; and we discover every where through the transparent types of Solomon and his bride, the characters of Christ and his personified church, portrayed with those graces and embellishments which are most lovely and engaging to the human eye. It requires, however, to be explained with great caution and some fanciful expositors, by their minute dissection of the allegory, have exposed it to the unmerited ridicule of profane minds. But the grand outlines, when soberly interpreted, in the obvious meaning of the allegory, will be found to accord with the affections and experience of every sincere Christian, and the tendency of the whole must be to purify the mind and to elevate the affections from earthly to heavenly things.

As to its form, the Song of Solomon may be considered as a dramatic poem of the pastoral kind. For a full and satisfactory proof of the divine authority of Solomon's Song, as well as an elucidation of its scope and design, the reader is referred to Horne's Introduction, vol. iv. part i. ch. iii. sect. v. See also Gray's Key to the Old Testament, Dr Good's Translation of Solomon's Song, and Bishop Lowth's Prelections, where the structure of the Poem is treated of.

It is universally acknowledged that the remaining books of the Old Testament, namely, the sixteen prophetic books and the Lamentations of Jeremiah, were written by the persons whose names they bear. The prophets profess themselves to be the respective authors of these books, and their testimony has been confirmed by the unanimous consent of Jews and Christians. The prophets were raised up by God among the Israelites, as the ministers of these dispensations. They flourished, in a continued succession, for above a thousand years, (reckoning from Moses to Malachi), all co-operating in the same designs, and conspiring in one spirit to deliver the same doctrines, and to prophecy concerning the same future blessings. Moses, the first and greatest of the prophets, having established God's first covenant, those who followed him were employed in explaining its nature, in opening its spiritual meaning; in instructing the Jews, and in gradually preparing them for the reception of that second dispensation which it prefigured. Their pretensions to be considered as God's appointed servants, were demonstrated by the unimpeachable integrity of their characters, by the intrinsic excellence and tendency of their instructions, and by the disinterested zeal and undaunted fortitude with which they persevered in their great designs. Their claims were still farther confirmed by the miraculous proofs which they displayed of divine support, and by the immediate completion of many less important predictions which they uttered. Such were the credentials of their exalted character which the prophets brought forward to their contemporaries; and we, who having lived to witness the appearance of the second dispensation, can look back to the connection which subsisted between the two covenants, have received additional evidence of the inspiration of the prophets, in the attestations of our Saviour and his apostles; and in the retrospect of a gradually maturing scheme of prophecy, connected in all its parts, and ratified in the accomplishment of its great object—the advent of the Messiah. We have still farther incontrovertible proof of the inspiration of the prophetic books, from the exact accomplishment, in these latter days, of numerous predictions contained in them. History bears indubitable testimony to the accurate fulfilment of many of these predictions; others are gradually receiving their accomplishment in the times in which we live, and afford the surest pledge and most positive security for the completion of those which remain to be fulfilled. The past, the present, and the future, have a connected reference to one great plan which infinite wisdom, prescience, and power, could alone form, reveal, and execute. Every succeeding age throws an increasing light upon these sacred writings, and contributes additional evidence to their divine origin.—Bp. Tomline's Flem. of Christ. Theol. part i. ch. i.—Gray's Key.—See Newton and Keith on the Prophecies.

There is an uncontradicted tradition in the Jewish church, that about fifty years after the temple was rebuilt, Ezra in conjunction with the great synagogue, made a collection of the sacred writings, which had been increased since the Jews were carried into captivity, by the Lamentations of Jeremiah and the prophecies of Ezekiel, Daniel, Haggai, and Zechariah; and as Ezra was himself inspired, we may rest assured, that whatever received his sanction, was authentic.* To this genuine collection, which according to former custom was placed in the temple, were afterwards annexed the sacred compositions of Ezra himself, as well as those of Nehemiah and Malachi, which were written after the death of Ezra. This addition, which was probably made by Simon the Just, the last of the great synagogue, completed the canon of the Old Testament; for after Malachi, no prophet arose till the time of John the Baptist, who as it were connected the two covenants. This complete collection, or a correct copy taken from it, remained in the temple, as Josephus informs us, till Jerusalem was taken by Titus, and it was then carried in triumph to Rome, and laid up with the purple veil in the royal palace of Vespasian.

Thus while the Jewish polity continued, and nearly 500 years after the death of Ezra, a complete and faultless copy of the Hebrew canon was kept in the temple at Jerusalem, with which all others might be compared. (See Joseph. Antiq. Jud. b. iii. c. i. and b. v. c. i. Compare Deut. xxxi. 26. 2 Kings xxii. 8.) And it ought to be observed, that although Christ frequently reprov'd the rulers and teachers of the Jews for their erroneous and false doctrines, yet he never accused them of any corruption in their written law, or other sacred books; and St Paul reckons among the privileges of the Jews that unto them were committed the oracles of God, (Rom. iii. 2.) without insinuating that they had been unfaithful to their trust. After the final destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, there was no established standard copy of the Hebrew Scriptures; but from that time the dispersion of the Jews into all countries, and the numerous converts to Christianity, became a double security for the preservation of a volume held equally sacred by Jews and Christians, and to which both constantly referred as to the written word of God. They differed in the interpretation of these Scriptures, but never disputed the validity of the text in any material point.

But though designed corruption was utterly impracticable, and was indeed never suspected, yet the carelessness and inadvertence of transcribers, during a long series of years, would unavoidably introduce some errors and mistakes. Great pains have been taken by learned men, especially by Kennicot and De Rossi, to compare the existing manuscripts of the Hebrew Bible, and the result has been satisfactory in the highest degree.

Many various readings of a trivial kind have been discovered, but scarcely any of real consequence. These differences are indeed of so little moment, that it is sometimes absurdly objected to the laborious work of Kennicot, which contains the collations of nearly 700 manuscripts, that it does not enable us to correct a single important passage in the Old Testament; whereas this very circumstance implies, that we have, in fact, derived from that excellent undertaking the greatest advantage which could have been wished for by every friend of revealed religion; namely, the certain knowledge of the agreement of the copies of the Old Testament scriptures, now extant in their original language, with each other, and with our Bibles. This point thus clearly established, is still farther confirmed by the general coincidence of the present Hebrew copies with all the early translations of the Bible, and particularly with the Septuagint version, the earliest of them all, and which was made 270 years before Christ. There is also a perfect agreement between the Samaritan and Hebrew Pentateuchs, except in one or two manifest interpolations, which were noticed immediately by the Jewish writers, (see Prideaux, part i. b. 6.) and this is no small proof of the correctness of both, as we may rest assured that the Jews and Samaritans, on account of their rooted enmity to each other, would never have concurred in any alteration. Nor ought it to be omitted, that the Chaldean paraphrases, which are translations of the Old Testament, from the Hebrew into Chaldaic, made for the benefit of those who had forgotten, or were ignorant of the Hebrew after the captivity, (vide Nehem. viii. 8.) are found to accord entirely with our Hebrew Bibles. To these facts we may add, that the reverence of the Jews for their sacred writings is another guarantee for their integrity; so great indeed was that reverence, that, according to the statements of Philo and Josephus, they would suffer any torments, and even death itself, rather than change a single point or iota of the scriptures.

The books of the Old Testament have been always allowed in every age, and by every sect of the Hebrew church, to be the genuine works of those persons to whom they are usually ascribed; and they have also been universally and exclusively, without addition or exception, considered by the Jews as written under the immediate influence of the Divine Spirit. Those who were contemporaries with the respective writers of these books, had the clearest evidence that they acted and spoke by the authority of God himself; and this testimony, transmitted to all succeeding ages, was in many cases strengthened and confirmed by the gradual fulfilment of predictions contained in their writings. (See Joseph. Cont. Apion, b. i. sect. 8.) The Jews of the present day, dispersed all over the world, demonstrate the sincerity of their belief in the authenticity and divine authority of the Hebrew scriptures, by their inflexible adherence to the law. By the anxious expectation with which they wait for the accomplishment of the prophecies, though they have sadly mistaken the meaning of these prophecies, and by the scrupulous care with which they preserve their copies of the Old Testament scriptures, and guard against corruptions in the text. It is a great argument for the truth of the scriptures, that they have stood the test, and received the approbation of so many ages, and still retain their authority, though infidels, in all ages, have endeavoured, by every means in their power, to disprove them; and it is a still farther evidence in behalf of these sacred records, that God has been pleased to show so remarkable a providence in their preservation. But the most decisive proof of the authenticity and inspiration of the ancient scriptures, is derived from the New Testament. Upon many occasions, our Saviour referred to the Old Testament scriptures collectively, as of divine authority, and both he and his apostles constantly endeavoured to prove that Jesus was the Messiah foretold in the writings of the prophets. Christ tells his disciples that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning him, (Luke xxiv. 44.) and by thus adopting the common division of the law, the prophets and the Psalms, which comprehended all the Hebrew scriptures, our Lord ratified the canon of the Old Testament, as it was received by the Jews; and by declaring that those books contained prophecies which must be fulfilled, he established their divine inspiration, since God alone can enable men to foretell future events. (See also Mark vii. 13.) Both St Paul and St Peter bear strong testimony to the divine authority of the Jewish scriptures, in their collective capacity. (See in particular, 2 Tim. iii. 15. 2 Pet. i. 21.) Besides, there is scarcely a book in the Old Testament which is not repeatedly quoted in the New, as of divine authority.—Bp. Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theol. part i. ch. i. The quotations from the Old Testament in the New, are largely treated of in Horne's Introd. to the Bible, vol. ii. part i. ch. iv.

Such is a brief outline of the principal arguments in proof of the genuineness, authenticity, and inspiration of the Old Testament scriptures. Had our limits permitted, we might have advanced many other arguments of the most convincing nature. We might have pointed out the admirable harmony, and intimate connection which subsist between all the parts of scripture, the excellence of the doctrines and moral precepts which they deliver, their tendency to promote the present and eternal happiness of mankind, and their wonderful adaptation to the circumstances and necessities of our fallen race—these and many other particulars we might have urged as strong evidences of the authenticity and inspiration of scripture. Enough, however, has been stated to satisfy every candid and unprejudiced inquirer, that the Old Testament scriptures are the word of God,* and that those holy men of God who first delivered these writings to the world, spake and wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. Besides, many points which we here omitted, or slightly touched upon, will be discussed at length in the body of the work.—See Author's Preface.

Upon the whole, we conclude, that we have such a number of evidences of the divine authority of the Old Testament, as no man can resist, who duly and impartially considers them; and as to those who refuse to be convinced by these evidences—who reject the testimony of Moses and the prophets, it may be truly asserted of them, that neither would they be persuaded though one rose from the dead.

When the gospel was established throughout the Roman empire, and when churches were planted in every nation, the scriptures of the Old and New Testaments were gradually translated into the vernacular tongue of every country in which they were received. This we learn from a variety of testimonies; but the following passage from Theodoret, who lived in the beginning of the fifth century, may be considered as alone decisive, 'We Christians are enabled to show the powers of apostolic and prophetic doctrines, which have filled all countries under heaven; for that which was formerly uttered in Hebrew, is not only translated into the language of the Greeks, but also of the Romans, the Indians, Persians, Armenians, Scythians, Samaritans, Egyptians, and, in a word, into all the languages that are used by any nation.—Theodor. ad Græc. In fid. Serm. 5. The sacred writings being the foundation of the Christian religion, upon which they built the whole system of their morality and doctrine, and which the Christians were obliged to read both in public and private, the several churches of the world could not be long without such translations as might be understood by every individual. It is impossible to ascertain the exact time at which Christianity was introduced into this island, nor do we know how soon there was a translation of the scriptures into the language of its inhabitants. The earliest of which we have any account is a translation of the Psalms into the Saxon tongue by Adhelm, the first bishop of Sherborne, about the year 706. Egbert bishop of Landisfern, who died in the year 721, made a Saxon version of the four gospels, and not long after Bede translated the whole Bible into that language. There were other Saxon versions of the whole or parts of the Bible of a later date; and it appears indeed, that new translations were made from time to time, as the language of the country varied; but when the Roman pontiffs had established their spiritual tyranny in this as well as in other countries of Europe, they forbade the reading of these translations; and in the 14th century, the common people had been so long deprived of the use of the scriptures, that the latest of the translations had become unintelligible. Wickliff, therefore, who was a strenuous opposer of the corruptions and usurpations of the church of Rome, and from whom we are to date the dawn of the Reformation in this kingdom, between 1360 and 1380 published a translation of the whole Bible in the English language, then spoken, but not being sufficiently acquainted with the Hebrew and Greek languages, he made his translation from the Latin Bibles, which were at that time read in the churches.—Bp. Tomline's Christ. Theol.—Gray's Key.—Lewis' Hist. of Translat. of the Bible.

Tyndale was the first who undertook to translate the scriptures into English at the reformation. He published the New Testament at Antwerp in 1526, and the Dutch reprinted three editions of it, with some alterations by George Jaye, an English refugee, in 1527, 1528, 1530. Tyndale printed a second edition in 1534, and having translated the Pentateuch and the historical books as far as Nehemiah, they were printed at Halle, 1552, 1553. Coverdale at home laboured to complete what Tyndale had begun, and in the year 1535 the whole Bible was finished at the press. In 1547 another edition was published abroad, with some few corrections, under the feigned name of Matthewe. In 1540 archbishop Cramer published a new edition, which he had corrected in some places, and to which he wrote a preface. This is called Cramer's Bible. In 1553 Edward the sixth died, and was succeeded by Mary, who immediately restored the popish service and sacraments, and persecuted the friends of the reformation with such cruelty that many of them fled into foreign countries, among whom was Coverdale, who, in Edward's reign, had been made bishop of Exeter. He and some others fixed their residence at Geneva, where they employed themselves in making a translation of the Bible. They began with the New Testament, which they published in duodecimo, printed with a small but beautiful letter, in 1557. This is the first printed edition of the New Testament in which the verses of the chapters are distinguished by numeral figures and breaks.

Strype, in the Annals of the Reformation, tells us, that the Geneva brethren, after publishing their New Testament, proceeded to revise the Old. But not having finished it when Elizabeth came to the throne, some of them staid behind the rest to complete their design. And having finished the Old Testament, they published the whole Bible at Geneva, in quarto, in the year 1560, printed by Rowland Hill. This is what is commonly called the Geneva Bible. The Geneva Bible was so universally used in private families, that there were above thirty editions of it, in folio, quarto, and octavo, printed from the year 1560 to the year 1616.

Queen Mary dying in November, 1558, was succeeded by Elizabeth, who, treading in the steps of her brother Edward VI. suppressed the Romish superstition in all her dominions, and filled the sees with Protestants. After this, archbishop Matthew Parker, having represented to the queen that many churches either were without Bibles, or had incorrect copies, she resolved that a revisal and correction of the former translation should be made, in order to publication. The archbishop therefore appointed some of the most learned of the bishops and others to revise the Bible commonly used, and to compare it with the originals; and to each of them he assigned a particular book of scripture, with directions not to vary from the former translation except where it was not agreeable to the original, and to add marginal notes for explaining the difficult texts, reserving to himself the oversight of the whole. A revisal of the English Bible on the same plan had been proposed by Cramer, but it was never undertaken. Parker was more successful in his attempt. The persons employed by Parker performed their tasks with such cheerfulness, that the whole was ready for the press some time before the year 1568: for in that year the Bible of the bishops' revisal was printed in a very elegant manner, with a beautiful English letter, on a royal paper, in a large folio, by Richard Jugge, the queen's printer. This Bible, on account of the correction which the bishops made, was called the Bishops' Bible, and was authorized to be read in the churches.

In the year 1604, king James appointed a number of learned men to revise and correct the Bishops' Bible. From the injunctions or rules given respecting this work, it is clear that the learned men employed were not left to follow their own unbiassed judgment. The chief of these were, first, the ordinary Bible read in the churches, commonly called the Bishops' Bible, to be followed and as little altered as the original would permit. Third, the old ecclesiastical words to be kept: as the word church not to be translated congregation, &c. Fifth, the division of the chapters to be altered either not at all or as little as might be. Sixth: no marginal notes to be affixed, but only for explaining the Hebrew and the Greek words, which could not be expressed in the text without some circumlocution. Fourteenth; the translation of Tyndale, Coverdale, Matthewe, Whitechurch, (the great Bible,) and Geneva, to be used where they agreed better with the original than the Bishops' Bible.

From this statement it is clear that the authorized version was only revised by the persons employed by James; but as this revision was made by some of the most learned men of that period, it is probable that it contains as faithful a representation of the original scriptures as could then be made. But when we consider, says Dr Marsh, the immense accession which has been since made, both to our critical and to our philological apparatus; when we consider that the whole class of literature, commencing with the London Polyglott and continued to Griesbach's Testament, was collected subsequently to that period; when we consider that the most important sources of intelligence for the interpretation of the original were likewise opened after that period, we cannot possibly pretend that our authorized version does not require amendment.—Boothroyd's Introd. to his Bible, part i. c. iii. 8vo ed. 1836.

Whenever therefore it shall be judged expedient by well advised and considerate measures to authorize a revisal of our present version, it will certainly be found capable of many and great improvements; but this is a work not likely to be taken in hand, and certainly no single person is competent to the task. It should be the production of collective industry and general contribution; and the prejudices and mistakes which must characterize the works of individuals, should be corrected by united inquiry, dispassionate examination, and fair criticism. We do not mean to disparage the labours of those individuals who have already given new translations of the Bible in whole or in part;* they are entitled to the public gratitude and encouragement, and their endeavours must contribute to illustrate the sacred pages, and tend to facilitate the great work of a national translation. Till, however, the execution of this work shall be judged expedient, every sincere and well disposed Christian, who makes the holy oracles his chief study and delight, may rest satisfied with the present translation, which is indeed highly excellent, being in its doctrines uncorrupt, and in its general construction faithful to the original. In any attempt at a new translation of the Scriptures, it should be one great aim to depart as little as possible from the present version, which has been familiarised by long use, and endeared by habitual reverence, of which the style has long served as a standard of our language, and of which the peculiar harmony and excellence could never be improved by any change which refinement might substitute.—Gray's Key.

The books of the Old Testament are divided into chapters and verses, to facilitate reference, and primarily with a view to any natural division of the multifarious subjects which they embrace: but by whom these divisions were originally made is a question, concerning which there exists a considerable difference of opinion. That they are comparatively a modern invention is evident from its being utterly unknown to the ancient Christians, whose Greek Bibles, indeed, then had Τίτλοι and Κεφαλαία (Titles and Heads); but the intent of these was rather to point out the sum or contents of the text, than to divide the various books. They also differed greatly from the present chapters, many of them containing only a few verses, and some of them not more than one. The invention of chapters has by some been ascribed to Laufranc, who was archbishop of Canterbury in the reigns of William the Conqueror and William II.; while others attribute it to Stephen Langton, who was archbishop of the same see in the reigns of John and Henry III. But the real author of this very useful division was cardinal Hugo de Sancto Caro, who flourished about the middle of the thirteenth century, and wrote a celebrated commentary on the Scriptures. Having projected a concordance to the Latin Vulgate version, by which any passage might be found, he divided both the Old and New Testaments into chapters, which are the same we now have: these chapters he subdivided into smaller portions, which he distinguished by the letters A, B, C, D, E, F, and G, which are placed in the margin at equal distances from each other, according to the length of the chapters. The facility of reference thus afforded by Hugo's divisions, having become known to Rabbi Mordecai Nathan, (or Isaac Nathan, as he is sometimes called,) a celebrated Jewish teacher in the fifteenth century, he undertook a similar concordance for the Hebrew Scriptures; but instead of adopting the marginal letters of Hugo, he marked every fifth verse with a Hebrew numeral, thus, 8 1, 7 5, &c., retaining, however, the cardinal's divisions into chapters. This concordance of Rabbi Nathan was commenced A.D. 1438, and finished in 1445. The introduction of verses into the Hebrew Bible was made by Athias, a Jew of Amsterdam, in his celebrated edition of the Hebrew Bible, printed in 1661, and reprinted in 1667. He marked every verse with the figures in common use, except those which had been previously marked by Nathan with Hebrew letters, in the manner in which they at present appear in Hebrew Bibles. By rejecting these Hebrew numerals, and substituting for them the corresponding figures, all the copies of the Bible in other languages have since been marked. As, however, the modern divisions and sub-divisions are not always made with the strictest regard to the connexion of parts, it is greatly to be wished that all future editions of the scriptures might be printed after the judicious manner adopted by Mr Reeves in his equally beautiful and correct editions of the entire Bible: in which the numbers of the verses and chapters are thrown into the margin, and the metrical parts of scripture are distinguished from the rest by being printed in verses in the usual manner.—Horn's Introd. vol. ii. part i. p. 69, 70; 7th ed.

* Of the modern translations of the whole Bible, that of Dr Boothroyd is undoubtedly the best, and may be considered as a valuable help to the critical understanding of the holy Scriptures. The following translations of parts of Scripture by different individuals are held in high estimation, namely, The book of Job, by Dr Good, the Proverbs by Mr G. Holden, Isaiah by Lowth, Jeremiah by Dr Blayney, Ezekiel by Newcome, Daniel by Wintli, Hosea by Horsely, the Minor Prophets by Newcome, the Gospels by Campbell, and the Epistles by Macknight.

When we consider the utility, excellence, and perfection of the holy scriptures, both of the Old and New Testaments, since they are not merely the best guide we can consult, but the only one that can make us wise unto salvation, we must be convinced that it is the indispensable duty of all, carefully and constantly to peruse these sacred oracles, that through them they may be thoroughly furnished to every good work. This, indeed, is not only agreeable to the divine command, and to the design of the scriptures, but is further commanded to us by the gracious promise made by Him who cannot lie, to all true believers, that they shall all be taught of God. What time is to be appropriated for this purpose, must ever depend upon the circumstances of the individual. It is obvious, that some time ought daily to be devoted to this important study, and that it should be undertaken with devout simplicity and humility; prosecuted with diligence and attention; accompanied by prayer for the divine aid and teaching; together with a sincere desire to know and perform the will of God, and, laying aside all prejudice, to embrace all truths which are plainly delivered there, and to follow the scriptures wherever conviction may lead our minds. For it is indubitable, that those who are anxiously desirous of the knowledge of divine truth, will be assisted by the Spirit of God, in searching out the meaning of scripture, particularly in such subjects as have an especial reference to faith and religious practice. In order, however, to study the scriptures aright, it should be recollected that they are not to be contemplated as one entire book or treatise. The knowledge of divine truth, is, indeed, perfectly distinct from human science, in that it emanates immediately from the fountain of Infinite Wisdom. Yet has it this in common with human science, that it is made by its heavenly author to flow through the channel of human instruction. While, therefore, we receive it not as the word of men, but as it is in truth the word of God, we must, nevertheless, examine it as it is delivered to us, clothed in the language of men, and subject to the general rules of human composition. The deference due to it as a divine production, does not interfere with this province of human learning; it only exacts submission with respect to the subject matter of the revelation, to which the critical investigation is entirely subordinate.

But besides the paramount importance of the contents of the holy scriptures, a farther motive to the diligent study of them, presents itself in the facilities that are offered to us for this purpose, by the numerous publications which have for their object the criticism, interpretation, and elucidation of the sacred volume. In fact, a willingness to know and to do the will of God, implies a willingness to resort to all necessary helps for advancement in the truth, and for security against error. The value of such helps was never questioned except by those who chose to despise what they did not possess. Only, it must ever be borne in mind, that although these auxiliaries are valuable for guiding us to a knowledge of the sense and literal meaning of scripture, they can never stand in the place of the divine teaching, which is the work of the Holy Spirit alone, and that without this teaching, the knowledge which they impart can be of no real or permanent value: 'For,' says the apostle, 'though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge, and have not charity, or Christian love, it is nothing.'—(1 Cor. xiii. 2).—Jannmildert's Bampton Lectures.—Horne's Introd. vol. i.

The books of scripture, as every one must perceive, are not arranged in our Bibles according to the order of time in which the events that they relate happened, but rather according to the nature of the subjects. This arrangement is not peculiar to the English version, but is adopted in most copies of the scriptures. The collocation of the books of scripture, however, is not to be regarded as of canonical authority, for we find a different arrangement in the Hebrew, Greek, Syriac, and Latin versions. Neither have the sacred historians always related events according to the order of time; some are introduced by anticipations, and others again are placed first, which should be last.

From these circumstances, seeming contradictions have arisen, which have been eagerly seized by the adversaries of revealed religion, in order to perplex the minds and shake the faith of those who are not able to cope with their sophistries. Hence the utility of such a work as Stackhouse's History of the Bible, which gives, in plain and perspicuous language, a connected narrative of bible history, according to chronological order; and which likewise, in a series of notes and dissertations, explains difficulties as they occur; reconciles apparent contradictions, and refutes the objections which infidels have brought against various parts of scripture. Any one who peruses this work with attention, will be convinced of its importance, and of the valuable aid which it affords in elucidating scripture history.—See the Author's Preface.

Hence also chronology, or the science of computing and adjusting periods of time, is of great importance towards understanding the historical parts of scripture, as it shows the order and connection of the events therein recorded. It also enables us to ascertain the accomplishment of many of the prophecies, and sometimes leads to the discovery and correction of mistakes in numbers and dates which have crept into particular texts. Considerable differences exist in the chronology of the Hebrew scriptures, the Samaritan Pentateuch, the Septuagint version, and Josephus, with regard to those periods, which extend from the creation to the deluge, and from thence to the calling of Abraham. These differences have led to different chronological systems, according as their authors have adhered to one or other of these authorities, or selected from them all.—(See this History, b. i. sect. v. ch. iii.) The chronology which is adopted in our Bibles, is that of the Hebrew scriptures, and is followed by Stackhouse. But of the authenticity of this system doubts are entertained by the best scripture critics, and Dr Hales, in his profound and elaborate work on chronology, has, we think, satisfactorily proved that the present system of Hebrew chronology is an adulteration, planned and executed by the Masorites,* in the fourth century, and that the chronology of Josephus, when rectified by a comparison with the Septuagint, and the other texts, is that which ought to be adopted. This system, which Dr Hales has established with great success, is unquestionably to be preferred to that in our Bibles, as it removes many of the difficulties with which scripture history is encumbered, when we follow the common system. Accordingly, in this edition of Stackhouse's history, the chronology of Dr Hales has been introduced, as far as could be done, consistently with the author's plan.

Ancient profane history, when studied in connection with the history of the Israelites, is of very great importance to the elucidation of scripture. The Jews were connected either in a hostile or pacific manner with the Moabites, Ammonites, Philistines, Egyptians, Assyrians, Medes, Babylonians, Persians, Arabians, Greeks, Romans, and other ancient nations, and hence a knowledge of the history of the nations is necessary for illustrating many passages of scripture, in which allusion is made to them. In the books of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, we likewise find many predictions relative to the heathen nations, which would be utterly unintelligible without the aid of profane history. The present work will be found valuable in this respect, as it gives, along with the sacred narrative, a connected view of profane history. The other works on the connection of sacred and profane history, most worthy of notice, are those of Shuckford, Prideaux, Russel, and Jahn.

A knowledge of the peculiar rites, manners, and customs of the Jews, and other nations that are either alluded to, or mentioned in the scriptures, is indispensably necessary to the right understanding of the sacred volume. There are many things recorded both in the Old and New Testament, which must appear to Europeans either obscure, unintelligible, repulsive, or absurd, unless, forgetting our own peculiar habits and modes of thinking, we transport ourselves, in a manner, to the East, and diligently study the customs, whether political, sacred, or civil, which obtained there. The first, and most important source to which we must betake ourselves for this purpose, is undoubtedly the Old and New Testaments themselves, the careful collation of which, will enable us to collect much information with regard to the customs and modes of living which obtained among the ancient Jews. The next sources of information are the apocryphal books, the writings of Philo, Josephus, the Talmudists, and the ancient history of eastern nations. Finally, if to these sources we add an acquaintance with the customs and manners which prevail in the east at the present day, as they are related by travellers of approved character, we shall have a sure and easy access to the knowledge of scripture antiquities; for as the Orientals, from their tenacious adherence to old usages, are not likely to differ materially from their ancestors, we have no great reason to be apprehensive, from comparing the manners, &c. of the modern Syrians, Arabs, and other nations of the East, with those of the Hebrews, that we should attribute customs to them which never obtained among them. The interpretation of the Bible, therefore, is not a little facilitated by the perusal of the voyages and travels of those who have explored the East. In this department of sacred literature, the compilations of Hamner, Burder, Paxton, and Horne, are particularly distinguished.

The knowledge of ancient geography, especially that of Palestine, and the neighbouring countries, tends, as is universally confessed, to illustrate almost innumerable passages of scripture. The principal English works on this subject are those of Wells, Mansford, Rosenmüller, (lately translated into English), Calmet's Dictionary by Taylor, Paxton and Horne. A pretty extensive Scripture Gazetteer is now in the course of publication by the Edinburgh Printing Company.

A knowledge of natural history enables us to explain

many otherwise obscure passages of scripture. Thus frequent mention is made in scripture of animals, trees, plants, and precious stones; sometimes sentiments are expressed, either in allusion to, or by metaphors taken from some fact in natural history; and sometimes characters are described in allusion to natural objects, and without the knowledge of these we cannot perceive the nature of the characters intended. The natural history of the Bible is expressly treated of by Paxton, Harris, Carpenter, Horne, and the Editor of Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible.

There is one branch of natural history which requires to be noticed here on account of the important bearing which it is made to have, at the present day, on the Mosaic history of the creation, we mean geology. It is strenuously maintained by geologists, that, without the aid of this science, as it is now improved by recent researches and discoveries, the first chapter of Genesis cannot be properly explained, nor the true origin of the earth understood. It therefore becomes necessary, for the biblical student to make himself acquainted with the leading facts of modern geology, in order that he may be able to judge whether or not these lofty claims are well founded. The intelligent curiosity of many, in every country of Europe, has been for some time, and still continues to be directed to a minute examination of the mineralogical contents and geological structure of our globe, and with the most encouraging success. Surprising discoveries have been made within the last fifty or sixty years, the remains of numerous plants and animals of a wonderful structure and size, have been found imbedded in the strata of the earth at a great depth, and many important facts relative to the present surface of the earth, and to the rocks and agencies immediately below it, have been disclosed. From an examination of the structure and size of these fossil remains, both of plants and animals, aided by a knowledge of comparative anatomy, and of the animal and vegetable kingdoms, geologists have come to the conclusion that a large proportion of them belong to species which now no where exist either on the earth or in the ocean, and that it is only in the superficial strata of the earth that the remains of plants and animals now existing are deposited. From a regular order in the superposition of the strata, recurring at distant intervals, and accompanied by a corresponding regularity in the order of succession of many extinct races of animals and vegetables, and various other facts, geologists farther conclude, that several destructions and subsequent new creations of animals and plants have taken place all over the surface of our globe since its original production out of nothing; that is, whole groups have been at once swept from existence by some powerful catastrophe, and their places supplied by other races called into existence by the creative fiat of the Almighty. They also infer, from the thickness of the strata containing the remains of extinct species, which amounts to many miles, that immense periods of time were necessary to bring about these changes, and hence that the materials of which the globe is composed, existed through many ages; 600,000 years according to some, prior to the era of man's creation; for that man was not witness to any of these changes, they consider evident from the fact that no human remains have hitherto been discovered along with those of extinct animals and vegetables, or lower down than the loose sand and gravel that cover the surface of the earth. This fact, however, has been disputed.—See Turner's Sacred History, vol. i. letter xviii. note 53.—Buckland's Bridgewater Treatise, vol. i. p. 103. Geologists also contend that none of the fossiliferous strata can be attributed to the deluge recorded in scripture, because it is apparent, from their structure and thickness, that they must have been deposited by some watery mass remaining over them in a state of tranquillity for a vastly longer period than the duration of Noah's flood; the traces of this latter catastrophe being to be sought for near the surface of the earth. For the evidences which geology furnishes in proof of the reality of the Mosaic deluge, see b. i. sect. vi. ch. iii. of this history.

As these conclusions seem to contradict the history of the creation in the first chapter of Genesis, as it has been interpreted by the generality of Christians in every age, geologists have proposed various hypotheses with the view of reconciling their opinions with the statements of the Mosaic record. We can only find room to mention two of these that have met with the greatest support.

Several eminent geologists have supposed, that the days of the Mosaic creation do not imply the same length of time which is now occupied by a single revolution of the globe, but successive periods, each of great extent, during which the different strata with their organic remains were deposited. In confirmation of this hypothesis, it has been asserted that the order of succession of the organic remains of a former world, accorded with the order of creation as related by Moses. As, however, more recent discoveries have shown that this order does not hold in many cases, and as such an interpretation of the word day contradicts the express declarations of scripture, particularly that contained in the fourth commandment, this hypothesis is now abandoned by most geologists, and even by some who were its chief supporters.—See Buckland's Bridg. Treat. vol. i. pp. 17, 597. The prevailing hypothesis now is, that the word beginning, as applied by Moses in Genesis i. 1. expresses an undefined period of time which was antecedent to the last great change that affected the surface of the earth, and to the creation of its present animal and vegetable inhabitants; during which period a long series of operations and revolutions have been going on; which, as they are wholly unconnected with the history of the human race, are passed over in silence by the sacred historian, whose only concern with them was barely to state that the matter of the universe is not eternal and self-existent, but was originally created by the power of the Almighty. For a detail of the various arguments in support of this hypothesis, we must refer the reader to Buckland's work, already quoted (vol. i. ch. ii.), and although it may be considered less objectionable than the former, yet it is not free from difficulties, as the more candid geologists allow. See Prof. Hitchcock's Tract on the connection between geology and the Mosaic account of the creation.—Student's Cab. Lib. No. xix. We cannot help thinking that geologists have been too premature in drawing their conclusions, and framing theories with respect to the origin of the earth. They should bear in mind that speculations upon these points, where the subject matter is confessedly so mysterious, ought always to be indulged in with extreme caution, as being liable to the exaggerations and false conclusions of an excited imagination. The science of geology is but of recent origin, and although its progress has been wonderfully rapid, will any one venture to affirm that it has already arrived at full maturity, or that future researches may not greatly modify, or even overturn many of the present opinions? Great stress has been laid upon the alleged fact, that no fossilized human remains have been discovered in juxtaposition with those of extinct animals and vegetables; but this, although it may be true with regard to the continents of Europe and America, which alone have been partially examined, does not establish the conclusion intended; namely, that these animal and vegetable remains must be referred to a period much more remote than the creation of man; for it is highly probable that our race did not exist out of Asia until some time after the deluge. It is possible that fossilized human remains may be found in those parts of Asia inhabited by the antediluvians, and therefore geologists ought at least to have explored the Armenian, Babylonian, and Mesopotamian regions before they made their decision. Let it be granted that the first verse of the book of Genesis may bear the construction put upon it by geologists, which is by no means certain, still it seems inconsistent with the ideas which the Bible leads us to form respecting the wisdom of the Creator, to suppose that the earth which we inhabit was, during thousands of ages, utterly abandoned to reptiles, lizards, and hideous monsters, and all this to serve no beneficial purpose which we can perceive. Can it be that such loathsome and contemptible existences as these, were for myriads of ages the lords of the creation, instead of the image of the living God.—See Prof. Stuart's Tract on the Modern Doctrines of Geology—Stud. Cab. Lib.

The remarks of an enlightened philosopher of the present day, on these subjects, are so judicious and excellent, that we have great pleasure in giving them a place here. 'Although it is true that many of the geological phenomena have been represented by these observers, and others, to indicate that our earth has had a much longer duration than the strictest import of the terms used by Moses can allow, and especially in the succession of its organized races, yet, after the most patient comparison and consideration of their facts and reasonings, I cannot but feel that they have not at all advanced beyond plausible conjectures, as I also perceive that they are mostly at variance with each other; and that as fast as one theory of this sort is set up, it has been found to be wrong by a succeeding inquirer, who attempts, in his turn, to establish a different one, of the same tendency, in its stead. These are all fair exertions of ingenuity, and arise from a desire to let no fallacy stand, and from a love of exploring what has baffled anterior research; but these circumstances prove that none of these theories are true,—that the right theory has not yet been discovered,—that erroneous deductions have been made from the phenomena which have been seen,—and that these are not yet justly understood, nor their real bearings discerned. Hence, I continue in the belief, that whatever is true in fact and correct in inference on this subject, will be in the end found to be not inconsistent with the account of Moses, nor with the common meaning of the expressions he uses. In studying the scriptures, it is peculiarly desirable that we should, on no occasion, depart any more from the usual and natural meaning of the words and phrases which there occur, than we do in reading any other author. They have been greatly disfigured by the forced construction which most men seek to put upon them; and much dissatisfaction has by this conduct been excited in the intelligent mind. The true construction of every part must be, not the possibilities of meaning which refining ingenuity may draw from the expression, but that sense and purport which the author himself, in penning them, intended that they should express. His personal meaning at the time, and not the import which our verbal criticism can now extract, should be the great object of our attention. And therefore it appears to me to be most probable, that whenever the right theory on the fabrication of our earth, and on the era and succession of its organized beings, shall be discovered, it will be found to be compatible with the Mosaic cosmogony, in its most natural signification. But until this desirable event arrives, there will be as much incongruity between this ancient account and our modern speculations, as there cannot but be between the devious excursions of an active imagination, and the simple and solid, but unattractive reality. Our German contemporaries, in some of their reveries on ancient history, are equally alert to prove that novelty of fancy is more sought for by many than justness of thought,—that it is easier to argue than to judge,—and that even truth becomes weariness when it ceases to be original, and has lost the impression of its beauty by its habitual familiarity. It is quite true that Moses did not profess to be a geologist, and had no business to be so. His object was, not to teach natural science, but to inculcate the existence, the laws, the will, and the worship of God; and to found the polity and social manners and institutions of his countrymen, on this only true foundation of national prosperity and of individual happiness. But as he was the chosen organ of divine truth to man, on his moral and religious duties, it is most probable that what he expresses on other subjects, in those compositions which were to be the permanent guides of the opinions and conduct of his nation, will be also what is true and proper. It is most consistent with all that we know of intelligent agency, to suppose that he who was instructed or guided to be the lawgiver and sacred preceptor of his people, would be likewise so informed, or influenced, as to avoid falsehood on every collateral subject which it would be in the course of his narration to notice. If we were directing or assisting any pupil to write on any topic, we should certainly not suffer him to insert any thing that we knew to be a fiction or a fallacy. It is therefore most rational to suppose that the same precaution was used by the Deity towards his selected messenger. Hence, I am induced to believe that what Moses expresses incidentally on other points besides those of his divine legislation, is substantially true, and will be found to be so, as soon as his judges or readers have acquired competent knowledge. It is our deficiency in this which hurries us to discredit, or to doubt, or oppose him. But on no collateral point, additional to his main subject, was he more likely to have been correct, either from true human traditions of preceding knowledge, or communications, or from new supplementary aid, so far as that was needed, than in his notices of the divine creation. This was indeed the true basis of his mission and tuition; and it is brought prominently forward at once to our view, as if it were meant to be so. His brief intimations are, therefore, most probably the best outlines of all true geology; and thus far we may affirm, that the more our materials of judgment are increased by the multiplying labours of our geological students, the less founded any opposing speculations appear to become. It is now thirty-five years since my attention was first directed to these considerations. It was then the fashion for science and for a large part of the educated and inquisitive world, to rush into a disbelief of all written revelation; and several geological speculations were directed against it. But I have lived to see the most hostile of these destroyed by their as hostile successors; and to observe that nothing which was of this character, however plausible at the moment of its appearance, has had any duration in human estimation, not even among the sceptical. Augmented knowledge has, from time to time, overthrown the erroneous reasonings with which the Mosaic account has been repeatedly assailed; and has actually brought to light more facts in its favour, than at this late period of the earth could have been expected to occur. Those which are of this description are enlarging in number every year; and therefore my belief is, that the veracity of the chief Hebrew historian will be ultimately found to be as exact in what he has recorded in the cosmogony with which he commences his work, as it is in the account of his own legislation. There is certainly no appearance as yet that any contradictory theory will long survive its public enunciation. Magna est Veritas, et prevalebit, is the everlasting axiom. Truth, and truth only, will obtain any immortality in the intellectual, and therefore in our literary and social world.—Turner's Sacred History, vol. i. pp. 30—34. London 1832.

Every lover of science, and every enlightened friend of religion, must applaud the noble and zealous efforts which so many learned and talented individuals of the present day are making, to penetrate the recesses of nature, and to discover the wonders that are hid in the deep places of the earth. The book of nature and the book of Revelation proceed from the same almighty and all-wise source, and therefore what is contained in the one must harmonize with what is contained in the other. It is only our weak and erring understandings that hinder us from perceiving this harmony in any particular instance; but we may rest assured, that the phenomena of nature, when rightly interpreted, will, instead of opposing and contradicting revelation, be found to confirm and support it. Already has geology lent its aid in this way,—it has furnished indubitable evidence that this earth could not have existed from eternity, but must have had a beginning; that it was originally in a state of chaos, and its surface buried under the deep; and that at a period less remote its surface was again swept over by a deluge. (See b. i. sect. vi. ch. iii. of this history.) These and several other circumstances recorded in scripture history, receive confirmation from the fact which geology has disclosed, and there is reason to believe that future inquiries will elicit additional evidence of this kind.—See Prof. Hitchcock's Tract, Student's Cab. Lib. No. xix. Let the geologist then pursue his researches with all possible zeal and ardour ; but let him do so in a proper spirit, and by a patient investigation of facts ; let him abstain from rash speculations, into which the objects of his inquiries are, from their very nature, exceedingly apt to plunge him. Instead of attempting to accommodate scripture to his own conclusions, let him carefully examine whether these conclusions be accurate, or whether they may not be so modified as to be in accordance with the declarations of scripture, taken in their most natural and obvious sense. In this way may he reasonably hope to meet with success, and to arrive at conclusions which shall harmonize with those parts of Scripture, between which and geology there is at present a seeming inconsistency.

HISTORY OF THE BIBLE.

BOOK I.

CONTAINING AN ACCOUNT OF THINGS FROM THE CREATION TO THE FLOOD, IN ALL 1656 YEARS; ACCORDING TO DR HALES 2256 YEARS.

PRELIMINARY OBSERVATIONS.

THE Pentateuch or five books of Moses, designated Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, contains the authentic history of the world during a period of 2315 years. "It is a wide description, gradually contracted; an account of one nation, preceded by a general sketch of the first state of mankind. The books are written in pure Hebrew, with an admirable diversity of style, always well adapted to the subject, yet characterised with the stamp of the same author; they are all evidently parts of the same work, and mutually strengthen and illustrate each other."¹

The name of the first Book of the Pentateuch, Genesis, which signifies generation or production, has been given to this portion of the Sacred Canon, because it contains an account of the generation or production of all things. "It narrates the true origin and history of all created things, in opposition to the erroneous notions entertained by the heathen nations; the origin of sin, and of all moral and physical evil; the establishment of the knowledge and worship of the only true God among mankind; their declension into idolatry; the promise of the Messiah; together with the origin of the church, and her progress and condition for many ages. It makes known to the Israelites the providential history of their ancestors, and the divine promises made to them; and shows them the reason why the Almighty chose Abraham and his posterity to be a peculiar people, to the exclusion of all other nations,—that from them should spring the Messiah. This circumstance must be kept in view throughout the reading of this Book, as it will illustrate many otherwise unaccountable circumstances there related. It was this hope that led Eve to exclaim, 'I have gotten a man—the Lord.' The polygamy of Lamech may be accounted for by the hope that the Messiah would be born of some of his posterity,—as also, the incest of Lot's daughters,—Sarah's impatience of her barrenness,—the polygamy of Jacob—the consequent jealousies between Leah and Rachel:—the jealousies between Ishmael and Isaac, and especially Rebekah's preference of Jacob to Esau."²

SECT. I.

CHAP. I.—Of the Creation of the World.

THE INTRODUCTION.

A. M. 1. A. C. 4991; or, according to Hales, 5411. Gen. ch. 1.
and part of ch. 2.

THE chief design of the author of the Pentateuch is, to give a short account of the formation of the earth, and the origin of mankind; of the most remarkable events that attended them in the infancy of the world; and of the transactions of one particular nation more especially, from whence the Messiah was to spring; and therefore it cannot be well expected, that he should extend his history to the creation of the supreme empyrean heaven, which God might make the place of his own residence, and the mansions of those celestial beings, whom he constituted the ministers of his court, and attendants on his throne,^a an immense space of time, perhaps, before the

² Horne's Introduction, &c., vol. iv., pp. 5, 6.

^a This is no novel notion of our own, but what has been confirmed by many great authorities, as the learned and ingenious Dr Burnet testifies. For, speaking of some, who supposed that the whole universe was created at one and the same time, and the highest heaven and angels included in the first day's work, "It may be here proper," says he, "to present the words of Hieronymus." "The age of this globe hath not yet reached its six thousandth year, and how many eternities, how many eons, how many centuries must we conceive to have existed prior to that time, in which angels, thrones, dominions, and other powers worshipped the omnipotent. In a book on the Trinity, (either by Novatian or Tertullian), a world of angels, far above our firmament, is said to have been created before the Mosaic world, in these words, that in the higher spheres God had first created angels, appointed spiritual powers, planted thrones, dominions, &c., and framed many other boundless expanses of skies, &c.; so that this world rather seems to have been the latest than the sole work of the Deity. In a word, Cassian remarks that in his time, that is, in the beginning of the Mosaic account of the origination of this planetary world begins.

In the introduction of the history indeed we are told, that 'God created^a the heaven and the earth:' but when it is considered, that heaven in Scripture language, is very commonly set to signify no more than the upper region of the air; that we frequently read of¹ 'the firmament of heaven,² the windows of heaven,³ the bottles of heaven, and⁴ the heavy frost of heaven,' &c., none of which extend beyond our atmosphere, we have no grounds to conclude, that at one and the same time God created every thing that is contained in the vast extraneous spaces of the universe. On the contrary, when we find him recounting to Job, that at the time⁵ 'when he laid the foundations of the earth, the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy,' we cannot but infer, that these stars, and these sons of God, were pre-existent; and consequently no part of the Mosaic creation.

By the heaven therefore we are to understand no more, than that part of the world which we behold above us: but then I imagine we have very good reason to extend our conceptions of this world above us so far, as to include in it the whole planetary system. ^bThe truth is, the several planets that are contained within the magnus orbis, (as it is called), or the circle which Saturn, Herschell, or Urania describes about the sun, have so near a similitude and relation: the same form, the same centre, and the same common luminary with one another, that it can hardly be imagined but that they were the production of one and the same creation. And therefore, though the historian seems chiefly to regard the earth in his whole narration; yet there is reason to presume, that the other parts of the planetary world went all along on in the same degrees of formation with it.

2. It is to be observed farther, that this planetary world, or system of things, was not immediately created out of nothing, (as very probably the supreme heavens were,) but out of some such pre-existent matter as the ancient heathens were wont to call chaos. And accordingly we may observe, that in the history which Moses gives us of the creation, he does not say, that God at once made all things in their full perfection, but that 'in the beginning he created the earth,' that is, the matter whereof the chaos was composed, which 'was without form,' without any shape or order, 'and void,' without any thing living or growing in it; 'and darkness was upon the face of the waters,' nothing was seen for want of light, which lay buried in the vast abyss.

According to tradition, then, and the representation which this inspired author seems to give us, ^dthis chaos bounds of the universe, and placed at equal distance from its centre the sun; this new hypothesis supposes, that there are many more systems of suns and planets, besides that in which we have our habitation: that every fixed star, in short, is a sun, encompassed with its complement of planets, both primary and secondary, as well as ours; and that these stars, with their planets are placed at regular distances from each other, and, according to their distances from us, seem to vary in their respective magnitudes.—Derham's Astro-theology, in the preliminary discourse.

c What our translators render 'in the beginning' some learned men have made 'in wisdom God created the heavens and the earth;' not only because the Jerusalem targum has it so, but because the Psalmist, paraphrasing upon the works of the creation, breaks forth into this admiration. 'O Lord! how wonderful are thy works, in wisdom hast thou made them all,' Ps. civ. 24. And again, exhorting us to give thanks unto the Lord for his manifold mercies, he adds, 'who by wisdom made the heavens,' Ps. cxxxvi. 5. where, by wisdom, as some imagine, he means the Sanctus of God, by whom, says the evangelist, John i. 3. 'all things were made, or all things created,' says the apostle, Col. i. 16. 'that are in heaven, and that are in the earth;' and therefore the meaning of the phrase must be, that God, in creating the world, made use of the agency of his Son. Among the ancients (says Petavius, on the work of the six days, B. I., c. 1.) it was a well known and very common opinion, that by the noun principium, or beginning, was signified the Word or Son. And to this interpretation the word Elohim in the plural number, joined with bara a verb singular, seems to give some countenance; though others are of opinion, that a noun plural, governing a verb singular, is no more than the common idiom of the Hebrew tongue; and for this idiom a very considerable commentator assigns this reason:—That the Hebrew language was originally that of the Canaanites, a people strangely addicted to idolatry and polytheism; and who therefore made more use of the plural Elohim, than of the singular Eloah; which usage the Jews continued, though they were zealous assertors of the unity of the Godhead, and thereupon most commonly joined a verb of the singular number with it, pursuant to their notions of the divine unity.—Le Clerc's dissert. De ling. Hebraica.

d To mention one author out of the many which Grotius has cited, Ovid, in the beginning of his Metamorphoses has given us this description of it:

Before the appearance of the earth and sky
Which covereth all things, Nature

⁴ Job xxxviii. 29. ⁵ Ibid. ver. 4, 7.

fifth century, it was the common opinion of Catholics, that before the beginning of the Genesios, viz., the birth of the Mosaic world: it was beyond a doubt God must have created all these heavenly powers.⁷ Burnet's Arch. Phil. c. 8.
a By heaven, some understand in this place the highest super-firmamentary heaven, and by the earth, that pre-existent matter whereof the earth was originally made; and so the sense of the words will be—"that God at first created the matter whereof the whole universe was composed, all at once, in an instant, and by a word's speaking; but it was the supreme heaven only which he then finished, and formed into a most excellent order, for the place of his own residence, and the habitation of his holy angels; the earth was left rude and indigested, in the manner that Moses has described it, until there should be a fit occasion for its being revised, and set in order likewise."

b The better to understand this, and some other matters, in our explication of the formation of celestial bodies, it is proper to observe, that there are three more remarkable systems of the world, the Ptolemaic, Copernican, and what is called the New System, which astronomers have devised.

1. In the Ptolemaic, the earth and waters are supposed to be in the centre of the universe, next to which is the element of air, and next above that the element of fire; then the orb of Mercury, then that of Venus, and then that of the Sun; above the sun's orb those of Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn; and above them all, the orbs of the fixed stars, then the crystalline orbs, and lastly, the orbem empyreum, or heaven of heavens. All these massy orbs, and vast bodies borne by them, are in this system supposed to move round the terraqueous globe once in twenty-four hours; and beside that, to perform other revolutions in certain periodical times, according to their distance from the supposed centre, and the different circumference they take.

2. In the Copernican system, the sun is supposed to be in the centre, and the heavens and earth to revolve round about it, according to their several periods: first Mercury, then Venus, then the Earth with its satellite the Moon; then Mars, then Jupiter with its four moons; lastly, Saturn with its five, or more moons revolving round it; and beyond, or above all these, is the firmament, or region of fixed stars, which are all supposed to be at equal distances from their centre the sun.

3. In the New System, the sun and planets have the same spherical position as in the Copernican; but then, whereas the Copernican supposes the firmament of the fixed stars to be the

was a fluid mass, wherein were the materials and ingredients of all bodies, but mingled in confusion with one another, so that heavy and light, dense and rare, fluid and solid particles, were jumbled together, and the atoms or small constituent parts of fire, air, water, and earth, (which have since obtained the name of elements), were every one in every place, and all in a wild confusion and disorder. This seems to be a part of God's original creation; but why he suffered it to continue so long, before he transformed it into an habitable world, is a question only resolvable into the divine pleasure: since, according to the ideas we have of his moral perfections, there is nothing to fix the creation of any thing sooner or later, than his own arbitrary will determined. Only we may imagine, that, after the revolt of so many angels, God, intending to make a new race of creatures, in order to supply their place, and fill up (as it were) the vacancy in heaven; and withal, resolving to make trial of their obedience before he admitted them into his beatific presence, singled out one (as perhaps "there might be many chaotic bodies in the universe) placed at a proper distance from his own empyrean seat, to be the habitation of the creatures he was about to form, and might delay the fitting it up for them until the time which his infinite wisdom had determined for their creation was fully come.

3. It is to be observed farther, that though Moses might have in his view the whole planetary system, and know very well, that every day each planet advanced in the same proportion, as the earth did in its formation: yet what he principally chose to insist on (as a specimen of all the rest) was this sublunary creation. He who was versed in all 'the learning of the Egyptians,' could not be unacquainted with the vulgar, or what is usually called the Ptolemaic hypothesis, which came originally from Egypt into Greece; and yet, instead of expressing his notions according to this, or any other system, we find him giving us a plain narrative, how matters were transacted, without asserting or denying any philosophic truth. Had he indeed talked a great deal of globular and angular particles, of centrical motion, planetary vortices, atmospheres of comets, the earth's rotation, and the sun's rest, he might possibly have pleased the taste of some theorists better; but theories we know are things of uncertain mode. They depend in a great measure upon the humour and caprice of an age, which

Throughout the Universe had but one form
Which men have named Chaos—'Twas a Raw and shapeless mass—a heap of nature's Discordant seeds wildly juddled together
Nor else but useless weight, &c.

a If matter existed as chaos before the beginning of the Mosaic world, what was it? for what purpose, or in what place did it exist before that time? I answer, that things such as these are not too narrowly to be searched after, since, in a great measure, they exceed the power of human investigation. Thus, we see at times stars arising in our hemisphere which never before had been apparent, but whose pre-existence in some shape, and in some quarter of the universe, cannot properly be doubted. And, also, comets are frequently discovered, concerning whose origin and first place of abode the abilities of man cannot elicit the least dawning of information. In fine, it is not to be supposed that the heavens themselves are free from decay,—the celestial as well as the terrestrial bodies must have their inversions and transmutations; and by the lapse of time and return of chaos, the fixed stars may be converted into planets, and planets, when their deteriorated matter is consumed, in their turn may become fixed stars, &c.—Burnet's Aechol. Phil., c. 9.

is sometimes in love with one, and sometimes with another. But this account of Moses was to last for ever, as being the ground-work which God designed for all his future revelations; and therefore it was requisite to have it framed in such a manner, as that it might descend to the meanest capacity, and yet not contradict any received notions of philosophy.

The Jews, it must be owned, were a nation of no great genius for learning; and therefore, if Moses had given them a false system of the creation, such as a simple people might be apt to fancy, he had both made himself an impostor, and exposed his writings to the contempt and derision of every man of understanding: and yet, to have given them a particular explication of the true one, must have made the illiterate look upon him as a wild romancer. By God's direction, therefore, he took the middle and wisest way, which was to speak exact truth, but cautiously, and in such general terms as might neither confound the minds of the ignorant Jews, nor expose him to the censure of philosophizing Christians: and we may well account it an evident token of a particular providence of God overruling this inspired penman, that he has drawn up the cosmogony in such a manner, as makes it of perpetual use and application; forasmuch as it contains no peculiar notions of his own, no principles borrowed from the ancient exploded philosophy, nor any repugnant to the various discoveries of the new.

4. It is to be observed farther, in relation to this account of Moses, that when God is said to give the word, and every thing thereupon proceeded to its formation, he did not leave matter and motion to do their best, whilst he stood by (according to Dr Cudworth's expression) as an idle spectator of this sport of atoms, and the various results of it; but himself interposed, and, conducting the whole process, gave not only life and being, but form and figure to every part of the creation.

The warmest abettors of mechanical principles do not deny, but that 'a divine energy at least must be admitted in this case, where a world was to be formed, and a wild chaos reduced to a fair, regular, and permanent system. The immediate hand of God (they cannot but acknowledge) is apparent in a miracle, which is an infraction, upon the standing laws of nature; but, certainly, of all miracles, the creation of the world is the greatest, not only as it signifies the production of matter and motion out of nothing, but as it was likewise the ranging and putting things into such order, as might make them capable of the laws of motion which were to be ordained for them. For whatever notions we may have of the stated economy of things now, it is certain that the laws of motion (with which philosophers make such noise) could not take place before every part of the creation was ranged and settled in its proper order.

It may be allowed however, since, even in the Mosaic account, there are some passages, such as, 'let the earth bring forth grass, let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, and it was so,' that whatever comes under the compass of mechanical causes, might possibly be effected by matter and motion, only set on work by infinite wisdom, and sustained in their being and operation by infinite power; but whatever is above the power of second causes, such as the production of matter out of nothing, the formation of the seeds of all animals and vegetables, the creation of our first parents, and inspiring them with immortal souls, &c., these we affirm, and these we ought to believe, were the pure result of God's omnipotent power, and are ascribed to him alone.

To this purpose we may observe, that before our author begins to acquaint us with what particular creatures were each day successively brought into being, he takes care to inform us, (as a thing essential and preparatory to the work,) ^a 'that the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters.' For, whether by 'the Spirit of God,' we are to understand 'his holy and essential Spirit, which is the third person in the ever-blessed Trinity, whether that ²plastic nature, which (according to some) was made subservient to him upon this occasion, or any other emanation of the divine power and energy, it is reasonable to suppose, that its moving or incubation upon the chaotic mass, derived into it a certain fermentation, impregnated it with several kinds of motive influence, and so separated and digested its confused parts, as to make it capable of the disposition and order it was going to receive.

CHAP. II.—The History.

In this condition we may suppose the chaos to have been, when the ^b fiat for light was given; whereupon all the confused, stagnating particles of matter began to range into form and order. The dull, heavy, and terrene parts, which overclouded the expansum or firmament, had their summons to retire to their respective centres. They presently obeyed the Almighty's orders, and part of them subsided to the centre of the earth, some to Jupiter, some to Saturn, some to Venus, &c., till the

² Gen. i. 2. It is observed by some later Jewish, as well as Christian interpreters, that the several names of God are often given as epithets to those things which are the greatest, the strongest, and the best of their kind; and thereupon they think, that since the word Ruach signifies the wind, as well as the Spirit, Ruach Elohim should be translated a most vehement wind, instead of 'the Spirit of God;' and that this signification agrees very well with Moses's account, which represents the earth so mixed with the waters, that it could not appear, and therefore stood in need of a wind to dry it. But besides that this sense seems to be a sad debasing of the text, it is certain, that the wind (which is nothing but the moving of the air) could not be spoken of now, because it was not created until the second day.

^a The word in the Hebrew, according to the opinion of some, both ancient and modern, interpreters, signifies literally a brooding upon the waters, even as a hen does upon her eggs; but, as there are only two places wherein the word occurs, Deut. xxxii. 11, and Jer. xxxiii. 9., Mr Le Clerc contends, that in neither of these it will properly admit of this sense; and therefore he rather thinks it (as our Ainsworth seems to do) to be a metaphor taken from the hovering and fluttering of an eagle, or any other bird, over its young, but not its sitting over, or brooding upon them. A distinction of no great moment in my opinion.

^b The words are, 'Let there be light,' which, as Longinus takes notice, is a truly lofty expression; and herein appears the wisdom of Moses that he represents God like himself, commanding things into being by his word, i. e. his will: for wherever we read the words, he said, in the history of the creation, the meaning must be, that he willed so and so.—Patrik's Commentary.

globes of these several planets were completed. And as the grosser parts subsided, the lighter, and more tenuous mounted up; and the lucid and fiery particles (being lighter than the rest) ascended higher, and, by the divine order, meeting together in a body, were put in a circular motion, and in the space of a natural day, made to visit the whole expansum of the chaos, which occasioned a separation of the light from darkness, and thereby a distribution of day and night: ^c and this was the work of the first day. ^d

The next thing which God Almighty commanded, was, that the waters, which as yet were universally dispersed over the face of the chaos, should retire to their respective planets, and be restrained within their proper limits by several atmospheres. Hereupon all the aqueous parts immediately subsided towards the centres of the several planets, and were circumfused about their globes; by which means the great expansum was again cleared off, and the region of the air became more lucid and serene. And this is the operation which Moses calls 'dividing the waters under ^e the firmament, from the waters which are above ^f the firmament,' for the waters under the firmament are the waters of the earth, the waters above the firmament are those of the moon, and other planets, which, in the second day's work, were dismissed to their several orbs, but were confusedly mixed, and overspread the whole face of the expansum before.

Thus, on the second day, the delightful element of air was disentangled and extracted from the chaos: and one part of the business of the third, was to separate the other remaining elements, 'water and earth.' For the watery particles, as we said, clearing the expansum, and falling upon the planetary orbs, must be supposed to cover the face of the earth, as well as other planets, when the great Creator gave the command for 'the waters to be gathered into one place, and the dry land

^c If we rather approve the Copernican hypothesis, we must say, that the earth, having now received its diurnal and annual motion, and having turned round about its axis, for about the space of twelve hours, made this luminous body, now fixed in a proper place, appear in the east, which, in the space of twelve hours more, seemed to be in the west; and that this revolution made a distinction between day and night.—Bedford's Chronology.

^d 'And the evening and the morning were the first day.' The Mosaiical method of computing days from sunset to sunset, and of reckoning by nights instead of days, prevailed among the polished Athenians. From a similar custom of our Gothic ancestors, during their abode in the forests of Germany, words expressive of such a mode of calculation (such as fortnight, se-night) have been derived into our own language.—Burder's Oriental Customs, vol. i., p. 1.—Ed.

^e Gen. i. 6. The seventy interpreters, in translating the word Rakiagh, the firm or solid, seem to have followed the philosophy of the first ages; for the ancients fancied that the heavens were a solid body, and that the stars were fastened therein, which might likewise be the notion of Elishu, Job xxxvii. 18.: since he represents the heaven to be strong or solid, 'like a molten looking-glass;' whereas, the proper sense of the word is something spread or stretched out. And to this both the psalmist and prophet allude, when they tell us, that 'God spreadeth out the heaven like a curtain,' Ps. civ. 2, and 'stretched them out by his discretion,' Jer. x. 12.

^f Several commentators suppose 'the waters above the firmament' to be those which hang in the clouds; but the notion of their being planetary waters seems more reasonable, because at this time, there were no clouds, neither had it as yet rained on the earth. See Gen. ii. 6.

A. M. I. A. C. 4064; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, 5411. GEN. CH. I. AND PART OF CH. 2.

to appear.' Whereupon the mighty mountains instantly reared up their heads, and the waters, falling every way from their sides, ran into those large extended valleys, which this swelling of the earth, in some places, had made for their reception in others. The earth, being thus separated from the waters, and designed for the habitation of man and beast, (which were afterwards to be created,) was first to be furnished with such things as were proper for their support; grass for cattle, and herbs and fruit-trees for the nourishment of man. Immediately, therefore, upon the divine command, it was covered with a beautiful carpet of flowers and grass, trees and plants of all kinds, which were produced in their full proportion, laden with fruit, and not subjected to the ordinary course of maturation. For how great soever the fecundity of the primogenial earth might be, yet it is scarce to be imagined, how ^a trees and plants could be ripened, into their full growth and burden of fruit, in the short period of a day, any other way than by virtue of a supernatural power of God, which first collected the parts of matter fit to produce them; then formed every one of them, and determined their kinds; and at last provided for their continuance, by a curious enclosure of their seed, in order to propagate their species, even unto the end of the world: and this was the work of the third day.

When God had finished the lower world, and furnished it with all manner of store, that mass of fiery light, (which we suppose to have been extracted on the first day, and to have moved about the expansum for two days after.) was certainly of great use in the production of the ether, the separation of the waters, and the rarefaction of the land, which might possibly require a more violent operation at first, than was necessary in those lesser alterations, which were afterwards to be effected; and therefore, on the fourth day, God took and condensed it, and casting it into a proper orb, placed it at a convenient distance from the earth and other planets: insomuch that it became a sun, and immediately shone out in the same glorious manner, in which it has done ever since.

After this God took another part of the chaos, an opaque substance, which we call the 'moon'; and having cast it into a proper figure, placed it in another orb, at a nearer distance from the earth, that it might perpetually be moving round it, and that the sun, by darting its rays upon its solid surface, might reflect light to the terrestrial globe, for the benefit of its inhabitants: and, at the same time, that God thus made the moon, he made, in like manner, ^b the other five planets of the solar system,

^a There are two things wherein the production of plants, in the beginning, differed from their production ever since. 1. That they have sprung ever since out of their seed either sown by us, or falling from the plants themselves: but in the beginning, were wrought out of the earth, with their seed in them, to propagate them ever after. 2. That they need now (as they have ever since the creation) the influence of the sun, to make them sprout; but then they came forth by the power of God, before there was any sun, which was not formed till the next day.—Patrick's Comment. in loc.

^b I am very sensible that the words in the text are, 'He made the stars also,' ver. 16; but the whole sentence comes in so very abruptly, that one would be apt to imagine, that after Moses's time, it was clapped in by some body who had a mind to be mending his hypothesis, or else was added, by way of marginal note, at first; and at length crept into the text itself, and their satellites. Nor was it only for the dispensation of light to this earth of ours, that God appointed the two great luminaries of the sun and moon to attend it, but for the measure and computation of time likewise: that a speedy and swift motion of the sun, (according to the Ptolemaic system,) in twenty-four hours round the earth, or of the earth (according to the Copernican) upon its own axis, might make a day; that the time from one change of the moon to another, or thereabouts, might make a month; and the apparent revolution of the sun, to the same point of the ecliptic line, might not only make a year, but occasion likewise a grateful variety of seasons in the several parts of the earth, which are thus gradually and successively visited by the reviving heat of the sunbeams: and this was the work of the fourth day.

After the inanimate creation, God, on the fifth day, proceeded to form the animate; and because fish and fowl are not so perfect in their kind, neither so curious in their bodily texture, nor so sagacious in their instinct, as terrestrial creatures are known to be, he therefore began with them, and ^c out of the waters, that is, out of such matter as was mixed and concocted with the water, he formed several of different shapes and sizes; some vastly big, ^d to show the wondrous of his creating power; and some extremely small, to show the goodness of his indulgent providence. And (what is peculiar to this day's work) here we have the first mention made of God's blessing his creatures, and ^e 'bidding them be fruitful

(as F. Simon has evidenced in several other instances.) For the fixed stars do not seem to be comprehended in the six days' work, which relates only to this planetary world, that has the sun for its centre; Patrick's Commentary and Nicholl's Conference, vol. i. See answer to the subsequent objection.

^c From the words in Gen. ch. i. ver. 20. 'Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life, and fowl, that may fly above the earth,' &c., some have stated an opinion, that fowl derive their origin from the water; and others, from the words, 'Out of the ground God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air,' raise another, viz. that fowl took their beginning from the earth; but these two texts are easily reconciled, because neither denies what the other says, though they speak differently: as when Moses says, 'Let the waters bring forth fowl,' he does not by that say, that the earth did not bring forth fowl. It is most reasonable therefore to think that they had their original partly from the waters, and partly from the earth; and this might render the flesh of fowl less gross than that of beasts, and more firm than that of fishes. Hence Philo calls fowl the kindred of fish; and that they are so, the great congruity there is in their natures, they being both oviparous which makes them more fruitful than other animals, and both steering and directing their course by their tails is a sufficient indication.

^d Moses instances in the whale, because it is supposed to be the principal and largest of all fishes; but the original word denotes several kinds of great fish, as Bochart in his Hierozon, p. 1. l. 1. c. 7, observes at large; and shows without the prodigious bigness of some of them; but he should have added, that the word signifies a crocodile likewise, as well as a whale; Patrick and Le Clerc in loc.

^e That fish and fowl should here have a blessing pronounced upon them, rather than the beasts, which were made the sixth day, some have supposed this to be the reason:—that the production of their young requires the particular care of divine providence, because they do not bring them forth perfectly formed as the beasts do, but only lay their eggs, in which the young are hatched and formed, even when they are separate from their bodies; and "what a wonderful thing is this," says one, "that when the womb (as we may call it) is separated from the genitor, a living creature like itself should be produced?"—Patrick's Commentary.

A. M. I. A. C. 4004; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, 5411. GEN. CH. I. AND PART OF CH. 2.

and multiply,' that is, giving them, at their first creation, a prolific virtue, and a natural instinct for generation, whereby they might not only preserve their species, but multiply their individuals: and this was the work of the fifth day.

Thus every thing being put in order; the earth covered with plants; the waters restored with fish; the air replenished with fowl; and the sun placed at a proper distance, to give a convenient warmth and nourishment to all; in order to make this sublimary world a still more comfortable place of abode, in the beginning of the sixth and last day, "God made the terrestrial animals, which the sacred historian distributes into three kinds: 1. Beasts, by which we understand all wild and savage creatures, such as lions, bears, wolves, &c. 2. Cattle, all tame and domestic creatures, designed for the benefit and use of men, such as oxen, sheep, horses, &c. And, 3. Creeping things, such as serpents, worms, and other kinds of insects.

Thus, when all things which could be subservient to man's felicity were perfected; when the light had, for some time, been penetrating into, and clarifying the dark and thick atmosphere; when the air was freed from its noisome vapours, and become pure and clear, and fit for his respiration; when the waters were so disposed, as to minister to his necessities by mists and dews from heaven, and by springs and rivers from the earth; when the surface of the earth was become dry and solid for his support, and covered over with grass and flowers, with plants and herbs, and trees of all kinds, for his pleasure and sustenance; when the glorious firmament of heaven, and the beautiful system of the sun, moon, and stars, were laid open for his contemplation, and, by their powerful influences, appointed to distinguish the seasons, and make the world a fruitful and delicious habitation for him; when, lastly, all sorts of animals in the sea, in the air, and on the earth, were so ordered and disposed, as to contribute, in their several capacities, to his benefit and delight: when all these things, I say, were, by the care and providence of God, prepared for the entertainment of this principal guest, it was then a In the 21th verse of this chapter it is said, that God commanded the earth to produce such and such animals: 'Let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind;' and yet, in the very next verse, it follows, that 'God made the beast of the earth, and every thing that moveth after his kind;' but this seeming contradiction is easily reconciled by putting together the proper meaning of both these passages, which must certainly be this—that God himself effectually formed these terrestrial animals, and made use of the earth only as to the matter whereof he constituted their parts. Some indeed have made it a question, whether these several creatures were at first produced in their full state and perfection, or God only created the seeds of all animals, (i. e. the animals themselves in miniature,) and dispersed them over the face of the earth, giving power to that element, assisted by the genial heat of the sun, to hatch and bring them forth: but for this there is no manner of occasion, since it is much more rational to suppose, that God did not commit the formation of things to any intermediate causes, but himself created the first set of animals in the full proportion and perfection of their specific natures, and gave to each species a power afterwards, by generation, to propagate their kind: for that even now, and in the present situation of things any perfect species cannot, either naturally or accidentally, be produced by any preparation of matter, or by any influence of the heavens, without the interposition of an almighty power, physical experiments do demonstrate.—Patrick's Commentary; and Bentley's Sermons at Boyle's Lecture.

that man was created, and introduced into the world in a manner and solemnity not unbecoming the lord and governor of it. To this purpose we may observe, that God makes a manifest distinction between him and other creatures, and seems to undertake the creation, even of his body, with a kind of mature deliberation, if not consultation with the other persons of the ever-blessed Trinity; b 'Let us make man.'^c

However this be, it is certain that the force and energy of the expression denotes thus much—that the production of mankind at first was so immediately the work of Almighty God, that the power of no subordinate intelligence could be capable of it: that the curious

b Gen. i. 26. The Jewish doctors are of opinion, that the consultation was real, and held with such angelical beings as God might employ in the work of man's creation; and they tell a story upon this occasion which seems a little fictitious, viz., that as Moses was writing his book by God's appointment, and these words came to be dictated, he refused to set them down, crying out, O Lord! wouldst thou then plunge men in error, and make them doubt of the doctrine of the unity? Whereupon it was answered by God, 'I command thee to write, and if any will err, let them err.' Several modern expositors account it only a majestic form of speech, as nothing is more common than for kings and sovereign princes to speak in the plural number, especially when they are giving out any important order or command. It has been observed, however, that as there were no men, and consequently no great men, when this was spoken; so there was no such manner of speech in use among men of that rank for many ages after Moses. Their common custom was, in all their public instruments and letters (the better to enhance the notion of sovereignty) to speak in the first person, as it was in our nation not long ago, and is in the kingdom of Spain to this very day; and therefore, upon the authority of almost all the fathers of the church: 'For, from the very times of the apostles, they all nearly coincide in faithfully declaring that God the Father spake these words to the Son and Holy Ghost, or at least to the Son.' Whitby's Conversions of Fathers. Others have thought that this language of Moses represents God speaking, as he is, that is, in a plurality of persons.

c "God is represented to have concerted the formation of man, in conjunction, it should seem, with other persons consulting in secret counsel." This circumstance has been justly received as furnishing evidence in favour of the doctrine of the Trinity. "It is generally admitted also, that the manifestations of the Divine Nature, which were made to the Patriarchs, to Moses, to Joshua, and others, were made in the person of Christ; the Angel or 'Messenger of the Covenant.'" Thus, when the Lord appeared to Abraham, in the plains of Mamre, it is said, that three men stood by him, yet the Patriarch addressed them as he would have accented one being, or directed himself to one as superior—"Nay, my Lord, pass not away," Gen. xviii. When Jacob wrestled with the man who appeared to him, he called the name of the place Peniel, "for I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved;" and when he blessed the sons of Joseph, he expressed the hope that "the angel which redeemed him from all evil would bless the lads," Gen. xlviii. 16. The angel which appeared to Moses at the bush, said, I am the God of thy father, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, Ex. iii. 6. When Manoah inquired the name of the angel who appeared unto him, the angel answered, "Why askest thou thus after my name, seeing it is secret?"—"Using the same Hebrew word which is applied to Christ by Isaiah, when in his ninth chapter and sixth verse, he styles him "Wonderful." We are told that Manoah, when he knew that he was an angel of the Lord, said unto his wife, "We shall surely die because we have seen God," Judges xiii. 18.

It was the object of the Jewish dispensation to preserve men from idolatrous propensities, and from following after strange gods. Moses and the prophets therefore insist principally on the unity of God, though when led to refer to the offices of the other persons of the Trinity, they could not but impart some notices of a doctrine which was afterwards distinctly to be revealed."—Graf's Connection, &c., p. 121, 123.—Ed.

structure of man's body, the accommodation of it to faculties, and the furnishing it with faculties that are accommodated to it, (even as to its animal life,) imports a wisdom and efficacy far above the power of any created nature to effect. And this may possibly suggest the reason, why, in the formation of his body, God made choice of 'the dust of the ground,' viz., that from the incongruity of the matter we might judge of the difficulty, and learn to attribute the glory of the performance to him alone. And if the creation of the body of our great progenitor was a work of so much divine wisdom and power, we cannot but expect, that the spiritual and immaterial nature, the immortal condition, active powers, and free and rational operations, which, in resemblance of the Divine Being, the soul of man was to participate, should require some peculiar and extraordinary conduct in its production at first, and union with matter afterward; all which is expressed by God's 'breathing into the man's nostrils the breath of life,' that is, doing something analogous to breathing, (for God has no body to breathe with,) whereby he infused a rational and immortal spirit (for we must not suppose that God gave any part of his own essence) into the man's head, as the principal seat thereof; and ^b man became a living soul.^a

As soon as Adam found himself alive, and began to cast his eyes about him, he could not but perceive that he was in no small danger as being surrounded with a multitude of savage creatures, all gazing on him, and (for any thing he knew) ready and disposed to fall upon and devour him. And therefore, to satisfy his mind in this particular, God took care to inform him, that all the creatures upon earth were submitted to his authority: that on them he had impressed an awe and dread of him; had invested him with an absolute power and dominion over them; and, to convince him of the full possession of that power, he immediately appointed every creature to appear before him, which they accordingly did, and ^c by their lowly carriage, and gestures of respect suitable to their several species, evidenced their submission; and as they passed along, such knowledge had Adam then of their several properties and destinations, that he assigned them their names, which a small skill in the Hebrew tongue will convince us, were very proper, and significant of their natures.

This survey of the several creatures might possibly occasion some uneasy reflections in Adam, to see every one provided with its mate, but himself left destitute of any companion of a similar nature; and therefore, to

^a The original word, which our translators render nostrils, signifies more properly the face or head.

^b It is not to be doubted, but that Eve, the mother of all living, was created by Almighty God, and inspired with a rational and immortal soul, the same day with her husband; for so it is said, that in the sixth day, 'male and female created he them,' ver. 27; and therefore the historian only re-assumes the argument in the second chapter, to give us a more full and particular account of the woman's origin, which was but briefly delivered, or rather indeed but hinted at in the first.

^c Milton has expressed himself, upon this occasion, in the following manner:

As thus he spake, each bird, and beast, behold Approaching, two and two; those cowering low
With blandishment; each bird stoop'd on his wing.
I nam'd them, as they pass'd, and understand Their nature; with such knowledge God endu'd
My sudden apprehension.

answer his desires in this particular likewise, ¹ 'God caused a deep sleep to fall upon him,' which was intended, not only as an expedient for the performance of the wonderful operation upon him without sense of pain, ^d but as a trance or ecstasy likewise, wherein was represented to his imagination, both what was done to him, and what was the mystical meaning of it, and whereby he was prepared for the reception of that divine oracle ² concerning the sacred institution of marriage, which presently, upon his awaking, he uttered.

While Adam continued in this sleep, God, who, with the same facility wherewith he made him, could have formed the woman out of the 'dust of the earth,' (being willing to signify that equality and partnership, that love and union, and tenderness of endearment, which ought to interfere between husband and wife,) took part of the substance of the man's body, ^e near his side, and closing up the orifice again, out of that substance he ^f formed the body of Eve, and then 'breathing into her the breath of life,' made her, in like manner, 'become a living soul.'

This was the g conclusive act of the whole creation:

² Gen. ii. 23.

^d In like manner, he makes this sleep which fell upon Adam to have been a kind of trance or ecstasy. (for so the Seventy translate it,) and thus he relates the occasion and nature of it.

He ended, and I heard no more; for now
My earthly by his heavenly overpow'd,
Which it had long stood under, strain'd to th' height
In that celestial colloquy sublime,
(As with an object that exceeds the sense, Dazzled and spent,) sunk down, and sought relief
Of sleep, which instantly fell on me, call'd
By nature as in aid, and clos'd my eyes.
Mine eyes he clos'd, but open left the cell
Of fancy, my internal sight, by which (Abstract as in a trance) methought I saw,
Though sleeping, where I lay, and saw the shape
Still glorious, before whom awake I stood—Under his forming hands a creature grew
Man-like, but different sex; so lovely fair,
That what seem'd fair in all the world, seem'd now
Mean, or in her summ'd up, in her contain'd,
And in her looks, which from that time infus'd
Sweetness into my heart, unfelt before;
And into all things from her air inspir'd
The spirit of love, and amorous delight.

^e As the original word does not strictly signify a rib, and is all along rendered by the Seventy pleura, a side, so I thought it not improper to give it that construction, thereby to cut off from infidels an occasion for railery, and to spare them all their wit about the redundant or defective rib of Adam.

^f The original word signifies building or framing any thing with a singular care, contrivance, and proportion; and hence our bodies are in Scripture frequently called houses, Job iv. 19; 2 Cor. v. 1; and sometimes temples, John ii. 19; 1 Cor. iii. 16.

^g It is not very necessary to determine at what season of the year the world was made; yet it seems most probable, that it was about the autumnal equinox, and that not only because the trees were laden then with fruit, as the history tells us our first parents did eat of them; but because the Jews did then begin their civil year (viz. in the month Tisri, which answers to part of our September and October) from whence their sabbatical and jubilee years did likewise commence, Exod. xxiii. 16, xxxiv. 22; Lev. xxv. 9. The month Nisib (which answers to part of our March and April) had indeed the honour afterwards to be reckoned among the Jews the beginning of their year in ecclesiastical matters, because the children of Israel, on that month, came out of the land of Egypt; but from the very creation, the month Tisri was always counted the first of their civil year, because it was the general opinion of the ancients, that the world was created at the time of the autumnal equinox; and for this reason, the Jews do still, in the era of the creation, as well as in that of contracts, and other instruments, compute the be-and upon a general survey of such harmony risen from principles so jarring and repugnant, and so beautiful a variety and composition of things from a mere mass of confusion and disorder, God was pleased with the work of his hands; and having pronounced it good, or properly adapted to the uses for which it was intended, 'he rested from all his work,' that is, he ceased to produce any more creatures, as having accomplished his design, and answered his original idea; and thereupon he sanctified, and set apart the next ensuing day, (which was the seventh from the beginning of the creation, and the first of Adam's life,) as a time of solemn rest and rejoicing for ever after, to be observed and expended in acts of praise and religious worship, and in commemoration of the infinite wisdom, power, and goodness of God, in the world's creation.

CHAP. III.—The Objection.

1 'WHERE wast thou, when I laid the foundations of the earth? Declare if thou hast understanding. Whereupon are the foundations thereof fastened, and who laid the corner stone thereof?' is a question very proper to be put to those who demand a reason for the actions of God: for, if they cannot comprehend the works themselves, they are certainly very culpable in inquiring too busily into the time and manner of his doing them. But (to gratify the inquisitive for once) though we do not deny, that all things are equally easy to Almighty power, yet it pleased the divine Architect to employ the space of six days in the gradual formation of the world, giving of their year from the first day of Tisri. Herein, however, the Jews differ from us; that whereas they make the world only 3760, most of the Christian chronologers will have it to be much about 4000 years older than Christ; so that by them 5732 years, or thereabouts, are thought a moderate computation of the world's antiquity. See Usher's Annals; Bedford's Chronology; and Shuckford's Connection.

a Whether the institution of the Sabbath was from the beginning of the world, and one day in seven always observed by the patriarchs, before the promulgation of the law; or whether the sanctification of the seventh day is related only by way of anticipation, as an ordinance not to take place until the introduction of the Jewish economy, is a matter of some debate among the learned; but I think with little or no reason, for when we consider, that as soon as the sacred penman had said, 'God ended his work, and rested,' he adds immediately, in the words of the same tense, 'he blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it;' when we compare this passage in Genesis with the twentieth chapter of Exodus, wherein Moses speaks of God's 'blessing and sanctifying the Sabbath' not as an act then first done, but as what he had formerly done upon the creation of the world; when we remember, that all the patriarchs from Adam to Moses had set times for their solemn assemblies, and that these times were weekly, and of divine institution; that upon the return of these weekly Sabbaths, very probably, it was that Cain and Abel offered their respective sacrifices to God; and that Noah, the only righteous person among the Antediluvians, Abraham, the most faithful servant of God after the flood, and Job, that perfect and upright man, who feared God, and eschewed evil, are all supposed to have observed it; we cannot but think, that the day whereupon the work of the creation was concluded, from the very beginning of time, was every week (until men had corrupted their ways) kept holy as being the birthday of the world, (as Philo on the Creation of the World styles it,) and the universal festival of mankind. See Bedford's Scripture Chronology, and Patrick's Commentary.

because he foresaw, that such procedure would be a means conducive to the better instruction both of men and angels. Angels (as we hinted before) were very probably created, when the supreme heavens were made, at least some considerable time before the production of this visible world. Now, though they be great and glorious beings, yet still they are of a finite nature, and unable to comprehend the wonderful works of God. There are some things (as ² the apostle tells us) that these celestial creatures 'desire to look into;' and the more they are let into the knowledge and wisdom of God, the more they are incited to praise him. ³ That therefore they might not want sufficient matter for this heavenly exercise, the whole scene of the creation, according to the several degrees and natures of things, seems to have been laid open in order before them, that thereby they might have a more full and comprehensive view of the divine attributes therein exhibited, than they could have had, in case the world had started forth in an instant, or jumped (as it were) into this beautiful frame and order all at once; just as he who sees the whole texture and contrivance of any curious piece of art, values and admires the artist more, than he who beholds it in the gross only.

God was therefore pleased to display his glory before the angels, and by several steps and degrees, excite their praise, and love, and admiration, which moved them to songs and shouts of joy. By this means, his glory, and their happiness were advanced, far beyond what it would have been, had all things been created, and ranged in their proper order in a moment. By this means they had time to look into the first principles and seeds of all creatures, both animate and inanimate; and every day presented them with a glorious spectacle of new wonders; so that the more they saw, the more they knew, and the more they know of the works of God, the more they for ever love and adore him. But this is not all.

By this successive and gradual creation of things, in the space of six days, the glory of God is likewise more manifest to man, than it would have been, had they been made by a sudden and instantaneous production. The heavens, and 'all the host of them,' we may suppose, were made in an instant, because there were then perhaps no other creatures to whom God might display the glory of his works; but as they were made in an instant, we have little or no perception of the manner wherein they were made: but now, in this leisurely procedure of the earth's formation, we see, as it were, every thing arising out of the primordial mass, first the simple elements, and then the compounded and more curious creatures, and are led, step by step, full of wonder and admiration, until we see the whole completed. So that, in condescension to our capacity, it was, that God divided the creation into stated periods, and prolonged the succession of what he could have done in six moments, to the term of six days, that we might have clearer notions of his eternal power and godhead, and every particular day of the week, new and particular works, for which we are to praise him. And this, by the bye, suggests another argument, founded on the institution of the Sabbath day: For if, 'in six days, the Lord made heaven and earth, and, resting on the seventh day, did bless and sanctify it,' this seems to imply, that God obliged himself to continue the work of the creation for six days, that showing himself (if I may so say) a divine example of weekly labour, and sabbatical rest, he might more effectually signify to mankind, what tribute of duty he would require of them, viz., that one day in seven, abstaining from business and worldly labour, they should devote and consecrate it to his honour, and religious worship.

There is therefore no necessity of departing from the literal sense of the Scripture in this particular. The reiterated acts, and the different operations mentioned by Moses, ought indeed to be explained in such a manner, as is consistent with the infinite power, and perfect simplicity of the acts of God, and in such a manner, as may exclude all notions of weakness, weariness, or imperfection in him; but all this may be done without receding from a successive creation, which redounds so much to the glory of God, and affords the whole intelligent creation so fair a field for contemplation.

Some of the Jewish doctors are of opinion, that in the first day, when God created light, at the same time, he formed and compacted it into a sun; and that the sun is mentioned again on the fourth day, merely by way of repetition; while others maintain, that this light was a certain luminous body (not unlike that which conducted the children of Israel in the wilderness) that moved round the world, until the day wherein the sun was created. But there is no occasion for such conjectures as these: every one knows, that darkness has, in all ages, been the chief idea which men have had of a chaos. ¹ Both poets and philosophers have made Nox, and Erebus, and Tartarus, the principal parts and ingredients of its description; and therefore it seems very agreeable to the reason of mankind, that the first remove from the chaos should be a tendency to light. But then by light (as it was produced the first day,) we must not understand the darting of rays from a luminous body, such as do now proceed from the sun, ² but those particles of matter only, which we call fire, (whose properties we know are light and heat,) which the Almighty produced, as a proper instrument for the preparation, and digestion of all other matter. For fire, being naturally a strong and restless element, when once it was disentangled and set free, would not cease to move, and agitate from top to bottom, the whole heavy and confused mass, until the purer and more shining parts of it being separated from the grosser, and so uniting together, (as things of the same species naturally do,) did constitute that light, which, on the fourth day, was more compressed and consolidated, and so became the body of the sun.

The author of the Book of Wisdom tells us indeed, that ³ 'God ordered all things in measure, and number, and weight;' but we cannot from hence infer, that in the six days, he was so nice and curious, as to weigh out to himself in gold scales (as it were) his daily work by grains and scruples. We indeed, who are finite creatures, may talk of the 'heat and burden of the day,' and in a weekly task, are forced to proportion the labour of each day to the present condition of our strength: but this is the case of human infirmity, and no way compatible to God. To omnipotence nothing can be laborious, nor can there be more or less of pains, where all things are equally easy. But, in the mean time, how does it appear, that even, in human conception, the work of the third day, which consisted in draining the earth, and stocking it with plants; or even of the fourth day, wherein the sun and moon, and other planets were made, was more difficult, than that of the first, which is accounted the simple production of light?

The compass of the chaos (as we supposed) took up the whole solar system, or that space, which Saturn circumscribes in his circulation round the sun: and if so, what a prodigious thing was it, to give motion to this vast unwieldy mass, and to direct that motion in some sort of regularity; in the general struggle and combustion, to unite things that were no ways akin, and to sort the promiscuous elements into their proper species; to give the properties of rest and gravitation to one kind, and of ascension and elasticity to another: to make some parts subside and settle themselves, not in one continued solid, but in several different centres, at proper distances from each other, and so lay the foundation for the planets; to make others aspire and mount on high, and having obtained their liberty by hard conflict, join together, as it were, by compact, and make up one body, which, by the tenuity of its parts, and rapidity of its motion, might produce light and heat, and so lay the foundation for the sun; to place this luminous body in a situation proper to influence the upper parts of the chaos, and to be the instrument of rarefaction, separation, and all the rest of the operations to ensue; to cause it, when thus placed, either to circulate round the whole planetary system, or to make the planetary globes to turn round it, in order to produce the vicissitudes of day and night, to do all this, and more than this, I say, as it is included in the single article of creating light, is enough to make the first day, wherein nature was utterly impotent, (as having motion then first impressed upon her,) a day of more labour and curious contrivance than any subsequent one could be, when nature was become more awake and active, and some assistance might possibly be expected from the instrumentality of second causes.

To excavate some parts of the earth, and raise others, in order to make the waters subside into proper channels, is thought a work not so comporting with the dignity and majesty of God; and therefore "some have thought that it possibly might have been effected by the same causes that occasion earthquakes, that is, by subterraneous fires and flatuses. What incredible effects the ascension of gunpowder has, we may see every day: how it rends rocks, and blows up the most ponderous and solid walls, towers, and edifices, so that its force is almost irresistible. And why then might not such a proportionable quantity of the like materials, set on fire together, raise up the mountains, (how great and weighty soever,) and the whole superlicies of the earth above the waters, and so make receptacles for them to run into. ⁴ Thus we have a channel for the sea, even by the intervention of second causes: nor are we destitute of good authority to patronize this notion; for, after that the Psalmist had said, 'the waters stood above the mountains,' immediately he subjoins, 'at thy rebuke they fled, at the voice of thy thunder (an earthquake, we know, is but a subterraneous thunder) 'they hasted away, and went down to the valley beneath, even unto the place which thou hadst appointed to them.'

^a This we may conceive to have been effected by some particles of fire still left in the bowels of the earth, whereby such nitro-sulphurous vapours were kindled, as made an earthquake, which both lifted up the earth, and also made receptacles for the waters to run into. Patrick's Commentary.

However this be, it is probable, and (if our hypothesis¹ be right) it is certain, that on the fourth day, the sun, moon, and planets, were pretty well advanced in their formation. The luminous matter extracted from the chaos on the first day, being a little more condensed, and put into a proper orb, became the sun, and the planets had all along been working off, in the same degrees of progression with the earth; so that the labour of this day could not be so disproportionably great as is imagined. It is true indeed, the Scripture tells us, that God on this day, 'not only made the sun and the moon, but that he made the stars also;' and, considering the almost infinite number of these heavenly bodies, (which we may discern with our eyes, and much more with glasses,) we cannot but say, that a computation of this kind would swell the work of the fourth day to a prodigious disproportion: but then we are to observe, that our English translation has interpolated the words, 'he made,' which are not in the original; for the simple version of the Hebrew is this—and² 'God made two great lights, the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night and the stars;' which last words 'and the stars' are not to be referred to the word 'made' in the beginning of the verse, but to the word 'rule,' which immediately goes before them; and so this sentence, 'the lesser light to rule the night, and the stars:' will only denote the peculiar usefulness and pre-eminence of the moon above all other stars or planets, in respect of this earth of ours; in which sense it may not improperly be styled (as^a some of the most polite authors are known to call it) the 'ruler of the night,' and 'a queen,' or 'goddess,' as it were, among the stars. With regard to us, therefore, who are the inhabitants of the earth, the moon, though certainly an opaque body, may not be improperly called 'a great light;' since, by reason of its proximity, it communicates more light, (not of its own indeed, but what it borrows from the sun), and is of more use and benefit to us than all the other planets put together. Nor must we forget (what indeed deserves a peculiar observation) that the moon,³ by its constant deviations towards the poles, affords a stronger and more lasting light to the inhabitants of those forlorn regions, whose long and tedious nights are of some days', nay, of some months' continuance, than if its motion were truly circular, and the rays it reflects consequently more oblique. A mighty comfort and refreshment this to them, and a singular instance of the great Creator's wisdom in contriving, and mercy in preserving all his works!

St Paul, in his epistle to the Romans, makes all mankind (as certainly our first parent literally was) clay in the hands of the potter, and thereupon he asks this question; 'Nay but, O man, who art thou, that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, why hast thou formed me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour?' It but badly becomes us therefore to inquire into the reason that might induce God to make the man and the woman at different times, and of different materials; and it is an impertinent, as well as impious banter, to pretend to be so frugal of his pains. What if God, willing to show a pleasing variety in his works, condescended to have the matter, whereof the woman was formed, pass twice through his hands, in order to^b soften the temper, and meliorate the composition? Some peculiar qualities, remarkable in the female sex, might perhaps justify this supposition: but the true reason, as I take it, is couched in these words of Adam,⁵ 'This is now bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh; she shall be called^c woman, because she was taken out of man: therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and cleave to his wife, and they shall be one flesh.'

Since God was determined, then, to form the woman out of some part of the man's body, and might probably have a mystical meaning in so doing; to have taken her (like the poet's Minerva) out of the head, might have entitled her to a superiority which he never intended for her; to have made her of any inferior, or more dishonourable part, would not have agreed with that equality to which she was appointed; and therefore he took her out of the man's side, to denote the obligations to the strictest friendship and society: to beget the strongest love and sympathy between him and her, as parts of the same whole; and to recommend marriage to all mankind, as founded in nature, and as the re-union of man and woman.

It is an easy matter to be sceptical; but small reason, I think, there is to wonder, why no mention is made in this place of the inspiration of the woman's soul. What the historian means here, is only to represent a peculiar circumstance in the woman's composition, viz. her assumption from the man's side: and therefore what relates to the creation of her soul must be presumed to go before, and is indeed signified in the preface God makes before he begins the work; ¹ 'It is not good that man should be alone, I will make him an help-meet for him,'² that is, of the same ³ essential qualities with himself. For we cannot conceive of what great comfort this woman would have been to Adam, had she not been endowed with a rational part, capable of conversing with him; had she not had, I say, the same understanding, will, and affections, though perhaps in a lower degree, and with some accommodation to the weakness of her sex, in order to recommend her beauty, and to endear that softness wherein (as I hinted before) she had certainly the pre-eminence.

Such is the history which Moses gives us of the origin of the world, and the production of mankind: and if we should now compare it with what we meet with in other nations recorded of these great events, we shall soon perceive, that it is the only rational and philosophical account extant; which, considering the low ebb that learning was at in the Jewish nation, is no small argument of its divine revelation. What a wretched account was that of the Egyptians, (from whence the Epicureans borrowed their hypothesis,) that the world was made by chance, and mankind grew out of the earth like pumpkins? What strange stories does the Grecian theology tell us of Ouranos and Ge, Jupiter and Saturn; and what sad work do their ancient writers make, when they come to form men and women out of projected stones? How unaccountably does the Phenician historian³ make a dark and windy air the principle of the universe; all intelligent creatures to be formed alike in the shape of an egg, and both male and female awakened into life by a great thunder-clap? The Chinese are accounted a wise people, and yet the articles of their creed are such as these—That one Tayn, who lived in heaven, and was famous for his wisdom, disposed the parts of the world into the order we find them; that he created out of nothing the first man Panson, and his wife Pansone; that this Panson, by a power from Tayn, created another man called Tanhon, who was a great naturalist, and thirteen men more, by whom the world was peopled, till, after a while, the sky fell upon the earth, and destroyed them all; but that the wise Tayn afterwards created another man, called Lotziram, who had two horns, and an odoriferous body, and from whom proceeded several men and women, who stocked the world with the present inhabitants. But, of all others, the Mahometan account is the most ridiculous; for it tells us, that the first things which were created, were the Throne of God, ^a Adam,

Paradise, and a great pen, wherewith God wrote his decrees: that this throne was carried about upon angels' necks, whose heads were so big, that birds could not fly in a thousand years from one ear to another; that the heavens were propped up by the mountain Koff; that the stars were firebrands, thrown against the devils when they invaded heaven, and that the earth stands upon the top of a great cow's horn; that this cow stands upon a white stone, this stone upon a mountain, and this mountain upon God knows what; with many more absurdities of the like nature.

These are some accounts of the world's creation, which nations of great sagacity in other respects have at least pretended to believe. But alas! how sordid and trifling are they, in comparison of what we read in the book of Genesis, where every thing is easy and natural, comporting with God's majesty, and not repugnant to the principles of philosophy? Nay, where every thing agrees with the positions of the greatest men in the Heathen world, ^b the sentiments of their wisest philosophers, and the descriptions of their most renowned poets. So that were we to judge of Moses at the bar of reason, merely as an historian; had we none of those supernatural proofs of the divinity of his writings, which set them above the sphere of all human composition; had his vicegerent: that, surprised at this news, the Earth desired Gabriel to represent her fears to God, that this creature, whom he was going to make in this manner, would one day rebel against him, and draw down his curse upon her: that Gabriel returned, and made report to God of the Earth's remonstrances; but God resolving to execute his design despatched Michael, and afterwards Asraphel, with the same commission: that these two angels returned in like manner to report the Earth's excuses and absolute refusal to contribute to this work; whereupon he deputed Azrael, who, without saying any thing to the Earth took an handful out of each of the seven different layers or beds, and carried it to a place in Arabia, between Mecca and Taief; that after the angels had mixed and kneaded the earth which Azrael brought, God, with his own hand, formed out of it an human statue, and having left it in the same place for some time to dry, not long after communicating his spirit, or enlivening breath, infused life and understanding into it, and clothing it in a wonderful dress, suitable to its dignity, commanded the angels to fall prostrate before it, which Eblis (by whom they mean Lucifer) refusing to do, was immediately driven out of paradise. N. B. The difference of the earth employed in the formation of Adam, is of great service to the Malometans in explaining the different colours and qualities of mankind who are derived from it, some of whom are white, others black, others tawny, yellow, olive-coloured, and red; some of one humour, inclination, and complexion, and others of a quite different.—Cabal's Dictionary on the word Adam.

^b Thales, whom the Greeks suppose to be the first who deeply studied the causes of nature's works, asserts that the world is the work of God, and that God of all things is the most ancient since he had no beginning. Pythagoras said, that as often as he contemplated the fabric and beauty of this world, he seemed to hear that word of God, by which it was commanded to be. Plato thought that God did not form the world out of matter eternal and coeval with himself, but that he made it out of nothing, and according to his good pleasure, he also believed, that man was not only made by God, but that he was made after the image of God, and had a spirit akin and like to his Maker. Among the Latin poets, Virgil speaks after the same mode, when he introduces Silenus singing how the tender ball of earth grew out of the compressed seeds or ingredients of all things; and Ovid, too, when he tells of the birth of heaven and earth, and of man being formed after the image of God; while among the Greeks, Hesiod, in his Theogony, has celebrated, in most melodious lines, the formation of all things quite according to the doctrine of Moses. — Huetius' Inquiries.

^a As to the formation of Adam's body, Malometans tell us many strange circumstances, viz., That after God, by long continued rains, had prepared the slime of the earth, out of which he was to form it, he sent the angel Gabriel, and commanded him, of seven layers of earth, to take out of each an handful; that upon Gabriel's coming to the Earth, he told her, that God had determined to extract that out of her bowels, wherof he proposed to make man, who was to be sovereign over all, and his works none of that manifest advantage of antiquity above all others we ever yet saw; and were we not allowed to presume, that his living near the time which he makes the era of the world's creation, gave him great assistances in point of tradition; were we, I say, to wave all this that might be alleged in his behalf; yet the very manner of his treating the subject gives him a preference above all others. Nor can we, without admiration, see a person who had none of the systems before him which we now so much value, giving us a clearer idea of things, in the way of an easy narrative, than any philosopher, with all his hard words and new-invented terms, has yet been able to do; and, in the compass of two short chapters, comprising all that has been advanced with reason, even from his own time to this very day.

THOUGH the author of the Pentateuch¹ never once attempts to prove the being of a God, as taking it all along for a thing undeniable; yet it may not be improper for us, in this place, to take a cursory view of the works of the creation, (as far at least as they come under the Mosaic account,) in order to show the existence, the wisdom, the greatness, and the goodness of their almighty Maker.

Let us then cast our eyes up to the firmament, where the rich handy-work of God presents itself to our sight, and ask ourselves some such questions as these. What power built, over our heads, this vast and magnificent arch, and 'spread out the heavens like a curtain?' Who garnished these heavens with such a variety of shining objects, a thousand, and ten thousand times ten thousand different stars, new suns, new moons, new worlds, in comparison of which this earth of ours is but a point, all regular in their motions, and swimming in their liquid ether? Who painted the clouds with such a variety of colours, and in such diversity of shades and figures, as is not in the power of the finest pencil to emulate? Who formed the sun of such a determinate size, and placed it at such a convenient distance, as not to annoy, but only refresh us, and nourish the ground with its kindly warmth? If it were larger, it would set the earth on fire; if less, it would leave it frozen: if it were nearer us, we should be scorched to death; if farther from us, we should not be able to live for want of heat: who then hath made it so commodious² 'a tabernacle (I speak with the Scriptures, and according to the common notion) out of which it cometh forth,' every morning, 'like a bridegroom out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as a giant, to run his course?' For so many ages past, it never failed rising at its appointed time, nor once missed sending out the dawn to proclaim its approach: but at whose voice does it arise, and by whose hand is it directed in its diurnal and annual course, to give us the blessed vicissitudes of the day and night, and the regular succession of different seasons? That it should always proceed in the same straight path, and never once be known to step aside; that it should turn at a certain determinate point, and not go forward in a space where there is nothing to obstruct it; that it should traverse the same path back again in the same constant and regular pace, to bring on the seasons by gradual advances: that the moon should supply the office of the sun, and appear at set times, to illuminate the air, and give a vicarious light, when its brother is gone to carry the day to the other hemisphere;³ that it should procure, or at least regulate the fluxes and refluxes of the sea, whereby the water is kept in constant motion, and so preserved from putrefaction, and accommodated to man's manifold conveniences, besides the business of fishing, and the use of navigation: in a word, that the rest of the planets, and all the innumerable host of heavenly bodies should perform their courses and revolutions, with so much certainty and exactness, as never once to fail. but, for almost this 6000 years, come constantly about in the same period, to the hundredth part of a minute; this is such a clear and incontestable proof of a divine architect, and of that counsel and wisdom wherewith he rules and directs the universe, as made the Roman philosopher, with good reason, conclude, "That⁴ whoever imagines, that the wonderful order, and incredible constancy of the heavenly bodies, and their motions (whereupon the preservation and welfare of all things do depend) is not governed by an intelligent being, himself is destitute of understanding. For shall we, when we see an artificial engine, a sphere, a dial, for instance, acknowledge at first sight, that it is the work of art and understanding; and yet, when we behold the heavens, moved and whirled about with an incredible velocity, most constantly finishing their anniversary vicissitudes, make any doubt, that these are the performances, not only of reason, but of a certain excellent and divine reason?"

And if Tully, from the very imperfect knowledge of astronomy, which his time afforded, could be so confident, that the heavenly bodies were framed, and moved by a wise and understanding mind, as to declare, that, in his opinion, whosoever asserted the contrary, was himself destitute of understanding; ⁵ what would he have said, had he been acquainted with the modern discoveries of astronomy; the immense greatness of the world, that part of it (I mean) which falls under our observation; the exquisite regularity of the motions of all the planets, without any deviation or confusion; the inexpressible nicety of adjustment in the primary velocity of the earth's annual motion; the wonderful proportion of its diurnal motion about its own centre, for the distinction of light and darkness; the exact accommodation of the densities of the planets to their distances from the sun; the admirable order, number, and usefulness of the several satellites, which move about the respective planets; the motion of the comets, which are now found to be as regular and periodical, as that of other planetary bodies; and, lastly, the preservation of the several systems, and of the several planets and comets in the same system, from falling upon each other: what, I say, would Tully, that great master of reason, have thought and said, if these, and other newly discovered instances of the inexpressible accuracy and wisdom of the works of God, had been observed and considered in his days? Certainly atheism, which even then was unable to withstand the arguments drawn from this topic, must now, upon the additional strength of these later observations, be utterly ashamed to show its head, and forced to acknowledge, that it was an eternal and almighty Being: God alone, who gave these celestial bodies their proper mensuration and temperature of heat, their dueness of distance, and regularity of motion, or, in the phrase of the prophet, ¹ 'who established the world by his wisdom, and stretched out the heavens by his understanding.'

If, from the firmament, we descend to the orb whereon we live, what a glorious proof of the divine wisdom do we meet with in this intermediate expansion of the air, which is so wonderfully contrived, as, at one and the same time, to support clouds for rain, and to afford winds for health and traffic; to be proper for the breath of animals by its spring, for causing sounds by its motion, and for conveying light by its transparency? But whose power was it, that made so thin and fluid an element, the safe repository of thunder and lightning, of winds and tempests? By whose command, and out of whose treasures, are these meteors sent forth to purify the air, which would otherwise stagnate, and consume the vapours, which would otherwise annoy us? And by what skilful hand is the ² water, which is drawn from the sea, by a natural distillation made fresh, and bottled up, as it were, in the clouds, to be sent upon the 'wings of the wind' into different countries, and, in a manner, equally dispersed, and distributed, over the face of the earth, in gentle showers?

Whose power and wisdom was it, that 'hanged the earth upon nothing,' and gave it a spherical figure, the most commodious that could be devised, both for the consistency of its parts, and the velocity of its motion? That 'weighed the mountains in scales,' and 'the hills in a balance,' and disposed of them in their most proper places for fruitfulness and health? That diversified the climates of the earth into such an agreeable variety, that, at the farthest distance, each one has its proper seasons, day and night, winter and summer? That clothed the face of it with plants and flowers, so exquisitely adorned with various and inimitable beauties, that even 'Solomon, in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of them?' That placed the plant in the seed (as the young is in the womb of animals) in such elegant complications, as afford at once both a pleasing and astonishing spectacle? That painted and perfumed the flowers, gave them the sweet odours which they diffuse in the air for our delight, and, with one and the same water, dyed them into different colours, the scarlet, the purple, the carnation, surpassing the imitation, as well as comprehension of mankind? That has replenished it with such an infinite variety of living creatures, ³ so like, and at the same time so unlike to each other, that of the innumerable particulars wherein each creature differs from all others, every one is known to have its peculiar beauty, and singular use? Some walk, some creep, some fly, some swim; but every one has members and organs ⁴ fitted to its peculiar motions. In a word, the pride of the horse, and the feathers of the peacock, the largeness of the camel, and the smallness of the insect, are equal demonstrations of an infinite wisdom and power. Nay, 'the smaller the creature is, the more amazing is the workmanship; and when in a little mite, we do (by the help of glasses) see limbs perfectly well organized, a head, a body, legs, and feet, all distinct, and as well proportioned for their size, as those of the vastest elephants; and consider withal, that, in every part of this living atom, there are muscles, nerves, veins, arteries, and blood; and in that blood ramous particles and humours; and in those humours, some drops that are composed of other minute particles: when we consider all this,—I say, can we help being lost in wonder and astonishment, or refrain crying out, with the blessed apostle, ⁵ 'O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom, and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his works, and his ways of' creation and providence 'past finding out!'

But there is another thing in animals, both terrestrial and aqueous, no less wonderful than their frame; and that is their natural instinct. In compliance with the common form of speech I call it so; but in reality, it is the providential direction of them, by an all-wise, and all-powerful mind. For what else has infused into birds the art of building their nests, either hard or soft, according to the constitution of their young? What else makes them keep so constantly in their nests, while they are hatching their young, as if they knew the philosophy of their own warmth, and its aptness for animation? What else moves the swallow, upon the approach of winter, to fly to a more temperate climate, as if it understood the celestial signs, the influence of the stars, and the change of seasons? What else ⁶ causes the salmon, every year, to ascend from the sea up a river, some four or five hundred miles perhaps, only to cast its spawn, and secure it in banks of sand, until the young be hatched, or excluded, and then return to the sea again? How these creatures, when they have been wandering, a long time, in the wide ocean, should again find out, and repair to the mouth of the same rivers, seems to me very strange, and hardly accountable, without having recourse either to some impression given a "Where has nature disposed so many senses, as in a gnat?" (says Pliny in his Natural History, when considering the body of that insect,) "Where hath nature planted its organs of sight, and taste, and smell? where hath she generated that angry and shrill voice? and with what cunning adjoined its wings, lengthened its legs in front, and arranged that hungry cavity like a belly so greedy of blood, especially human? with what skill hath she pointed its sting for pricking the skin? and, although its stenderness be so great as to render it invisible, yet hath she made it so as to serve a double purpose, being sharpened in point for penetrating the skin, and at the same time hollowed out for sucking up the blood?" And if Pliny made so many queries concerning the body of a gnat, (which, by his own confession, is none of the least of insects,) what would he, in all likelihood, have done, had he seen the bodies of these animals, which are discernible by glasses, to the number of ten, twenty, or thirty thousand in a drop of pepper-water, not larger than a grain of millet? And if these creatures be so very small, what must we think of their muscles, and other parts? Certain it is, that the mechanism, by which nature performs the muscular motion, is exceedingly minute and curious, and to the performance of every muscular motion, in greater animals at least, there are not fewer distinct parts concerned, than many millions of millions, and these visible through a microscope.—Ray's Wisdom of God in the Creation.

at their first creation, or the immediate and continual direction, of a superior cause. In a word,¹ can we behold the spider's net, the silk worms' webs, the bees' cells, or the ants' granaries, without being lost in the contemplation, and forced to acknowledge that infinite wisdom of their Creator, who either directs their unerring steps himself, or has given them a genius (if I may so call it) fit to be an emblem, and to show mankind the pattern of art, industry, and frugality?

If from the earth, and the creatures which live upon it, we cast our eye upon the water, we soon perceive, that it is a liquid and transparent body, and that, had it been more or less rarefied, it had not been so proper for the use of man: but who gave it that just configuration of parts, and exact degree of motion, as to make it both so fluent, and at the same time so strong, as to carry and waft away the most unwieldy burdens? Who hath taught the rivers to run, in winding streams, through vast tracts of land, in order to water them more plentifully; then throw themselves into the ocean, to make it the common centre of commerce; and so, by secret and imperceptible channels, return to their fountain-head, in one perpetual circulation? Who stored and replenished these rivers with fish of all kinds, which glide, and sport themselves in the limpid streams, and run heedlessly into the fisher's net, or come greedily to the angler's hook, in order to be caught (as it were) for the use and entertainment of man? The great and wide sea is a very awful and stupendous work of God, and the flux and reflux of its waters are not the easiest phenomena in nature.² All that we know of certainty is this, that the tide carries and brings us back to certain places, at precise hours: but whose hand is it that makes it stop, and then return with such regularity? A little more or less motion in this fluid mass would disorder all nature, and a small incitement upon a tide ruin whole kingdoms: who then was so wise, as to take such exact measures in immense bodies, and who so strong, as to rule the rage of that proud element at discretion? Even he,³ who hath placed the sand for the bound thereof, by a perpetual decree, that it cannot pass; and placed the Leviathan (among other animals of all kinds) 'therein to take his pastime, out of whose nostrils goeth a smoke, and whose breath kindleth coals;' so that 'he maketh the deep to boil like a pot, and maketh the sea like a pot of ointment,' as the author of the book of ⁴ Job elegantly describes that most important creature.

If now, from the world itself, we turn our eyes more particularly upon man, the principal inhabitant that God has placed therein, no understanding certainly can be so low and mean, no heart so stupid and insensible, as not plainly to see, that nothing but infinite wisdom could, in so wonderful a manner, have fashioned his body, and inspired into it a being of superior faculties, whereby he⁵ 'teacheth us more than the beasts of the field, and maketh us wiser than the fowls of heaven.'

Should any of us see a lump of clay rise immediately from the ground into the complete figure of a man, full of beauty and symmetry, and endowed with all the parts and faculties we perceive in ourselves, and possibly far more exquisite and beautiful; should we presently, after his formation, observe him perform all the operations of life, sense, and reason; move as gracefully, talk as eloquently, reason as justly, and do every thing as dexterously, as the most accomplished man breathing: the same was the case, and the same the moment of time, in God's formation of our first parent. But (to give the thing a stronger impression upon the mind) we will suppose, 'that this figure rises by degrees, and is finished part by part, in some succession of time; and that, when the whole is completed, the veins and arteries bored, the sinews and tendons laid, the joints fitted, and the liquor (transmutable into blood and juices) lodged in the ventricles of the heart, God infuses into it a vital principle; whereupon the liquor in the heart begins to descend, and thrill along the veins, and an heavenly blush arises in the countenance, such as scorns the help of art, and is above the power of imitation. The image moves, it walks, it speaks: it moves with such a majesty, as proclaims it the lord of the creation, and talks with such an accent, and sublimity of sentiment, as makes every ear attentive, and even its great Creator enter into converse with it: were we to see all this transacted before our eyes, I say, we could not but stand astonished at the thing; and yet this is an exact emblem of every man's formation, and a contemplation it is, that made holy David break out into this rapturous acknowledgement⁷ 'Lord! I will give thee thanks, for I am fearfully and wonderfully made; marvellous are thy works, and that my soul knoweth right well: thine eyes did see my substance, yet being imperfect, and in thy book were all my members written.'

Nay, so curious is the texture of the human body, and in every part so full of wonder, that even Galen himself, (who was otherwise backward enough to believe a God,) after he had carefully surveyed the frame of it, and viewed the fitness and usefulness of every part, the many 'several intentions of every little vein, bone, and muscle, and the beautiful composition of the whole, fell into a pang of devotion, and wrote an hymn to his Creator's praise.⁸ And, if in the make of the body, how much more does the divine wisdom appear in the creation of the soul of man, a substance immaterial, but united to the body by a copula imperceptible, and yet so strong, as to make them mutually operate, and sympathize with each other, in all their pleasures and their pains; a substance endued with those wonderful faculties of thinking, understanding, judging, reasoning, choosing, acting, and (which is the end and excellency of all) the power of knowing, obeying, imitating, and praising its Creator; though certainly neither it, nor any superior rank of beings, angels, and archangels, or a Galen, in his book, On the Formation of the Embryo, takes notice, that there are, in a human body, above 600 muscles, in each of which there are, at least, ten several intentions, or due qualifications, to be observed; so that, about the muscles alone, no less than 6000 several ends and aims are to be attended to. The bones are reckoned to be 284, and the distinct scopes, or intentions of each of these, are above 40; in all, about 12,000; and thus it is in some proportion with all the other parts, the skin, ligaments, vessels, and humours; but more especially with the several vessels of the body, which do, in regard of the great variety and multitude of those several intentions required to them, very much exceed the homogeneous parts.—Hilkin's Natural Religion.

the 'whole host of heaven' can worthily and sufficiently do it; ¹ for who can express the mighty acts of the Lord, or show forth all his praise?²

Thus, which way soever we turn our eyes, whether we look upwards or downwards, without us, or within us, upon the animate or inanimate parts of the creation; we shall find abundant reason to take up the words of the Psalmist, and say, ² O Lord, how wonderful are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all; the earth is full of thy riches.³ O, that men would therefore praise the Lord for his goodness, and declare the wonders that he doeth for the children of men! that they would offer him the sacrifice of thanksgiving, and tell out all his works with gladness!¹

SECT. II.

CHAP. I.—Of the state of man's innocence.

THE HISTORY.

As soon as the seventh day from the creation (the first day, as we said of Adam's life, and consequently the first day of the week) was begun, Adam, awaking out of his sleep, musing, very probably, on his vision the preceding night, beheld the fair figure of a woman approaching him, ^a conducted by the hand of her almighty Maker; and, as she advanced, the several innocent beauties that adorned her person, the comeliness of her shape, and gracefulness of her gesture, the lustre of her eye, and sweetness of her looks, discovered themselves in every step more and more.

It is not to be expressed, nor now conceived, ^b what a full tide of joy entered in at the soul of our first parent, when he surveyed this lovely creature, who was destined to be the partner and companion of his life; when, by a secret sympathy, he felt that she was of his own likeness, and complexion, 'bone of his bone, and flesh of his

^a It is the general opinion of interpreters, both Jewish and Christian, that God himself, or, more particularly, the second person in the ever-blessed Trinity, God the Son (who is therefore styled in Scripture, Isa. lxiii. 9. 'the angel of God's presence') appeared to Adam, on this and sundry other occasions, in a visible glorious majesty, such as the Jews call the Schechinah, which seems to have been a very shining flame, or amazing splendour of light, breaking out of a thick cloud, of which we afterward read very frequently, under the name of the glory of the Lord, and to which we cannot suppose our first parents to have been strangers. We therefore look upon it as highly probable, that this divine Majesty first conducted Eve to the place where Adam was, and not long after their marriage, conveyed them both, from the place where they were formed, into the garden of Eden.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b Milton has expressed the joy and transport of Adam, upon his first sight of Eve, in the following manner:

When out of hope, behold her! not far off;
Such as I saw her in my dream, adorn'd
With what all earth, or heaven could bestow,
To make her amiable. On she came,
Led by her heavenly Maker (though unseen)
And guided by his voice; not uninform'd
Of nuptial sanctity, and marriage rites.
Grace was in all her steps, heav'n in her eye,
In ev'ry gesture dignity and love.
I overjoy'd, could not forbear aloud.
"This turn hath made amends, thou hast fulfill'd
Thy words, Creator bounteous, and benign!
Giver of all things fair! but fairest this
Of all thy gifts."

flesh,' his very self, diversified only into another sex; and could easily foresee, that the love and union which was now to commence between them was to be perpetual, and for ever inseparable. ³ For the same divine hand which conducted the woman to the place where Adam was, presented her to him in the capacity of a matrimonial father; and, ^c having joined them together in the nuptial state, pronounced his benediction over them, to the intent that ⁵ they might enjoy unmolested the dominion he had given them over the other parts of the creation, and, being themselves ^d fruitful in the procreation of children, might live to see the earth replenish'd with a numerous progeny, descended from their loins.

In the mean time God had taken care to provide our first parents ^e with a pleasant and delightful habitation

^c The words of Milton upon this occasion are extremely fine.

— all heav'n,
And happy constellations, on that hour
Shed their selectest influence; the earth
Gave sign of gratulation, and each hill:
Joyous the birds; fresh gales, and gentle airs
Whisper'd it to the woods, and from their wings
Flung rose, stung odours, from the spicy shrub, Disporting.

Nor can we pass by his episode upon marriage, which, for its grave and majestic beauty, is inimitable.

Hail wedded love! mysterious law! true source
Of human offspring! sole propriety
In paradise, of all things common else!
By thee adult'rous lust was driv'n from men,
Among the bestial herds to range; by thee
(Founded in reason, loyal, just, and pure)
Relations dear, and all the charities
Of father, son, and brother, first were known.
Perpetual fountain of domestic sweets!
Whose bed is undefil'd, and chaste pronounc'd—
Here love his golden shafts employs; here fights
His constant lamp, and waves his purple wings;
Reigns here and revels—

^d The words of the text are, 'Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth;' whereupon some have made it a question, whether this is not a command, obliging all men to marriage and procreation, as most of the Jewish doctors are of opinion? But to this it may be replied. 1. That it is indeed a command obliging all men so far, as did not suffer the extinction of mankind, in which sense it did absolutely bind Adam and Eve, as also Noah, and his sons, and their wives, after the flood; but, 2. that it does not oblige every particular man to marry, appears from the example of our Lord Jesus, who lived and died in an unmarried state; from his commendation of those who made themselves 'eunuchs for the kingdom of God,' Mat. xix. 12.; and from St Paul's frequent approbation of virginity, 1 Cor. vii. 1, &c. And therefore, 3. it is here rather a permission than a command, though it be expressed in the form of a command, as other permissions frequently are. See Gen. ii. 16. Deut. xiv. 1.—Poole's Annotations.

^e The description which Milton gives us of the garden of paradise, is very agreeable in several places, but in one more especially, where he represents the pleasing variety of it.

— Thus was this place

A happy rural seat of various view.
Groves, whose rich trees wept of rous gums and balm;
Others, whose fruit burnish'd with golden rind, Hung amiable; (Hesperian fables true,
If true, here only) and of delicious taste,
Betwixt them lawns, or level downs, and flocks,
Grazing the tender herb, were interpos'd;
Or palmy hillock, or the flow'ry lap
Of some irriguous valley spread her store.
Flowers of all hue, and without thorn the rose.
Another side umbrageous grots, and caves
Of cool recess, o'er which the mantling vine
Lays forth her purple grape, and gently creeps Luxuriant. Meanwhile murm'ring waters fall Down the slope hills, dispers'd, or in a lake (That to the fringed bank, with myrtle crown'd,
Her crystal mirror holds) unite their streams.
The birds their choir apply. Aërs, vernal airs, in the country of Eden, ¹ which was watered by four rivers; by the Tigris, in Scripture called Hiddekel, on one side, and by Euphrates on the other, which, joining their streams together in a place where (not long after the flood) the famous city of Babylon was situate, pass through a large country, and then dividing again, form the two rivers, which the sacred historian calls Pison, and Gihon, and so water part of the garden of paradise, wherein were all kinds of trees, herbs, and flowers, which could in any way delight the sight, the taste, or the smell.

Among other trees, however, there were two of very remarkable names and properties planted 'in the midst,' or most eminent part of the garden, to be always within the view and observation of our first parents, 'the tree of life,' so called, ² because it had a virtue in it, not only to repair the animal spirits, as other nourishment does, but likewise to preserve and ^a maintain them in the same equal temper and state wherein they were created, without pain, diseases, or decay; and 'the tree of knowledge of good and evil,' so called, ³ not because it had a virtue to confer any such knowledge, but ^b because the devil, in his temptation of the woman, pretended that it had; pretended, that ⁴ as God knew all things, and was himself subject to no one's control, so the eating of this tree would confer on them the same degree of knowledge, and put them in the same state of independency: and from this unfortunate deception (whereof God might speak by way of anticipation) it did not improperly derive its name.

Into this ^c paradise of much pleasure, but some dan-

^a Others think, that the 'tree of life' was so called, in a symbolical sense, as it was a sign and token of that life which man had received from God, and of his continual enjoyment of it, without diminution, had he persisted in his obedience, and as this garden, say they, was confessedly a type of heaven, so God might intend by this tree to represent that immortal life which he meant to bestow upon mankind himself, Rev. xxii. 2. according to which is that famous saying of St. Austin, 'In the other trees he had nourishment, in these an oath.'—Patrick's Commentary.

^b Others think the 'tree of knowledge' was so called, either in respect to God, who was minded by this tree to prove our first parents, whether they would be good or bad, which was to be known by their abstaining from the fruit, or eating it; or in respect to them, who, in the event, found by sad experience, the difference between good and evil, which they knew not before; but they found the difference to be this, that good is that which gives the mind pleasure and assurance; but evil that which is always attended with sorrow and regret.—Poole's Annotations, and Young's Sermons, vol. 1.

^c The word 'paradise,' which the Septuagint make use of (whether it be of Hebrew, Chaldee, or Persian original) signifies 'a place enclosed for pleasure and delight;' either a park where beasts do range, or a spot of ground stocked with choice plants, which is properly a garden; or curiously set with trees, yielding all manner of fruit, which is an orchard. There are three places in the Hebrew text of the Old Testament, wherein this word is found. 1. Nehemiah ii. 8. where that prophet requests of Artaxerxes' letters to Asaph, the keeper of the king's forest, or paradise; 2. in the Song of Solomon, iv. 13. where he says, that the plants of the spouse 'are an orchard of pomegranates;' and ger, wherein was one tree of a pernicious quality, though all the rest were good in their kind, and extremely salutary, the Lord God conducted our first parents, who, at this time, were naked, and yet not ashamed, because their innocence was their protection. They had no sinful inclinations in their bodies, no evil concupiscence in their minds, to make them blush; and withal, the temperature of the climate was such, as needed no clothing to defend them from the weather, God having given them (as we may imagine) a survey of their new habitation, shown them the various beauties of the place, the work wherein they were to employ themselves by day, and ^d the bower wherein they were to repose themselves by night, granted them to eat of the fruit of every tree in the garden, except that one, 'the tree of knowledge of good and evil,' which (how lovely soever it might appear to the eye) he strictly charged them not so much as to touch, upon the penalty of incurring his displeasure, forfeiting their right and title to eternal life, and entailing upon themselves, and their posterity, ^e mortality, diseases, and death.

With this small restraint which the divine wisdom thought proper to lay upon Adam, as a token of his subjection, and a test of his obedience, God left him to the enjoyment of this paradise, where every thing was

³. in Ecclesiastes ii. 5. where he says, 'he made himself gardens,' or paradises. In all which senses the word may very fitly be applied to the place where our first parents were to live; since it was not only a pleasant garden and fruitful orchard, but a spacious park and forest likewise, whereto the several beasts of the field were permitted to come.—Edwards's Survey of Religion, vol. 1. and Calmel's Dictionary on the word 'Paradise.'

^d The description which Milton gives us of this blissful bower, is extremely fine.

—It was a place,
Chosen by the sov'reign Planter, when he fram'd
All things to man's delightful use: the roof
Of thickest covert, was invov'n shade,
Laurel and myrtle, and what higher grew
Of firm and fragrant leaf. On either side
Acanthus and each od'rous bushy shrub,
Fenc'd up the verdant wall. Each beautiful flower,
Iris, all hues, roses, and jessamin,
Rear'd high their flourish'd heads between, and wrought
Mosaic: under foot the violet,
Crocus, and hyacinth, with rich inlay;
Broider'd the ground, more colour'd than with stone
Of costliest emblem. Other creatures here, Beast, bird, insect, or worm, durst enter none;
Such was their awe of man!

^e The words in our version are, 'In the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die;' which seem to imply, that on the day that Adam should eat of the tree of knowledge, he should die: which eventually proved not so, because he lived many years after; and therefore (as some observe very well) it should be rendered, 'Thou shalt deserve to die without remission;' for the Scripture frequently expresses by the future not only what will come to pass, but also what ought to come to pass; to which purpose there is a very apposite text in 1 Kings ii. 37. where Solomon says to Shimei, 'Go not forth hence (namely, from Jerusalem) any whither; for in the day thou goest out, and passest over the brook Kidron, thou shalt surely die,' that is, 'thou shalt deserve death without remission.' For Solomon reserved to himself the power of punishing him when he should think fit; and, in effect, he did not put him to death the same day that he disobeyed, any more than God did put Adam to death the same day that he transgressed in eating the forbidden fruit. This seems to be a good solution; though some interpreters understand the prohibition, as if God intended thereby to intimate to Adam the deadly quality of the forbidden fruit, whose poison was so very exquisite, that, on the very day he eat thereof, it would certainly have destroyed him, had not God's goodness interposed, and restrained its violence.—See Essay for a New Translation; and Le Clerc's Commentary.

A. M. I. A. C. 3004; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, 541. GEN. CH. 2. FROM VER. 8.

pleasant to the sight, and accommodated to his liking. Not thinking it convenient however for him, even in his state of innocence, to be idle or unemployed, here he appointed him to dress and keep the new plantation, which, by reason of its luxuriance, would in time, he knew, require his care. Here he was to employ his mind, as well as exercise his body; to contemplate and study the works of God; to submit himself wholly to the divine conduct; to conform all his actions to the divine will; and to live in a constant dependence upon the divine goodness. Here he was to spend his days in the continual exercises of prayer and thanksgiving; and, it may be, the natural dictates of gratitude would prompt him to offer some of the fruits of the ground, and some living creatures, by way of sacrifice to God. Here were thousands of objects to exercise his intellectual faculties, to call forth his reason, and employ it; but that wherein the ultimate perfection of his life was doubtless to consist, was the union of his soul with the supreme good, that infinite and eternal Being, which alone can constitute the happiness of man.

This was the designed felicity of our first parents. Neither they nor their posterity were to be liable to sorrow or misery of any kind, but to be possessed of a constant and never-failing happiness; and, after innumerable ages and successions, were, in their courses, to be taken up into an heavenly paradise. For ² that the terrestrial paradise was to Adam a type of heaven, and that the never-ending life of happiness promised to our first parents (if they had continued obedient, and grown up to perfection under that economy wherein they were placed) should not have been continued in this earthly, but only have commenced here, and been perpetuated in an higher state, that is, after such a trial of their obedience as the divine wisdom should think convenient, they should have been translated from earth to heaven, is the joint opinion ^a of the best ancient, both Jewish and Christian writers.

^a This same learned writer, (namely, Bishop Bull) has compiled a great many authorities from the fathers of the first centuries, all full and significant to the purpose, and to which I refer the reader, only mentioning one or two of more remarkable force and antiquity, for his present satisfaction. Justin Martyr, speaking of the creation of the world, delivers not his own private opinion only, but the common sense of Christians in his days: "We have been taught," says he, "that God, being good, did, in the beginning, make all things out of an uninformed matter for the sake of men, who, if by their works they had rendered themselves worthy of his acceptance, we presume, should have been favoured with his friendship, and reigned together with him, being made incorruptible, and impassable;" Apol. 2. Athanasius, among other things worthy our observation, con-

CHAP. II.—Difficulties obviated, and Objections explained.

THAT learned men should differ in their opinion about a question, which, it must be confessed, has its difficulties attending it, is no wonderful thing at all; but that Moses, who wrote about 850 years after the flood, should give us so particular a description of this garden, and that other sacred writers, long after him, should make such frequent mention of it, if there was never any such place, nay, if there were not then remaining some marks and characters of its situation, is pretty strange and unaccountable. The very nature of his description shows, that Moses had no imaginary paradise in his view, but a portion of this habitable earth, bounded with such countries and rivers as were very well known by the names he gave them in his time, and (as it appears from other passages in Scripture) for many ages after. ³ Eden is as evidently a real country, as Ararat, where the ark rested, or Shinar, where the sons of Noah removed after the flood. We find it mentioned as such in Scripture, as often as the other two; and there is the more reason to believe it, because, in the Mosaic account, the scene of these three memorable events is all laid in the neighbourhood of one another.

Moses, we must allow, is far from being pompous or romantic in his manner of writing: and yet it cannot be denied, but that he gives a manifest preference to this spot of ground above all others; which why he should do, we cannot imagine, unless there was really such a place as he describes: nor can we conceive, ⁴ what other foundation, both the ancient poets and philosophers could have had, for their fortunate islands, their elysian fields, their garden of Adonis, their garden of the Hesperides, their Ortygia and Toprobane, (as described by Diodorus Siculus.) which are but borrowed sketches from what our inspired penman tells us of the first terrestrial paradise.

It is not to be questioned then, but that, in the antediluvian world, there really was such a place as this garden of Eden, a place of distinguished beauty, and more remarkably pleasant in its situation; otherwise we cannot perceive, ^b why the expulsion of our first parents cerning the primordial state of our first parents, has these remarkable words: "He brought them therefore into paradise, and gave them a law, that if they should preserve the grace then given, and continue obedient, they might enjoy in paradise a life without grief, sorrow, or care; besides that they had a promise also of an immortality in the heavens;" On the Incarnation of the Word. And therefore we need less wonder, that we find it an article inserted in the common offices of the primitive church; and that in the most ancient liturgy now extant, that of Clemens, we read these words concerning Adam: "When thou broughtest him into the paradise of pleasure, thou gavest him free leave to eat of all other trees, and forbadeest him to taste of one only, for the hope of better things: that if he kept the commandment, he might receive immortality as the reward of his obedience;" Apost. Const. b. 8. c. 12.

^b Eve's lamentation upon the order which Michael brought for their departure out of paradise, is very beautiful, and affecting, in Milton.

O unexpected shock, worse far than death!

Must I thus leave thee, Paradise, thus leave

Thee, native soil? Those happy walks and shades, from that abode should be thought any part of their punishment; nor can we see, what occasion there was for placing a 'flaming sword' about the 'tree of life;' or for appointing an host of the cherubims to guard the entrance against their return. The face of nature, and the course of rivers, might possibly be altered by the violence of the flood; but this is no valid exception to the case in hand: ¹ because Moses does not describe the situation of paradise in antediluvian names. The names of the rivers, and the countries adjacent, Cush, Havilah, &c., are names of later date than the flood; nor can we suppose, but that Moses (according to the known geography of the world, when he wrote) intended to give us some hints of the place, near which Eden, in the former world, and the garden of paradise, were seated.

Now the description which Moses gives us of it, is delivered in these words.—² And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden; and a river went out of Eden to water the garden; and from thence it was parted, and became into four heads. The name of the first is Pison; that is it which compasseth the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold: and the gold of that land is good: there is bdellium, and the onyx-stone. And the name of the second river is Gihon: the same is it that compasseth the whole land of Cush. And the name of the third river is Hiddekel; that is it which goes before Assyria: and the fourth is Euphrates.' So that to discover the place of paradise, we must find out the true situation of the land of Eden, whereof it was probably a part, and then trace the courses of the rivers, and inquire into the nature of the countries which Moses here specified.

The word עֵדֶן, which in the Hebrew tongue (according to its primary acceptation) signifies, 'pleasure' and 'delight;' in a secondary sense, is frequently made the proper name of several places, which are either more remarkably fruitful in their soil, or pleasant in their situation. Now, of all the places which go under this denomination, the learned have generally looked upon these three, as the properest countries wherein to inquire for the terrestrial paradise.

1. The first is that province which the prophet ³ Amos seems to take notice of, when he divides Syria into three parts, viz. Damascus, the plain of Aven, and the house of Eden, called Cælo-Syria, or the hollow Syria, because the mountains of Libanus and Antilibanus enclose it on both sides, and make it look like a valley. But ⁴ (how great soever the names be that seem to patronise it) this, by no means, can be the Eden which Moses means; not only because it lies not to the east, but to the north of the place where he is supposed to have wrote his book, but more especially, because it is destitute of all the marks in the Mosaical description, which ought always to be the principal test in this inquiry.

2. The second place, wherein ⁵ several learned men have sought for the country of Eden, in Armenia, between the sources of the Tigris, the Euphrates, the Araxis, and the Phasis, which they suppose to be the four rivers specified by Moses. But this supposition is far from being well founded, because, according to modern discoveries, the Phasis does not rise in the mountains of Armenia (as the ancient geographers have misinformed us,) but at a great distance from them, in mount Caucasus: nor does it run from south to north, but directly contrary, from north to south, as some ⁶ late travellers have discovered. So that, according to this scheme, we want a whole river, and can no ways account for that which (according to Moses's description of it) 'went out of the country of Eden, to water the garden of paradise.'

3. The third place, and that wherein the country of Eden, as mentioned by Moses, seems most likely to be seated, is Chaldea, not far from the banks of the river Euphrates. To this purpose, when we find Rabshakeh vaunting out his master's actions, ⁷ 'Have the gods of the nations delivered them which my fathers have destroyed, as Gozan, and Haran, and Rezeph, and the children of Eden, which were in Telassar?' As Telassar, in general, signifies any garrison or fortification; so here, more particularly it denotes ⁸ that strong fort which the children of Eden held in an island of the Euphrates, towards the west of Babylon, as a barrier against the incursions of the Assyrians on that side. And therefore, in all probability, ⁹ the country of Eden lay on the west side, or rather on both sides of the river Euphrates, after its conjunction with the Tigris, a little below the place where, in process of time, the famous city of Babylon came to be built.

Thus we have found out a country called Eden, which, for its pleasure and fruitfulness, ^a (as all authors agree,) answers the character which Moses gives of it; and are now to consider the description of the four rivers, in order to ascertain the place where the garden we are in quest of was very probably situate.

'The first river is Pison, or Phison,' (as the son of Sirach calls it,) that which compasseth the land of Havilah. Now, for the better understanding of this, we must observe, that ¹⁰ when Moses wrote his history, he was, in all probability, in Arabia Petraea, on the east

a Herodotus, who was an eye-witness of it, tells us, that where Euphrates runs out into Tigris, not far from the place where Ninus is seated, that region is, of all that he ever saw, the most excellent; so fruitful in bringing forth corn, that it yieldeth two hundred fold; and so plenteous in grass, that the people are forced to drive their cattle from pasture, lest they should surfeit themselves by too much plenty.—See Herodotus, Clio; and Quintus Curtius, l. 5.

of which lies Arabia Deserta; but the sterility of the country will not admit of the situation of the garden of Eden in that place; and therefore we must go on eastward (as our author directs us) until we come to some place, through which Euphrates and Tigris are known to shape their course. Now Euphrates and Tigris, though they both rise out of the mountains of Armenia, take almost quite contrary courses. Euphrates runs to the west, and passing through Mesopotamia, waters the country where Babylon once stood; whereas Tigris takes towards the east, and passing along Assyria, waters the country where the once famed city of Nineveh stood. After a long progress, they meet a little below Babylon, and running a considerable way together in one large stream, with Babylonia and Chaldea on the west, and the country of Susiana on the east side, they separate again not far from Bassora, and so fall, in two channels, into the Persian gulf, enclosing the island Tereidon, now called Balsara.

Now, taking this along with us, we may observe farther, that there are two places in Scripture which make mention of the land of Havilah. In the one we are told, that ¹ 'the Israelites dwelt from Havilah unto Shur, that is before Egypt;' and in the other, that ² 'Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah until thou goest to Shur, that is before Egypt;' where, by the expression, 'from Havilah unto Shur,' is probably meant the whole extent of that part of Arabia which lies between Egypt to the west, and a certain stream or river which empties itself into the Persian gulf, on the east. That Havilah is the same with this part of Arabia, is farther evinced from its abounding with very good gold. For all authors, both sacred and profane, highly commend the gold of Arabia; tell us, that it is there dug in great plenty; is of so lively a colour, as to come near to the brightness of fire; and of so fine a kind, so pure and unmixed, as to need no refinement. Bdellium (which by some interpreters is taken for pearl, and by others for an aromatic gum) is, in both these senses, applicable to this country: for the ^a bdellium, or gum of Arabia, was always held in great esteem; nor is there any place in the world which produces finer ^b pearls, or in greater quantities, than the sea about Baharen, an island situated in the Persian gulf; and as for ^c the onyx-stone in particular, (if we will believe what Pliny tells us,) the ancients were of opinion, that it was no where to be found but in the mountains of Arabia. It seems reasonable therefore to conclude, (according to all the characters which Moses has given us of it,) that that tract of Arabia which lies upon the Persian gulf, was, in his days called 'the land of Havilah,' and that the channel which, after Euphrates and Tigris part, runs westward into the said gulf, was originally called Pison; and this the rather, because ^d some remains of its ancient name continued a long while after this account of it.

'The second river is Gihon, that which compasseth, or runneth along, the whole land of ^e Cush.' Where we may observe, that Moses has not alixed so many marks on the Gihon, as he does on the Pison, and that probably for this reason; ³ because, having once found out the Pison, we might easily discover the situation of the Gihon. For Pison being known to be the first river, in respect to the place where Moses was then writing, it is but natural to suppose, that Gihon (as the second) should be the river next to it; and, consequently, that other stream, which, after the Euphrates and Tigris are parted, holds its course eastward, and empties itself in the Persian gulf. For all travellers agree, that the country lying upon the eastern stream, which other nations call Susiana, is by the inhabitants to this day, ^f called Chuzestan, which carries in it plain footsteps of the original word Cush, or (as some write it) Chus.

Though therefore no remains of this river Gihon are to be met with in the country itself; yet, since it lies exactly the second in order, according to the method that Moses has taken in mentioning the four rivers; and, since the province it runs along and washes was formerly called 'the land of Cush,' and has at this time a who is very curious in remarking the countries of precious stones, assures us, that those of the greatest value came out of Arabia.—B. last.

^d It is a great while since both this river and the river Gihon have lost their names. The Greek and Roman writers call them still, after their parting, by the names they had before they met, Euphrates and Tigris; but there was some remainder of the name of Pison preserved in the river Pisotigris, which is Pison mixed with Tigris (as Mr. Carver observes.) By Xenophon it is called simply Phisus, in which the name of Pison is plainly enough retained, and went under that name until the time of Alexander the Great. For Q. Curtius commonly calls Tigris itself by the name of Phisis, and says it was so called by the inhabitants thereof, which, in all probability, was the name of this other river Phison, but, in process of time, lost by the many alterations which were made in its course, as Pliny tells us.—Patrick's Commentary.

^e The Seventy translation renders the Hebrew word Cush, by the name of Ethiopia, and in this mistake is all along followed by our English version, (whereas by the land of Cush is always meant some part of Arabia,) which has led Josephus, and several others, into a notion, that the river Gihon was the Nile in Egypt; and supposing withal, that the country of Havilah was some part of the East Indies, they have run into another error, and taken Pison for the Ganges, whereby they make the garden of Eden contain the greatest part of Asia, and some part of Africa likewise, which is a supposition quite incredible.—Patrick, ib.; Bedford's Scripture Chronology; and Shuckford's Connection.

^f Benjamin of Navarre tells us, that the province of Elam, whereof Susa is the metropolis, and which extends itself as far as the Persian gulf, at the east of the mouth of the river Euphrates, or Tigris, (as you please to term it,) is called by that name.—Hells, ib.

^a Galen comparing the gum of Arabia with that of Syria, gives some advantage to the former, which he denies to the other; On Simp. Medic. b. 6. And Pliny prefers the bdellium of Arabia before that of any other nation, except that of Bactriana.—Pliny, b. 12. c. 9.

^b Nearchus, one of Alexander's captains, who conducted his fleet from the Indies, as far as the Persian gulf, speaks of an island there abounding in pearls of great value.—Strabo, B. 16. And Pliny, having commended the pearls of the Indian seas, adds, that such as are fished towards Arabia, in the Persian gulf, deserve the greatest praise.—B. 6. c. 28.

^c Strabo tells us, that the riches of Arabia, which consisted in precious stones and excellent perfumes, (the trade of which brought them a great deal of gold and silver, besides the gold of the country itself,) made Augustus send Aelius Gallus thither, either to make these nations his friends, and so draw to himself their riches, or else to subdue them; b. 16. Diodorus Siculus describes at large the advantages of Arabia, and especially its precious stones, which are very valuable, both for their variety and brightness of colour; b. 2. name not a little analogous to it; there is no doubt to be made, but that the said easterly channel, coming from the united stream of the Euphrates and Tigris, is the very Gihon described by Moses.

'The third river is Hiddekel, that which goeth towards the east of, or, (as it is better translated) that which goeth along the side of Assyria.' It is allowed by all interpreters, as well as the Seventy, that this river is the same with Tigris, or which, as Pliny says, was called Diglito, in those parts where its course was slow, but where it began to be rapid, it took the other name. And, though it may be difficult to show any just analogy between the name of Hiddekel and Tigris; yet, if we either observe Moses's method of reckoning up the four rivers, or consider the true geography of the country, we shall easily perceive, that the river Hiddekel could properly be no other. ¹ For as, in respect to the place where Moses wrote, Pison lay nearest to him, and so, in a natural order, was named first, and the Gihon, lying near to that, was accordingly reckoned second; so, having passed over that stream, and turning to the left, in order to come back again to Arabia Petraea, (where Moses was,) we meet, in our passage, with Tigris in the third place; and so, proceeding westward through the lower part of Mesopotamia, come to Pherath, or Euphrates, at last. For Tigris, we must remember, parts Assyria from Mesopotamia, and meeting with Euphrates a little below Babylon, runs along with it in one common channel, until they separate again, and make the two streams of Pison and Gihon, which, as we said before, empty themselves into the Persian gulf.

'The fourth river was a Euphrates;' but this lay so near the country of Judea, and was so well known to the inhabitants thereof, that there was no occasion for Moses particularly to describe it. From the course of these four rivers, however, which he manifestly makes the bounds and limits of it, we may perceive, that the land of Eden must necessarily lie upon the great channel which the Tigris and Euphrates make, while they run together, and where they part again, must there terminate: for so the sacred text informs us, namely, that 'a river went out of Eden to water the garden, and from thence it was parted, and became into four heads;' which words manifestly imply, that in Eden the river was but one, that is, one single channel; but 'from thence,' that is, when it was gone out of Eden, it was parted, and became four streams or openings, (for so the Hebrew word may be translated,) two upwards, and two below. For, supposing this channel to be our common centre, we may, if we look one way, that is, up towards Babylon, see the Tigris and Euphrates coming into it; and, if we look another way, that is, down towards the Persian gulf, see the Pison and the Gihon running out of it.

a Euphrates is of the same signification with the Hebrew Pherath, and is probably so called, by reason of the pleasantness, at least the great fruitfulness, of the adjacent country. It must not be dissembled however, that it is one of those corrupt names which our translations have borrowed from the Septuagint version, and which probably the Greeks, as Reland on the Site of Paradise judiciously observed, took from the Persians, who often set the word ab or an, which signifies water, before the names of rivers, of which word, and Erat, (as it is still called by the neighbouring people,) the name Euphrates is apparently compounded.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 1.

It seems reasonable then to suppose, that this country of Eden lay on each side of this great channel, partly in Chaldea, and partly in Susiana: and, what may confirm us in this opinion, is, the extraordinary goodness and fertility of the soil. For, as it is incongruous to suppose, that God would make choice of a barren land wherein to plant the garden of paradise; so all ancient historians and geographers inform us, that not only Mesopotamia, Chaldea, a good part of Syria, and other neighbouring countries, were the most pleasant and fruitful places in the world; but modern travellers likewise particularly assure us, that in all the dominions which the Grand Seigneur has, there is not a finer country, (though, for want of hands, it lies in some places uncultivated) than that which lies between Bagdad and Bassora, the very tract of ground, which, according to our computation, was formerly called the land of Eden.

In what precise part of the land of Eden the garden of paradise was planted, the sacred historian seems to intimate, by informing us, that it ² 'lay eastward in Eden;' for he does not mean, that it lay eastward from the place where he was then writing, (that every body might easily know,) but his design was to point out, as near as possible, the very spot of ground where it was anciently seated. If then the garden of paradise lay in the easterly part of the country of Eden, and ³ 'the river which watered it' ran through that province (as the Scripture tells us it did) before it entered into the garden, then must it necessarily follow, that paradise was situated on the east side of one of the turnings of that river, which the conjunction of the Tigris and Euphrates makes, (now called the river of the Arabs,) and very probably at the lowest great turning, which Ptolemy takes notice of, and not far from the place where Aræca (in Scripture called Erec) at present is known to stand.

Thus we have followed the path which ⁴ the learned and judicious Huetius, bishop of Auranches, has pointed out to us, and have happily found a place wherein to fix this garden of pleasure. And, though it must be owned, that there is no draught of the country which makes the rivers exactly answer the description that Moses has given us of them; yet, it is reasonable to suppose, ⁴ that he wrote according to the then known geography of the country; that if the site, or number of rivers about Babylon, have been greatly altered since, this, in all pro-

^b Upon this occasion, it may not be improper to set down a brief exposition of his opinion in his own words. "I assert then that the terrestrial Paradise was situated on the channel formed by the united waters of the Tigris and Euphrates, between the place of their junction and that of their separation before falling into the Persian gulf; and as several large windings are made by this channel, I affirm with greater precision, that Paradise was placed on one of these windings and apparently on the southern side of the largest (which hath been marked by Agathodæmon in the geographical tables of Ptolemy) when the river, after a long deflection to the west, again takes an eastward course about 32° 39' N. Lat. and 80° 10' E. Lon. very near where Aræca or the Erec of Scripture was placed. He adds still farther that the four heads of this river are the Tigris and Euphrates before their junction, and the two channels, through which it flows into the sea—of which channels, the western is Pison; and the country of Havilah which it traverses is partly in Arabia Felix, and partly in Arabia Deserta: the eastern one which I have mentioned is the Gihon, and the country called Chus is Susiana."—See Treatise on the Site of Paradise, p. 16.

ability, has been occasioned by the cuts and canals, which the monarchs of that great empire were remarkable for making; and that all modern observers find greater variations in the situation of places, and make greater corrections in all their charts and maps, than needed to be made in the description of Moses, to bring it to an agreement even with our latest accounts of the present country, and rivers near Chaldea. But I espouse this opinion, without any formal opposition to the sentiments of other learned men, who doubtless, in this case, are left to their own choice; since the situation of paradise, (as the learned Bishop concludes,) whether it be in one part of the world, or in another, can never be esteemed as an article of our Christian faith.

CHAP. III.—Of the Image of God in Man.

WHOEVER looks into the history of the creation, as it is recorded by Moses, will soon perceive, that there was something so peculiar in the formation of man, as to deserve a divine consultation, and that this peculiarity chiefly consists in that "divine image and similitude wherein it pleased God to make him. This pre-eminence the holy penman has taken care, ¹ in two several places, to remind us of, in order to imprint upon us a deeper sense of the dignity of human nature; and therefore it may be no improper subject for our meditation in this place, to consider a little, wherein this divine image or likeness did consist; how far it is now impaired in us: and in what measure it may be recovered again.

What the image of God impressed upon man in the state of his integrity was, it is as difficult a matter for us, who date our ignorance from our first being, and were all along bred up with the same infirmities about us wherein we were born, to form any adequate perception of, ² as it is for a peasant bred up in the obscurities of a cottage, to fancy in his mind the unseen splendours of a court; and therefore we have the less reason to wonder, that we find such a variety of opinions concerning it.

³ Some of the Jewish doctors were fond enough to imagine, that Adam at first had his head surrounded with a visible radiant glory which accompanied him wherever he went, and struck awe and reverence into the other parts of the animal creation; and that his person was so completely perfect and handsome, that even God, before he formed him, assumed a human body of the most perfect beauty, and so, in a literal sense, made him after his own image and resemblance. But there needs no pains to refute this groundless fancy.

a The words in the text are, in our image, after our likeness, which seem to be much of the same import; only a learned Jewish interpreter has observed, that the last words, after our likeness, give us to understand, that man was not created properly and perfectly in the image of God, but only in a kind of resemblance of him; for he does not say, in our likeness, as he does, in our image; but, after our likeness; where the copy of similitude (as they call it) abates something of the sense of what follows, and makes it signify only an approach to the divine likeness, in understanding, freedom of choice, spirituality, immortality, &c.—Patrick's Commentary.

⁴ Philo is of opinion, that this image of God, was only the idea of human nature in the divine understanding, by looking on which he formed man, just as an architect about to build an house, first delineates the scheme in his mind, and then proceeds to erect the fabric. But this opinion, how true soever, does not come up to the point in hand; because it makes no distinction between man and other creatures, (for they were likewise made according to the ideal image in the divine intellect) though it may be manifestly the intent of the Scripture account to give him a particular preference.

⁵ Origen, among ancient Christian authors, will have it to be the Son of God, who is called ⁶ 'the express image of the Father;' but there is no such restriction in the words of Moses. They are delivered ⁷ in the plural number; and therefore cannot, without violence, be applied to one single person in the Godhead; and, among the moderns, some have placed it in holiness alone, whilst others have thought it more properly seated in dominion. But these are only single lines, and far from coming to the whole portraiture.

The divine similitude, in short, is a complex thing, and made up of many ingredients; and therefore (to give our thoughts a track in so spacious a field) we may distinguish it into natural and supernatural; and accordingly, shall, 1. consider the supernatural gifts and ornaments; and then, 2. those natural perfections and accomplishments wherein this image of God, impressed on our first parents, may be said to consist.

⁸ An eloquent father of the church has set this whole matter before us in a very apt similitude, comparing this animal and living effigies of the King of kings, with the image of an emperor, so expressed by the hand of an artificer, either in sculpture or painting, as to represent the very dress and ensigns of royal majesty, such as the purple robe, the sceptre, and the diadem, &c. But as the emperor's image does represent, not only his countenance and the figure of his body, but even his dress likewise, his ornaments and royal ensigns; so man does then properly represent in himself the image and similitude of God, when to the accomplishments of nature (which cannot totally be extinguished) the ornaments of grace and virtue are likewise added; when "man's nature (as he expresses it) is not clothed in purple nor vaunts its dignity by a sceptre or diadem, (for the archetype consists not in such things as these,) but instead of purple, is clothed with virtue, which of all others, is the most royal vestment: instead of a sceptre, is supported by a blessed immortality; and, instead of a diadem, is adorned with a crown of righteousness."

That our first parents, besides the seeds of natural virtue and religion sown in their minds, and besides the natural innocence and rectitude wherein they were created, were endued with certain gifts and powers supernatural, infused into them by the Spirit of God, is manifest, not only from the authority of ⁹ Christian writers, but from the testimony of Philo the Jew likewise, who is very full of sublime notions concerning the divine image, and, in one place more especially, expresses himself to this purpose. "The Creator made our soul," says he, "while enclosed in a body able of itself to see and know its Maker; but, considering how vastly advantageous such knowledge would be to man, (for this is the utmost bound of its felicity,) he inspired into him from above something of his own divinity, which, being invisible, impressed upon the invisible soul its own character; that so even this earthly region might not be without some creature made after the image of God:" and this ^a he asserts to be the recondite sense of Moses's words in the history of man's creation.

And indeed we need go no farther than this history of Moses, to prove the very point we are now upon. For, whereas it acquaints us, that the first man, in his state of integrity, was able to sustain the approaches of the divine presence, and converse with his Maker in the same language, it is reasonable to suppose, that it was a particular vouchsafement to him, to confirm his mind, and enlighten his understanding in this manner; because no creature is fit to converse with God without divine illumination, nor is any creature able to bear his majestic appearance, that is not fortified and prepared for it by a divine power.

Whereas it tells us, that ² "God brought every living creature unto Adam, to see what he would call them, and whatever, he called them, that was the name thereof;" it can hardly be supposed (considering the circumstances of the thing) but that this was the effect of something more than human sagacity. That, in an infinite variety of creatures, never before seen by Adam, he should be able on a sudden, without labour or premeditation, to give names to each of them, so adapt and fitted to their respective natures, as that God himself should approve the nomenclature, is a thing so astonishing, that we may venture to say, ^b no single man, among all the philosophers since the fall, no Plato, no Aristotle, among the ancients, no Des Cartes, no Gassendus, no Newton, among the moderns; nay, no academy or royal society whatever durst have once attempted it.

Whereas it informs us, that Adam no sooner saw his wife brought unto him, but ³ he told exactly her original, and gave her a name accordingly, though he lay in the profoundest sleep and insensibility all the while that God was performing the wonderful operation of taking her out of his side; this can be imputed to nothing, but either an immediate inspiration or some prophetic vision (as we said before) that was sent unto him while he slept. ⁴ From the conformity of parts which he beheld in that goodly creature, and her near similitude to himself, he might have conjectured indeed, that God had now provided him with a meet help, which before he wanted; but it is scarce imaginable, how he could so punctually describe her rise and manner of formation, and so surely prophesy, that the general event to his posterity would be, for the sake of her sex 'to leave father and mother, and cleave to their wives,' otherwise than by divine illumination; "which enabled him ⁵ (as one excellently expresses it) to view essences in themselves, and read forms without the comment of their respective properties; which enabled him to see consequences yet dormant in their principles, and effects yet unborn, and in the womb of their causes; which enabled, in short, to pierce almost into future contingencies, and improved his conjectures and sentiments even to a prophecy, and the certainties of a prediction."

^a "The great Moses," says he, "makes not the species of the rational soul to be like to any of the creatures, but pronounceth it to be the image of the invisible God, as judging it then to become the true and genuine coin of God, when it is formed and impressed by the divine seal, the character whereof is the eternal word. For God," saith he, "breathed into his face the breath of life; so that he who receives the inspiration must of necessity represent the image of him that gives it, and for this reason it is said that man was made after the image of God."—Philo on the family of Noah.

^b The knowledge of Adam is highly extolled by the Jewish doctors. Some of them have maintained, that he composed two books, one concerning the creation, and another about the nature of God. They generally believe, that he composed the xci. psalm; but some of them go farther, and tell us, that Adam's knowledge was not only equal to that of Solomon and Moses, but exceeded even that of angels; and, for the proof of this, they produce this story—That the angels having spoke contemptuously of man, God made this answer,—That the creature whom they despised was their superior in knowledge; and, to convince them of this, that he brought all the animals to them, and bid them name them, which they being not able to do, he proposed the thing to Adam, and he did it immediately: with many more fancies of the same ridiculous nature.—Saurin's Dissertations.

These seem to be some of the supernatural gifts, and what we may call the chief lines, wherein the image of God was so conspicuous upon Adam's soul; and there was this supernatural in his body likewise, that ⁶ whereas it was made 'of the dust of the earth,' and its composition consequently corruptible, either by a power continually proceeding from God, whereof ⁷ 'the tree of life' was the divine sign and sacrament, or by the inherent virtue of the tree itself, perpetually repairing the decays of nature, it was to enjoy the privilege of immortality. ⁸ Not such an immortality as the glorified bodies of saints shall hereafter possess (for they shall be made wholly impassable, and set free from the reach of any outward impressions and elemental disorders which may impair their vigour, or endanger their dissolution,) but an immortality by donation, and the privilege of an especial providence, which engaged itself to sway and overrule the natural tendency which was in man's body to corruption; and, notwithstanding the contrarieties and dissensions of a terrestrial constitution, to continue him in life as long as he should continue himself in his obedience.

2. Another chief part of the divine image and similitude in our first parents, was an universal rectitude in all the faculties belonging to the soul. Now the two great faculties, or rather essential acts of the soul, are the understanding and will; which, though (for the clearer conception of them) we may separate, are in their operation so blended and united together, that we cannot properly think them distinct faculties. It is the same individual mind which sees and perceives, as well as chooses or rejects the several objects that are presented to it. When it does the former, we call it the understanding, and when the latter, the will: so that they are both radically and inseparably the same, and differ only in the manner of our conceiving them. Nay, the clearest and only distinct apprehension we are able to form of them, (even when we come to consider them separately,) is only this, that the understanding is chiefly conversant about intelligible, the will about eligible objects; so that the one has truth, and the other goodness in its view and pursuit. There are, besides these, belonging to the soul of man, certain passions and affections, which (according to the common notion and manner of speaking) have chiefly their residence in the sensitive appetite; and, however, in this lapsed condition of our nature, they may many times mutiny and rebel, yet, when kept in due temper and subordination, are excellent handmaids to the ¹ soul. Though the Stoics look upon them all as sinful defects, and deviations from right reason; yet it is sufficient for us, that our blessed Saviour (who took upon him all our natural, but none of our sinful infirmities) was known to have them, and that our first progenitor, in the state of his greatest perfection, was not devoid of them. Let us then see how far we may suppose that the image of God might be impressed upon each of these.

² His soul itself was a rational substance, immaterial, and immortal; and therefore a proper representation of that Supreme Spirit whose wisdom was infinite, and essence eternal.

His will was then very ductile and pliant to the motions of right reason. It pursued the directions that were given it, and attended upon the understanding, as a favourite does upon his prince, while the service is both privilege, and preferment: and, while it obeyed the understanding, it commanded the other faculties that were beneath; gave laws to the affections, and restrained the passions from licentious sallies.

His passions were then indeed all subordinate to his will and intellect, and acted within the compass of their proper objects. His love was centred upon God, and flamed up to heaven in direct fervours of devotion. His hatred (if hatred may be supposed in a state of innocence) was fixed only upon that which his posterity only love, sin. His joy was then the result of a real good, suitably applied, and filled his soul (as God does the universe) silently and without noise. His sorrow (if any supposed disaster could have occasioned sorrow) must have moved according to the severe allowances of prudence; been as silent as thought, and all confined within the closet of the breast. His hope was fed with the expectation of a better paradise, and a nearer admission to the divine presence; and (to name no more) his fear, which was then a guard, and not a torment to the mind, was fixed upon him, who is only to be feared, God, but in such a filial manner, as to become an awe without amazement, and a dread without distraction.

It must be acknowledged indeed, that the Scriptures do not expressly attribute all these perfections to Adam in his first estate; but, since the opposite weaknesses now infest the nature of man fallen, we must conclude (if we will be true to the rule of contraries) that these, and such like excellencies, were the endowments of man innocent. And if so, then is there another perfection arising from this harmony, and due composure of the faculties, which we may call the crown and consummation of all, and that is a good conscience. For, as in the body, when the vital and principal parts do their office, and all the smaller vessels act orderly, there arises a sweet enjoyment upon the whole, which we call health; so in the soul, when the supreme faculties of the understanding and will move regularly, and the inferior passions and affections listen to their dictates, and follow their injunctions, there arises a serenity and complacency upon the whole soul, infinitely beyond all the pleasures of sensuality, and which, like a spicy field, refreshes it upon every reflection, and fills it with a joyful confidence towards God.

These are some of the natural lines (as we may distinguish them) which the finger of God portrayed upon the soul of man: and (so far as the spiritual being may be resembled by the corporeal) ⁴ the contrivance of man's bodily parts was with such proportion and exactness, as most conduced to its comeliness and service. His stature was erect and raised, becoming him who was to be the lord of this globe, and the observer of the heavens. A divine beauty and majesty was shed upon it, such as could neither be eclipsed by sickness, nor extinguished by death; ⁵ for Adam knew no disease, so long as he refrained from the forbidden tree. Nature was his physician, and innocence and abstinence would have kept him healthful to immortality. And from this perfection of man's body, especially that port and majesty which appeared in his looks and aspect, there arose, in some measure, another lineament of the divine image, viz. ⁶ that dominion and sovereignty wherewith God invested him over all other creatures. For there is even still remaining in man a certain terrific character, (as ⁷ one calls it.) which, assisted by that instinct of dread that he hath equally implanted in their natures, commands their homage and obeisance; insomuch, that it must be hunger or compulsion, or some violent exasperation or other, that makes them at any time rebel against their Maker's vicerent here below.

This is the best copy of the divine image that we can draw: only it may not be amiss to add, ⁸ that the holiness of man was a resemblance of the divine purity, and his happiness a representation of the divine felicity. And now, to look over it again, and recount the several lines of it. What was supernatural in it, was a mind fortified to bear the divine presence, qualified for the divine converse, fully illuminated by the divine Spirit; and a body that (contrary to the natural principles of its composition) was indulged the privilege of immortality. What was natural to it, was an universal harmony in all its faculties; an understanding fraught with all manner of knowledge; a will submitted to the divine pleasure; affections placed upon their proper objects; passions calm and easy; a conscience quiet and serene; resplendent holiness, perfect felicity, and a body adorned with such comeliness and majesty, as might justly challenge the rule and jurisdiction of this inferior world.

If it be demanded, how much of this image is defaced, lost, or impaired; the answer is, that ¹ whatever was supernatural and adventitious to man by the benignity of Almighty God, (as it depended upon the condition of his obedience to the divine command,) upon the breach of that command, was entirely lost: what was perfective of his nature, such as the excellency of his knowledge, the subordination of his faculties, the tranquillity of his mind, and full dominion over other creatures, was sadly impaired: but what was essential to his nature, the immortality of his soul, the faculties of intellect and will, and the natural beauty and usefulness of his body, does still remain, notwithstanding the concussions they sustained in the fall.

If it be asked, what we must do in order to repair this defaced image of God in us? the only answer we can have in this case, is, from the sacred oracles of Scripture. We must ² 'be renewed in the spirit of our mind, and put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness.' We must ³ 'be followers of God as dear children; grow in grace,' ⁴ 'be renewed in knowledge,' and ⁵ 'conformed to the image of his Son.' We must ⁶ 'give all diligence to add to our faith virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity: that we may be ⁷ 'complete in him, who is the head of all principality and power;' and that ⁸ 'as we have borne the image of the earthly, we may also bear the image of the heavenly Adam.'

SECT. III.

CHAP. I.—Of the Fall of Man.

THE HISTORY.

THE sacred historian indeed gives us no account of Satan, the chief of the fallen angels, and grand adversary of God and man; but, from several other places in Scripture, we may learn, that he at first was made like other celestial spirits, perfect in his kind, and happy in his condition, but that, through pride or ambition, as we may suppose, falling into a crime, (whose circumstances to us are unknown,) he thence fell into misery, and, together with his accomplices, was banished from the regions of bliss; that, b in his state of exile, having lost all hopes, and despairing of reconciliation with the Almighty, he abandoned himself to all kinds of wickedness; and, upon the creation of man, out of pure envy to the happiness which God had designed for him, resolved upon a project to draw him into disobedience, and thence into ruin and perdition; but how to put his scheme in execution was the question. The woman he perceived, as by nature more ductile and tender, was the properer subject for his temptations; but some form he was to assume, to enable him to enter into conference with her. ⁹ The figure of a man was the fittest upon this occasion; but then it would have discovered the imposture, because Eve knew very well, that her husband was the only one of that species upon the face of the earth. And therefore considering, that the serpent, which before the fall was a bright and glorious creature, and (next to man) c endured therefore Empedocles, in the verses recited by Plutarch, makes mention of the fate of some demons, who, for their rebellion, were, from the summit of heaven, plunged into the bottom of the great deep, there to be punished as they deserved. To which the story of Ate, who once inhabited the air, but being always hurtful to man, and therefore, hateful to God, was cast down from thence, with a solemn oath and decree, that she should never return again, seems not a little to allude.—Huetius in the Abnetan Questions, b. 2.

b Our excellent Milton represents Satan within prospect of Eden, and near the place where he was to attempt his desperate enterprise against God and man, falling into doubts, and sundry passions, and then, at last, confirming himself in his wicked design.

But say I could repent, and could obtain,
By act of grace, my former state; how soon
Would height recall high thoughts! how soon unsay
What feign'd submission swore! Ease would recant Vows made in pain, as violent and void—
All hope excluded thus, behold, instead
Of us, outcast, exil'd, his new delight,
Mankind, created; and for him this world,
So farewell Hope! and, with Hope, farewell fear!
Farewell Remorse! all good to me is lost!
Evil be thou my good! by thee at least Divided empire with heaven's King I hold;
By thee, and more than half perhaps, will reign;
As man, ere long, and this new world shall know.

c Milton, who is an excellent commentator upon the whole history of the fall, brings in the devil, after a long search to find out a beast proper for his purpose, concluding at last to make use of the serpent.

Him, after long debate (irresolute Of thought revolv'd) his final sentence chose.
Fit vessel, fittest imp of fraud in whom
To enter, and his dark suggestions hide
From sharpest sight: for in the wily snake
Whatever sleights, none would suspicions mark,
As from his wit, and native subtilty
Proceeding; which in other beast observ'd,
Doubt might beget of diabolic power
Active within, beyond the sense of brute.

The wisdom and subtily of the serpent are frequently mentioned in Scripture, as qualities which distinguish it from other animals; and several are the instances, wherein it is said to discover its cunning. 1. When it is old, by squeezing itself between two rocks, it can strip off its old skin, and so grows young again. 2. As it grows blind, it has a secret to recover its sight by the juice of fennel. 3. When it is assaulted, its chief care is to secure its head, because its heart lies under its throat, and very near its head. And, 4. When it goes to drink at a fountain, it first vomits up all its poison, for fear of poisoning itself as it is drinking; with some other qualities of the like nature.—Calmet's Dictionary.

But a modern author of our own has given us this further reason for the devil's making use of the serpent in this affair, namely,—That as no infinite being can actuate any creature, beyond what the fitness and capacity of its organs will admit;

a That profane, as well as sacred writers, had the same notion of the fall of wicked angels, is manifest from a tradition they had (though mixed with fable) of the Titans and Giants invading heaven, fighting against Jupiter, and attempting to depose him from his throne, for which reason he threw them down headlong into hell, where they are tormented with incessant fire; and with the greatest talents of sagacity and understanding, would be no improper instrument for his purpose, he usurped the organs of one of these, and through them, he addressed himself to the woman, the first opportunity when he found her alone.

After ^a some previous compliments (as we may imagine) and congratulations of her happy state, the tempter put on an air of great concern, and seemed to interest himself not a little in her behalf, by wondering why God, who had lately been so very bountiful to them, should deny them the use of a tree, ^b whose fruit was so tempting to the eye, so grateful to the palate, and of such sovereign quality to make them wise, and when Eve replied, that such was the divine prohibition, even under the penalty of death itself, ^c he immediately subjoins, that such a penalty was an empty threat, and what would never be executed upon them; that God would never destroy the 'work of his own hands,' creatures so accomplished so, the natural subtilty of the serpent, and perhaps the pliability, and forkiness of its tongue (which we know enables other creatures to pronounce articulate sounds,) added to the advantages of its form, made it the fittest instrument of delusion that can be imagined.—Revelation Examined.

^a Milton has very curiously described the artful and insinuating carriage of the serpent, upon his first approach to speak to Eve.

He, bolder now, uncall'd, before her stood,
But, as in great admiring; oft he bow'd
His turret crest, and sleek enamell'd neck,
Frowning; and lick'd the ground whereon she trod.
His gentle dumb expressions turn'd at length
The eye of Eve, to mark his play: he, glad
Of her attention gain'd, with serpent tongue
Organic, or impulse of vocal air,
His fraudulent temptation thus began.

^b The first words in his address are, 'Yea, hath God said, ye shall not eat,' &c., which do not look so much like the beginning, as the conclusion of a discourse; as the Jews themselves have observed: and therefore it is not improbable, that the tempter, before he spake these words, represented himself as one of the heavenly court, who was come, or rather sent, to congratulate the happiness which God had bestowed on them in paradise; a happiness so great, that he could not easily believe he had denied them any of the fruit of the garden.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c Burnet, in his Philosophical Archaeology, has given us the whole dialogue (as he has framed it at least) between the serpent and Eve; which, though a little too light and ludicrous for so solemn an occasion, yet, because the book is not in every one's hands, I have thought fit to set down in a translation of his own words. "Serpent. Hail, fairest! what dost thou under this shade? Eve. I am gazing at the beauty of this tree. Serpent. It is indeed pleasant to the sight, but to the taste its fruit is much more so, hast thou yet tasted it, my mistress? Eve. Verily not, God hath forbade us the use of that tree. Serpent. What do I hear? Who is that God? who envies his own creatures the innocent delights of nature, nothing is more sweet, nothing more safe than that fruit, why should he forbid it, unless by some foolish law of his own. Eve. Nay, he forbade it under penalty of death. Serpent. Undoubtedly the matter is not understood by thee, the tree possesses no deadly property, but rather something divine and beyond the usual power of nature. Eve. I cannot answer thee myself, but I will go to my husband. Serpent. Why shouldst thou interrupt thy husband for an affair of so small importance. Eve. Shall I taste the apple? how beautiful its hue, how fragrant its smell, can it have a bad flavour? Serpent. Believe me, it is food not unworthy of the angels, taste of it, and if the flavour be bad cast it from thee, and deem me the most mendacious of liars. Eve. I will attempt, indeed the flavour is most agreeable, thou hast not deceived me, give me another that I may bear it to my husband. Serpent. That's well remembered! take this one, go to thy husband—Farwell, child of happiness, meanwhile I will give away, she will manage the rest." B. ii. chap. 7.

as they were, for so slight a transgression: and that the sole intent of this prohibition was, to continue them in their present state of dependence and ignorance, and not admit them to that extent of knowledge, and plenitude of happiness, which their eating of this fruit would confer upon them: for God himself knew, that ^d the proper use of this tree was, to illuminate the understanding, and advance all the other faculties of the soul to such a sublimity, that the brightest angels in heaven should not surpass them; nay that they should approximate the Deity itself, in the extent of their intellect, and independence of their being. In short, he acquainted Eve, that the jealousy of the Creator was the sole motive of his prohibition; that the fruit had a virtue to impart, ^e an universal knowledge to the person who tasted it; and that therefore God, who would admit of no competitor, had reserved this privilege to himself. Above all, he engaged her to fix her eyes upon the forbidden fruit; he remarked to her its pleasantness to the sight, and left her to guess at its deliciousness. Eve, in the very midst of the temptation had a freedom of choice; but the fond conceit of 'knowing good and evil,' of becoming like God, and of changing her felicity (great indeed, but subordinate) for an independent state of happiness, and especially the deceitful bait of present sensual pleasure, blinded her reason by degrees; and as she stood gazing on the tree, filled all her thoughts, and the whole capacity of her soul. The sight of the fruit provoked her desire; the suggestions of the tempter urged it on; her natural curiosity raised her longing; and the very prohibition itself did something to inflame it; so that, at all adventures, she put forth her hand, and plucked, and eat.

Earth felt the wound, and nature, from her seat,
Sighing, through all her works, gave signs of woe,
That all was lost.¹

She, however, had no such sense of her condition; but, fancying herself already in the possession of that chimerical happiness, wherewith the devil had deluded her, she invited her husband (who not unlikely came upon her while she was eating) to partake with her. ² The most

^d It is very well worth our observation, how ambiguous and deceitful the promise, which the tempter makes our first parents, was: for by 'opening the eyes,' she understood a further degree of wisdom, as the same phrase imports, Acts xxvi. 18.; and Eph. i. 18.; but he meant their perceiving their own misery, and confusion of conscience, as fell out immediately: by 'being like gods,' she understood the happiness of God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, as appears by the words of God himself, verse 22.; but he meant it of angels, (frequently styled Elohim, that is, gods), and of such fallen angels as himself, who are called 'principalities and powers,' Col. ii. 15. And 'by knowing good and evil,' she understood a kind of divine omniscience, or knowing all manner of things, (as the phrase frequently signifies;) but he meant it, that thereby she should experience the difference between 'good and evil,' between happiness and misery, which she did to her cost. A method this of cunning and reserve, which he has practised in his oracular responses ever since.—Hinsworth's Annotations.

^e The words 'good and evil,' when applied to knowledge, comprehend every thing that is possible for man to know, for so the woman of Tekoa, in her address to king David, tells him 2 Sam. xiv. 17. 'as an angel of God is my lord the king, to discern good and bad;' and that by the terms 'good and bad,' we are to understand 'all things,' the 20th verse of that chapter will inform us, where she continues her compliment, and says, 'My lord is wise, according to the wisdom of an angel, to know all things that are on the earth.'—Le Clerc's Commentary.

A. M. T. A. C. 4001; OR, ACCORDING TO RALES, 5411. GEN. CH. 3.

absurd arguments appear reasonable, and the most unjust desires equitable, when the person who proposes them, is beloved; the devil therefore knew very well what he did, when he made his first application to the woman. Her charms and endearments, which gave her the ascendancy over her husband's affection, would be of more efficacy (he knew) than all the subtle motives which he could suggest: and therefore he made use of her to engage him in the like defection: and after some small reluctance (as we may suppose) he,¹ like an uxorious man, was by her entreaties prevailed on, (contrary to the sense of his duty, and convictions of his own breast,) to violate the command, merely because she had done it, and to share whatever fate God's indignation for that transgression should bring upon her. Thus the solicitations of the woman ruined the man, as the enchantments of the tempter ruined the woman. She held forth the fair enticing fruit to him; and he, rather than see her perish alone, chose to be involved in the same common guilt.²

Earth trembled from her entrails, as again
In pangs, and nature gave a second groan;
Sly low'd, and, murmuring thunder, some sad drops
Wept, at completing of the mortal sin.³

For as soon as they had eaten of the forbidden fruit, a 'their eyes were opened,' but in a sense quite different from what the tempter had promised them, namely, to see their own folly, and the impending miseries, and make sad reflections upon what they had done. They had acquired knowledge, indeed, but it was a knowledge arising from sorrowful experience, that the serpent had beguiled them both, and drawn them from the good of happiness and innocence, which they knew before, into the evil of sin and misery, which (until that fatal moment) they had no conception of. ⁴ They saw a living God provoked; his grace and favour forfeited; his likeness and image defaced; and their dominion over other creatures withdrawn from them. They saw, very probably, the heavens grow angry and stormy; the angel of the Lord standing with his sword, threatening them with vengeance; and the devil himself, who before had seduced them, throwing off the disguise, and now openly insulting over them. They saw that b 'they were naked;' were stripped of all their intellectual and moral ornaments; were subjected to irregular appetites and inordinate lusts; and blushed to see their external glory so much debased, that 'they took and plaited together fig leaves, (which in eastern countries are very large,) in order to make themselves d such coverings as might both protect them from the injuries of the weather, and conceal their shame. Nor was their guilt attended with shame only, but with fear likewise, and many dismal apprehensions. e Before they sinned they no sooner heard 'the voice of the Lord' coming towards them, but they ran out to meet him, and, with an humble joy, welcomed his gracious visits; but f now God was become a terror to them, and they a terror enemies,' Ex. xxxii. 25.—See Le Clerc's Commentary. Now those who take it in this sense, have observed farther, that by the word 'nakedness' according to the usual modesty of the Hebrew tongue are meant all the irregular appetites to venereal pleasures, which Adam and Eve were strangers to in their state of innocence, but began now first to experience, and which the intoxicating juice of the forbidden tree might very probably excite.—Nicholls's Conference, vol. 1.

As with new wine intoxicated both,
They swim in mirth, and fancy that they feel
Divinity within them, breeding wings,
Wherewith to scorn the earth: but that false fruit
Far other operation first display'd,
Carnal desire inflaming: he on Eve
Began to cast lascivious eyes, she him
As wantonly repaid, in lust they burn.—Milton.

c Our translation indeed tells us, that our first parents 'sewed fig-leaves together,' which gives occasion to the usual sneer, What they could do for needles and thread? But the original word tapar signifies no more than to put together, apply, or fit, as is plain from Job xvi. 15., and Ezek. xiii. 28.: and the word guleh, which we render leaves, signifies also branches of trees, such as were to make booths or bowers, Neh. xviii. 15. So that, to adapt or fit branches (which is translated sewing leaves together) is only to twist and plait the flexible branches of the fig-tree round about their waists, in the manner of a Roman crown, for which purpose the fig-tree, of all others, was the most serviceable, because, as Pliny tells us, h. 16. ch. 24., it had a leaf very large or shady.—Patrick's Commentary.

d The word, in the translation is aprons; but since in the original it may signify any thing that covers or surrounds us, it may every whit as properly here be rendered a bower, or arbour, covered with the branches of the fig-tree wherein the fallen pair thought to have hid themselves from the sight of God; to which interpretation the subsequent verse seems to give some countenance.—Le Clerc's Commentary. Nor is Milton's description of the fig-tree uninclined to this sense:

— Such as at this day spreads her arms,
Branching so broad and long, that in the ground
The bended twigs take root, and daughters grow
About the mother-tree, a pillar'd shade
High overarch'd, and echoing walks between.
There oft the Indian herdsman shunning heat,
Shelters in cool, and tends his pasturing herds
In loop-holes, cut through thickest shade.

e The word voice may be equally rendered noise; and since God's usual way of notifying his presence afterwards was either by 'a small still voice or noise,' 1 Kings xix. 12., or by a noise like 'that of great waters,' Ezek. i. 21., or like the rustling of wind in the trees,' 2 Sam. v. 24., we may reasonably suppose, that it was either a soft gentle noise like a breeze of wind among the trees of paradise, or a louder one, like the murmuring of some large river, which gave Adam notice of God's approaching.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

f Milton makes Adam, upon this occasion, express himself in this manner:

— How shall I behold the face
Henceforth of God or angel, erst with joy
And raptures oft beheld?—O! might I here
In solitude live savage, in some glade
Obscur'd, where highest woods (impenetrable To star or sun-light) spread their umbrage broad,
And brown as evening! Cover me, ye pines,
Ye cedars, with innumerable boughs
Hide me, where I may never see them more.

a Le Clerc observes, that it is reputed an elegancy in the sacred writing to make use of the figure, which rhetoricians call antanaclasis, whereby they continue the same word or phrase that went before, though in a quite different sense: as the learned Gratius upon John i. 16., and Hammond on Matth. viii. 22. have abundantly shown; and for this reason he supposes, that Moses repeats 'their eyes were opened,' which the devil had used before, though he means it in a sense quite different from the former.

b Those who take the word 'naked' in a literal sense, suppose, that upon the fall, the air, and other elements, immediately became intemperate, and disorderly; so that our first parents soon knew, or felt, that they were naked, because the sun scorched them, the rain wet them, and the cold pierced them.—See Patrick's Commentary; and King on the Origin of Evil. But others take the expression rather in a figurative sense, namely, to denote the commission of such sins as man in his senses may well be ashamed of: and to this purpose they have observed, that when Moses returned from the mount, and found that the people had made and consecrated a golden image, the expression in Scripture is, 'That the people were naked,' that is, were become vile and reprobate sinners, (for so the word γυμνωτες signifies in the New Testament, Rev. xvi. 15.) 'for Aaron had made them naked, unto their shame, among their

to themselves. Their consciences set their sin before them in its blackest aspect; and, as they had then no hopes of a future mediator, so there 'remained nothing for them but a certain fearful looking for of judgment, and fiery indignation ready to devour them.' And accordingly, no sooner did they hear the sound of God's majestic presence drawing nearer and nearer to the place where they were, (which happened towards the cool of the evening,) but they immediately betook themselves to the thickest and closest places they could find in the garden, in order to hide themselves from his inspection; for so far were they fallen in their understanding, as never to reflect, 'that all places and things are naked and open to the eyes of him, with whom they had to do.'

Out of their dark retreat, however, God calls the two criminals, who, after a short examination, acknowledged their guilt indeed, but lay the blame of it, the man upon the woman, and the woman upon the serpent: whereupon God proceeds to pronounce sentence upon them, but first of all, upon the devil, as being the prime offender. The devil had made the serpent the instrument of his deception; and therefore ^a God first degrades it from the noble creature it was before this fact, to a foul creeping animal, which, instead of going erect, or flying in the air, was sentenced to creep upon its belly, and thereupon become incapable of eating any food but what was mingled with dust. And to the devil, who lay hid under the covert of the serpent, (and therefore is not expressly named,) he declares, that how much soever he might glory in his present conquest, a time should come, when a child, descended from the seed of that very sex he had now defeated, that is, the MESSIAS, should ruin all his new-erected empire of sin and death; and, ¹ 'having spoiled principalities and powers, should make a shew of them openly, triumphing over them in his cross.' This could not fail of being matter of great comfort and consolation to Adam and Eve, to hear of the conquest of their malicious enemy, before their own sentences were pronounced, ^b which to the woman, was sorrow in con-

^a Josephus, in the beginning of his Antiquities, pretends, that all creatures using the same language, and consequently being endued with reason and understanding, the serpent, excited by envy, tempted Eve to sin, and, among other things, received this signal punishment, namely, that it should be deprived of its feet, and ever after crawl upon the ground, which Aben Ezra, and several other Rabbins, confirm: but what is certain in the serpent's punishment, is this—that it actually eats the dry and dusty earth, (as Bochart and Pliny tell us,) otherwise we can hardly conceive how it could subsist in dry and sandy deserts, to which God, in a good measure, has condemned it.—Revelation Examined.

^b It is remarkable, that a woman is the only creature we know of, who has any sorrow in conception. This Aristotle expressly affirms, and only excepts the instance of a mare conceiving by an ass, and, in general, where there is any thing monstrous in the fetus. Other creatures, we find, are in more perfect health, and strength, and vigour, at that time, than before; but Aristotle reckons up ten different maladies, to which the woman is then naturally subject. And, as she is subject to sickness in the time of her conception, so it is farther remarkable, that she brings forth her offspring with more pain and agony than any other creature upon earth, even though she has some advantages in her make above other creatures, that might promise her, in this case, an alleviation; and therefore we may suppose, that, upon God's saying to the woman, 'In sorrow thou shalt bring forth children,' a real effect did immediately accompany the word spoken, and cause such a change in the woman's ception, pain in childbirth, and constant subjection to her husband's will; to the man, ^c a life of perpetual toil and slavery; and to them both, as well as all their posterity, a temporal death at the time appointed.

Nor was it mankind only which felt the sad effects of the induction of sin, but ^d even the inanimate part of the creation suffered by it. The fertility of the earth, and serenity of the air, were changed; the elements began to jar; the seasons were intemperate, and the weather grew uncertain: so that to defend themselves against the immoderate heat, or cold, or wind or rain, which now began to infest the earth, our first parents were instructed by God ^e how to make themselves vestments of the skins of body, as, in the course of nature, must have occasioned the extraordinary pain here spoken of; for so we find, (that in the sentence pronounced against the serpent, against the earth, and against man, the word of God was not only declarative, but executive likewise, as producing a real change by a new modification of matter, or conformation of parts.—Revelation Examined; and Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. 1.

^c The words in the text are, 'In the sweat of thy face, shalt thou eat bread,' ver. 19. From whence some conclude, that the earth, before the fall, brought forth spontaneously, (as several of the ancient poets have described the golden age,) and without any pains to cultivate it; as indeed there needed none, since all things at first were, by the divine power, created in their full perfection. What labour would have been necessary in time, if man had continued innocent, we do not know; only we may observe from the words, that less pains would then have been required, than men are now forced to take for their sustenance. The wisdom, goodness, and justice of God, however, is very conspicuous, in decreeing, that toil and drudgery should be the consequence of departing from an easy and rational obedience; in making the earth less desirable to man, when his guilt had reduced him to the necessity of leaving it; and in keeping in order those passions and appetites which had now broke loose from the restraint of reason, by subduing their impetuosity with hard labour.—Patrick's Commentary; and Revelation Examined.

^d Milton brings in God, soon after the fall, appointing his holy angels to make an alteration in the course of the celestial bodies, and to possess them with noxious qualities, in order to destroy the fertility of the earth, and thereby punish man for his transgression.

The sun

Had its first precept so to move, so shine,
As might affect the earth with cold and heat
Scarce tolerable; and from the north to call Decrepid winter; from the south to bring Subsistat summer's heat. To the blank moon
Her office they prescrib'd, to th' other five
The planetary motions and aspects Of noxious efficacy, and when to join
In synod unbenign; and taught the fix'd
Their influence malignant when to shower:
Which of them, rising with the sun, or falling,
Should prove tempestuous. To the winds they set Their corners, when with bluster to confound Sea, air, and shore. the thunder then to roll
With terror through the dark aerial hall—
These changes in the heavens, though slow, produce
Like change on sea, and land, sidereal blast,
Vapour, and mist, and exhalation hot,
Corrupt and pestilent.

^e It cannot be denied, but that the skins of beasts were a very ancient sort of clothing. Diodorus Siculus, b. 1., where he introduces Hercules in a lion's skin, tells us no less; and the author to the Hebrews makes mention of this kind of habit: but the Jewish doctors have carried the matter so far, as to maintain, that as Adam was a priest, this coat of his was his priestly garment which he left to his posterity: so that Abel, Noah, Abraham, and the rest of the patriarchs, sacrificed in it, until the time that Aaron was made high priest, and had peculiar vestments appointed him by God. But all this fine fiction of theirs falls to the ground, if we can but suppose with some, that by the word which we render coats, we may not improperly those beasts, which, very probably, they were appointed to sacrifice, either in confirmation of the covenant of grace couched in the sentence pronounced against the serpent, or as a representation of that great expiatory sacrifice, which, in the fulness of time, God might inform them, was to be offered as a propitiation for the sins of all mankind; and, upon this account, it very likely was, that Adam changed his wife's name (who, as some think, was called Isscha before) into that of Eve, as believing that God would make her the mother of all mankind, and of the promised seed in particular, by whom he hoped for a restoration both to himself and his posterity, and to be raised from death to a state of happiness and immortal life.

Considering then a what a sad catastrophe this transgression of theirs had brought upon human nature, and that such a scene of complicated misery might not be perpetuated by means of the tree of life, God in his great mercy, found it convenient to remove them from the garden of paradise into that part of the country lying understand tents, or arbours, to defend our first parents from the violence of the heats, and such hasty showers as were common in the countries adjacent to paradise, and where the winter was not so cold as to require coats made of skins, which would certainly be too warm. That they could not be the skins of slain animals is very manifest, because as yet there were no more than two of each species, male and female, nor had they propagated. And therefore others have imagined, that if the original word must mean coats, they were more probably made of the bark of trees, which are called dephata, the skins of them, as well as the hides of animals.—See Le Clerc, and Patrick's Commentary; and Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. 1.

a The words in the text are these, 'Behold the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil; and now, lest he put forth his hand, and taste of the tree of life, and live for ever,' Gen. iii. 22. The former of these sentences is held by most interpreters to be an irony, spoken in allusion to the devil's manner of tempting Eve, ver. 5.; but, from the latter part of the words, this question seems to arise, "Whether Adam and Eve, if they had tasted of the tree of life, after their transgression, should have lived for ever?" Now it is very manifest, that by the violation of God's command, they had justly incurred the penalty, 'In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die,' that is, shalt surely become mortal: from whence it follows, that whether they had, or had not eaten of the tree of life, they were, the moment they fell, subject to the necessity of dying, nor could the virtue of the tree, be what it would, preserve them from the execution of the sentence; and therefore these latter words, 'And now, lest he put forth his hand and taste of the tree of life, and live for ever,' are, in like manner, spoken sarcastically, and as if God had said, "Lest the man should vainly fancy in himself, that by eating of the tree of life, he shall be enabled to live for ever, let us remove this conceit from him, by removing him from this place, and for ever debarring him from any hopes of coming at that tree again."—Estus on Diff. Passages.

Examples of God's speaking by way of sarcasm, or upbraiding, are not uncommon in Scripture; but considering that, in 'the midst of judgment, he here thinketh upon mercy;' that before the sentence against our first parents, he promises them a restoration, and after sentence passed, does nevertheless provide them with clothing; some have thought, that the words, by taking the original verb (see Gell's Essay) to signify the time past, (as it may well enough do,) are rather an expression of pity and compassion, and of the same import as if God had said, "The man was once, like one of us, to know good and to pursue it; to know evil, and to avoid it; (for that is the perfection of moral knowledge;) but behold how he is now degenerated! And therefore, lest this degeneracy should continue upon him, and he become obdurate, the best way will be to seclude him from the tree of life, by expelling him from paradise." But this opinion seems to ascribe too much to the power of the tree, and is not supported with authority equal to the former.

towards the east, where at first he created them; and that he might prevent their meditating a return, he secured every passage leading to it with a guard of angels, (some of which flying to and fro in the air, in bright refulgent bodies, seemed to flash out fire on every side, or to resemble the b vibrations of a flaming sword) that thereby he might deter them from any thoughts of ever attempting a re-entrance, until he should think fit to destroy, and utterly lay waste the beauty of the place. Thus fell our first parents, and, from the happiest condition that can be imagined, plunged themselves and their posterity into a state of wretchedness and corruption: for, as from one common root, ¹ 'sin entered into the world, and death by sin; so death passed upon all men, forasmuch as all have sinned,' and been defiled by this original pollution.

CHAP. II.—Difficulties obricated, and Objections answer'd.

How long our first parents continued in their state of innocence, and in the possession of the garden of Eden, is not so well agreed. The account of their fall in the series of history, follows immediately their introduction into their blissful abode; whereupon ² most of the Jewish doctors, and some of the Christian fathers, were of opinion, that they preserved their integrity but a very short while; that in the close of the same day wherein they were made, they transgressed the covenant, and were the very same day cast out of paradise. But we are to consider, that many circumstances are omitted in the Scriptures concerning the state of our first parents, and the manner of their transgression; that Moses makes mention of nothing but what is conducive to his main design, which is to give a brief account of the most remarkable transactions that had happened from the beginning of the world to his time; and that there are sundry good reasons which may induce us to believe, that the state of man's innocence was of a longer duration than those, who are for precipitating matters, are pleased to think it.

God indeed can do what he pleases in an instant; but

b What is meant by the flaming sword represented to be in the hands of the cherubim, at the entrance of the garden of paradise, is variously conjectured by learned men: but, of all essays of this kind, that of Tertullian, who thought it was the Torrid Zone, is the most unhappy.—Tertul. Apol. ch. 47. The words of Lactantius are (Divine Justice, b. ii. ch. 12.) Ipsam paradisum igne circumvallavit, He encompassed paradise with a wall of fire: from whence a learned man of our nation, pretending that the original word signifies a dividing flame, as well as a flaming sword, supposes, that this flame was an ascension of some combustible matter round about the garden, which excluded all comers to it, till such time as the beauty of the place was defaced.—Nicholls's Conference, vol. 1. Some Rabbins are of opinion, that this flaming sword was an angel, founding their sentiments on that passage in the Psalms, where it is said, that 'God maketh his angels spirits, and his ministers a flaming fire,' Ps. civ. 4. And hereupon another learned man of our nation has imagined, that this flaming sword (which was accounted by the Jews a second angel) was of a different kind from the cherubim, namely, a seraph, or flaming angel, in the form of a flying fiery serpent, whose body vibrated in the air with lustre, and may fitly be described by the image of such a sword.—Tennison of Idolatry.

A. M. 1. A. C. 4094; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, 5411. GEN. CH. 3.

man necessarily requires a succession of time to transact his affairs in; and therefore when we read of Adam, in the same day that he was created, (and that was not until God had made every beast of the field,) ¹ inquiring into the nature of every living creature, and imposing on them proper names; falling into a deep sleep, and, with some formality, (without doubt,) receiving his wife from the hand of God; removing into the garden of paradise, and (as we may well suppose) walking about, and taking some survey of it; receiving from God both a promise and prohibition, and thereupon (as we may suppose again) ² ratifying the first great covenant with him: when we read of all these things, I say, we cannot but think, that some time must be required for the doing of them; and therefore to suppose, after this, ³ that in the close of the same day, the woman wandered from her husband, met the serpent, entered into a parley with him, was overcome by his insinuations, did eat of the forbidden fruit, did prevail with her husband to do the same, and thereupon perceiving themselves naked, did instantly fall to work, and make themselves aprons: to suppose, that in the same evening God comes down, summons the criminals before him, hears their excuses, decrees their punishments, drives them out of paradise, and places two cherubim to guard all avenues against their return; this is crowding too long a series of business into too short a compass of time, and thereby giving an handle to infidelity, when there is no manner of occasion for it.

We, who are not ignorant of Satan's devices, and how ready he is to wait for a favourable occasion to address his temptations to every man's humour and complexion, can hardly suppose, ⁴ that he would have set upon the woman immediately after the prohibition was given; and not rather have waited, until it was in some measure forgot, and the happy opportunity of finding her alone should chance to present itself; but such an opportunity could not well instantly have happened, because the love and endearments between this couple, at first, we may well imagine, was so tender and affecting, as not to admit of the least absence or separation: nor must we forget (what the history itself tells us) that they were so much accustomed to ⁵ 'the voice of God walking in the garden in the cool of the day,' as not to account it any new thing; and so well acquainted with the nature and plantation of the garden, as to run directly to the darkest thickets and umbrages, in order to hide themselves from his sight; which must have been the result of more than an hour or two's experience. And therefore, (if we may be allowed to follow others in their conjectures) ⁶ it was either on the tenth day of the world's age, that our first parents fell, and were expelled paradise, in memory of which calamity, ⁷ 'the great day of expiation,' (which was the tenth day of the year,) wherein 'all were required to afflict their souls,' was, in after ages, instituted; or (as others would rather have it) on the eighth day from their creation: ⁸ that as the first week in the world ended with the formation of man and woman, the second was probably concluded with their fatal seduction.

When man is said to have been made according to the likeness and image of God, it cannot be supposed, but that he was created in the full perfection of his nature; and yet ⁹ it must be remembered, that 'a no created being can, in its own nature, be incapable of sin and default. Its perfections, be they what they will, are finite, and whatever has bounds set to its perfections, is, in this respect, imperfect, that is, it wants those perfections which a being of infinite perfections only can have: and whatever wants any perfection, is certainly capable of mis-carrying. And as every finite creature is capable of default, so every rational being must necessarily have a liberty of choice, that is, it must have a will to choose, as well as an understanding to reason; because a faculty of understanding, without a will to determine it, if left to itself, must always think of the same subject, or proceed in a series and connexion of thoughts, without any end or design, which will be a perpetual labour in vain, or a thoughtfulness to no purpose. And as every rational being has a liberty of choice, so, to direct that choice, it must of necessity have a prescribed rule of its actions.

God indeed, who is infinite in perfection, is a rule to himself, and acts according to his own essence, from whence it is impossible for him to vary; but the most perfect creatures must act by a rule, which is not essential to them, but prescribed them by God, and is not so intrinsic in their natures, but that they may decline from it; for a free agent may follow, or not follow, the rule prescribed him, or else he would not be free.

Now, in order to know how it comes to pass, that we so frequently abuse our natural freedom, and transgress the rules which God hath set us, we must remember, that ¹⁰ the soul of man is seated in the midst, as it were, between those more excellent beings, which live perpetually above, and with whom it partakes in the sublimity of its nature and understanding, and those inferior terrestrial beings with which it communicates, through the vital union it has with the body; and that, by reason of its natural freedom, it is sometimes assimilated to the one, and sometimes to the other of these extremes. We must observe further, that, ¹¹ in this compound nature of ours, there are several powers and faculties, several inclinations and dispositions, several passions and affections, differing in their nature and tendency, according as they result from the soul or body; that each of these has its proper object, in a due application of which it is a God, though he be omnipotent, cannot make any created being 'absolutely perfect': for whatever is absolutely perfect, must necessarily be self-existent: but it is included in the very notion of a creature, as such, not to exist of itself, but of God. An absolutely perfect creature therefore implies a contradiction: for it would be of itself, and not of itself, at the same time. Absolute perfection, therefore, is peculiar to God; and should he communicate his own peculiar perfection to another, that other would be God. Imperfection must, therefore, be tolerated in creatures, notwithstanding the divine omnipotence and goodness; for contradictions are no objects of power. God indeed might have refrained from acting, and continued alone self-sufficient, and perfect to all eternity; but infinite goodness would by no means allow of this; and therefore since it obliged him to produce external things, which things could not possibly be perfect, it preferred these imperfect things to none at all; from whence it follows, that imperfection arose from the infinity of divine goodness.—King's Essay on the Origin of Evil.

easy and satisfied; that they are none of them sinful in themselves, but may be instruments of much good, when rightly applied, as well as occasion great mischief, by a misapplication; and therefore a considerable part of virtue will consist in regulating them, and in keeping our sensitive part subject to the rational. This is the original constitution of our nature: and since our first parents were endued with the same powers and faculties of mind, and had the same dispositions and inclinations of body, it cannot be, but that they must have been liable to the same sort of temptations; and consequently liable to comply with the dictates of sense and appetite, contrary to the direction of reason, or the precepts of Almighty God. And to this cause the Scripture seems to ascribe the commission of the first sin, when it tells us that 'the woman saw the tree, that it was good for food, and pleasant to the eye, and desirable to make one wise,' that is, it had several qualities which were adapted to her natural appetites; was beautiful to the sight, and delightful to the taste, and improving to the understanding; which both answered the desire of knowledge implanted in her spiritual, and the love of sensual pleasure resulting from her animal part; and these heightened by the suggestions of the tempter, abated the horrors of God's prohibition, and induced her to act contrary to his express command.

God indeed all along foreknew that she would fall in this inglorious manner; but his foreknowledge did not necessitate her falling, neither did his wisdom ever conceive, that a fallen creature was worse than none at all.¹ The divine nature, as it is in itself, is incomprehensible by human understanding: and not only his nature, but likewise his powers and faculties, and the ways and methods in which he exercises them, are so far beyond our reach, that we are utterly incapable of framing just and adequate notions of them. We attribute to him the faculties of wisdom, understanding, and foreknowledge; but at the same time, we cannot but be sensible, that they are of a nature quite different from ours, and that we have no direct and proper conceptions of them. When we indeed foresee or determine anything, wherein there is no possible matter of obstruction, we suppose the event certain and infallible; and were the foreknowledge and predetermination of God of the same nature with ours, we might be allowed to make the same conclusion: but why may not it be of such a perfection in God, as is consistent both with the freedom of man's will, and contingency of events? 'As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are his ways far above our ways;' and therefore, though it be certain that he who made Eve, and consequently knew all the springs and weights, wherewith she was moved, could not but foresee, how every possible object, that presented itself, would determine her choice; yet this he might do, without himself giving any bias or determination to it at all:² just as the man, who sees the setting of the chimes, can tell, several hours before, what tune they will play, without any positive influence, either upon their setting or their playing. So that Eve, when she was tempted, could not say, 'I was tempted by God,' for God tempteth none: neither had the divine prescience any influence over her choice, but³ 'by her own lust was she drawn away, and enticed; and when lust had conceived, it brought forth sin, and sin, when it was finished, brought forth death.'

That some command was proper to be laid upon man in his state of innocence, is hardly to be denied.⁴ Dependence is included in the very notion of a creature, and as it is man's greatest happiness to depend on God, whose infinite wisdom can contrive, and infinite power can effect whatever he knows to be most expedient for him; so was it Adam's advantage to have a constant sense of that dependence kept upon his mind, and (for that reason) a sure and permanent memorial of it, placed before his eyes, in such a manner, as might make it impossible for him to forget it.

And as this dependence on God was Adam's greatest happiness, so it seems necessary on God's part, and highly comporting with his character of a creator, that he should require of his creatures, in some acts of homage and obedience, (which homage and obedience must necessarily imply some kind of restraint upon their natural liberty) an acknowledgment and declaration of it. And if some restraint of natural liberty was necessary in Adam's case, what restraint could be more easy, than the coercion of his appetite from the use of one tree, amidst an infinite variety of others, no less delicious; and at the same time, what restraint more worthy the wisdom and goodness of God, than the prohibition of a fruit, which he knew would be pernicious to his creature?

The prohibition of some enormous sin, or the injunction of some great rule of moral virtue, we perhaps may account a properer test of man's obedience; but if we consider the nature of things, as they then stood, we may find reason perhaps to alter our sentiments.⁵ The Mosaic tables are acknowledged by all to be a tolerable good system, and to comprise all the general heads of moral virtue; and yet if we run over them, we shall find that they contain nothing suitable to man in the condition wherein we are now considering him.

Had God, for instance, forbidden the worship of false gods, or the worship of graven images; can we suppose, that Adam and Eve, just come out of the hand of their Maker, and visited every day with the light of his glorious presence, could have even been guilty of these? Besides that, the worship of false gods and images was a thing which came into the world several hundreds of years afterwards, either to flatter living princes, or supply the place of dead ones, who, the silly people fancied, were become gods. Had he prohibited perjury and vain swearing; what possible place could these have had in the infant and innocent state of mankind? Perjury was never heard of till the world was better peopled, when commerce and trade came in use, when courts of judicature were settled, and men began to cheat one another, and then deny it, and so forswear it: and oaths and imprecations could never have a being in a state of innocence: they borrow their original manifestly from the sinfulness of human nature.

The like may be said of all the rest. How could Adam and Eve have 'honoured their father and their mother,' when they never had any? What possible temptation could they have to be guilty of murder, when they must have acted it upon their own flesh? How could they commit adultery, when they were the only two upon the face of the earth? How be guilty of theft when they were the sole proprietors of all? How bear false witness against their neighbour, or covet his goods, when there was never a neighbour in the world for them to be so unjust to? And so (if we proceed to Christian precepts) how could they love enemies, how could they forgive trespasses, when they had no one in the world to offend against them? And the duties of mortification and self-denial, &c., how could they possibly exercise these, when they had no lust to conquer, no passion to overcome, but were all serene and calm within?

Since, therefore, all the moral precepts, that we are acquainted with, were improper for the trial of man's obedience in his state of innocence; it remains, that his probation was most properly to be effected, by his doing or forbearing some indifferent action, neither good nor evil in itself, but only so far good or evil, as it was commanded or forbidden. And if such a command was to be chosen, what can we imagine so natural and agreeable to the state of our first parents, (considering they were to live all their lives in a garden) as the forbidding them to eat of the fruit of a certain tree in that garden, a tree hard at hand, and might every moment be eaten of, and would therefore every moment give them an opportunity of testifying their obedience to God by their forbearing it? a wise appointment this, had not the great enemy of mankind come in and defeated it.

Who this great enemy of mankind was, and by what method of insinuation he drew our first parents into their defection, Moses, who contents himself with relating facts as they happened outwardly, without any comment, or exposition of them, or who, by a metonymy in the Hebrew tongue, uses the instrumental for the efficient cause, tells us expressly, that it was the serpent; and for this reason, some of the ancient Jews ran into a fond conceit, that ¹ this whole passage is to be understood of a real serpent; which creature, ² they suppose, before the fall, to have had the faculty of speech and reason both. But this is too gross a conception to have many abettors; and therefore the common, and indeed the only probable opinion is, that it was the devil; some wicked and malicious spirit (probably one of the chief of that order) who envied the good of mankind, the favours God had bestowed upon them, and the future happiness he had ordained for them, and was thereupon resolved to tempt them to disobedience, thereby to bring them to the same forlorn condition with himself, and his other apostate brethren; and that, to effect his purpose, he made use of a serpent's body, wherein to transact his fraud and imposture.

Why the devil chose to assume the form of a serpent, rather than that of any other creature, we may, in some measure, learn from the character which the Scripture gives us of it, namely, that 'it was more subtle than any beast of the field, that the Lord God had made;' where the word 'subtle' may not so much denote the craft and insiduousness, as the gentle, familiar, and insinuating nature of this creature. ³ That the serpent, before the fall, was mild and gentle, and more familiar with man, than any other animal: that ^a it did not creep on the ground, but went with its head and breast reared up, and advanced: that by frequently approaching our first parents, and playing and sporting before them, it had gained their good liking and esteem, is not only the sentiment both ⁴ of Jews and ⁵ Christians, but what seems likewise to have some foundation in Scripture; for when God says, 'That he will put enmity between the serpent and the woman, and between his seed and her seed,' the implication must be, that there was some sort of kindness and intimacy between them before.

There is no absurdity then in supposing that this creature was beloved both by Adam and Eve. She especially might be highly delighted, and used to play and divert herself with it. ⁶ She laid it perhaps in her bosom, adorned her neck with its windings, and made it a bracelet for her arms. So that its being thus intimate with the woman, made it the proper instrument for the devil's purpose, who sliding himself into it, might wantonly play before her, until he insensibly brought her to the forbidden tree: and then, twisting about its branches, might take of the fruit, and eat, to show her, by experience, that there was no deadly quality in it, before he began his address; and his speech might be the less frightful or surprising to her, who, in the state of her innocence, not knowing what fear was, might probably think (as he might positively affirm) ^b that this new-acquired faculty proceeded from the virtue of the tree.

But there is another conjecture still more probable, if we will not allow, that the serpent was not of a common ordinary species, but one very probably something like that fiery flying sort, which, we are told, are bred in Arabia and Egypt. ⁷ They are of a shining yellowish colour like brass, and by the motion of their wings and vibration of their tails, reverberating the sunbeams, make

^a The beauty of the serpent, which the devil made choice of, is thus described by Milton:—

So spake the enemy of mankind, enclosed
In serpent, inmate bad! and toward Eve
Address'd his way: not with indented wave,
Proned on the ground, as since, but on his rear,
Circular base of rising folds, that tower'd,
Fold above fold, a surging maze! his head
Crested aloft, and carbuncle his eyes;
With burnish'd neck of verdant gold, erect Amidst his circling spires, that on the grass
Floated redundant: pleasing was his shape,
And lovely. —

^b Eve, upon hearing the serpent speak, inquires by what means it was, that it came by that faculty; and is told, that it was by eating of a certain tree in the garden.

I was at first, as other beasts that graze
The trodden herb, of abject thoughts and low ——— Till on a day, roving the field, I chanced
A goodly tree far distant to behold,
Laden with fruit of various colours, mix'd
Ruddy and gold. —
To satisfy the sharp desire I had
Of tasting these fair apples, I resolved
Not to defer —
Sated at length, ere long, I might perceive Strange alteration in me, to degree
Of reason in my inward powers; and speech
Wanted not long, though to this shape retained.
Thenceforth to speculation high or deep
I turn'd my thoughts, and with capacious mind Considered all things visible in heaven,
Or earth, or middle.

a glorious appearance. Now, if the serpent, whose body the devil abused, was of this kind (though perhaps of a species far more glorious,) it was a very proper creature for him to make use of. For these serpents we find called in Scripture seraphs, or seraphim, which gave the name to those bright lofty angels, who were frequently employed by God to deliver his will to mankind, and, coming upon that errand, were wont to put on certain splendid forms, some of the form of cherubim, that is, beautiful flying oxen, and others the shape of seraphim, that is, winged and shining serpents. Upon this hypothesis, we may imagine farther, that the devil, observing that good angels attended the divine presence, and sometimes ministered to Adam and Eve in this bright appearance, usurped the organs of one of these shining serpents, which, by his art and skill in natural causes, he might improve into such a wonderful brightness, as to represent to Eve the usual shechina, or angelical appearance, she was accustomed to; and, under this disguise, she might see him approach her without fear, and hear him talk to her without surprise, and comply with his seduction with less reluctance; as supposing him to be an angel of God's retinue, and now dispatched from heaven to instruct her in some momentous point, as she had often perhaps experienced before during her stay in paradise.

A learned Jew has expounded this transaction in a new and uncommon way. He supposes that the serpent did not speak at all, nor did Eve say any thing to it; but that, being a very nimble and active creature, it got upon the tree of knowledge, took of the fruit and eat it; and that Eve, having seen it several times do so, and not die, concluded with herself that the tree was not of such a destructive quality as was pretended; that as it gave speech and reason to the serpent, it would much more improve and advance her nature; and was thereupon emboldened to eat.

This opinion is very plausible, and, in some degree, founded on Scripture: for though the woman might perceive by her senses, that the fruit was pleasant to the eye, yet it was impossible she could know, either that it was good for food, or desirable to make one wise, any other way than by the example and experiment of the serpent, which merely by eating of that fruit, (as she thought,) was changed from a brute into a rational and vocal creature. This, I say, is a pretty plausible solution; and yet it cannot be denied, but that the text seems to express something more, and that there was a real dialogue between the woman and the serpent, wherein the serpent had the advantage. And therefore (to persist in our former exposition) it is not improbable, that the tempter, before ever he accosted Eve, transformed himself into the likeness of an angel of light, and prefacing his speech with some short congratulations of her happiness, might proceed to insure her with some such cunning harangue as this:

“And can it possibly be that so good a God, who has so lately been so bountiful to you, as to give you such an excellent being, and invest you with power and dominion over all the rest of his creatures, should now envy you any of the innocent pleasures of nature? Has he indeed denied you the use of the tree of knowledge? But why did he plant it at all? Why did he adorn it with such beautiful fruit? Why did he place it on an eminence in the garden, for you to behold daily, unless he is minded to tantalize you? The true design, both of the prohibition and penalty which you relate, is to keep you in ignorance, and thereby oblige you to live in perpetual dependence on him. He knows full well, that the virtue of this tree is to illuminate the understanding, and thereby to enable you to judge for yourselves, without having recourse to him upon every occasion. ²To judge for himself is the very privilege that makes him God; and for that reason he keeps it to himself: but eat but of this tree, and ye shall be like him; your beings shall be in your own hands, and your happiness vast and inconceivable, and independent on any other. What effect it has had on me, you cannot but see and hear, since it has enabled me to reason and discourse in this wise; and, instead of death, has given a new kind of life to my whole frame. And, if it has done this to a brute animal, what may not creatures of your refined make, and excellent perfections, expect from it? Why should you shrink back, or be afraid to do it then? You have here an opportunity of making yourselves, for ever; and the trespass is nothing. What harm in eating an apple? Why this tree of knowledge more sacred than all the rest? Can so great a punishment as death be proportionate to so small a fault? I come to assure you that it is not; that God has reversed his decree, and eat you what you will, ye surely shall not die.”

³ Thus the serpent suggested to Eve, that God had imposed upon her, and she was willing to discover whether he had or no. Curiosity, and a desire of independency, to know more, and to be entire master of herself, were the affections which the tempter promised to gratify; and an argument like this has seldom failed ever since to corrupt the generality of mankind: insomuch that few, very few, have been able to resist the force of this temptation, especially when it comes (as it did to Eve) clothed with all the outward advantage of allurements. For whoever knows the humour of youth, and how he himself was affected at that time, cannot but be sensible, that as the fairness of the fruit, its seeming fitness for food, the desire of being independent, and under her own management and government, were inducements that prevailed with our first parents to throw off the conduct of God: so this curiosity of trying the pleasures of sense, this itch of being our own masters, and choosing for ourselves, together with the charming face of sin, and our ignorance and inexperience of the consequences of it, are generally the first means of our being corrupted against the good maxims and principles we received from our parents and teachers.

It is in the essential constitution of man, (as we said before,) that he should be a free agent; and if we consider him now as in a state of probation, we shall soon perceive, that God could not lay any restraint upon him, nor communicate any assistance to him, but what was consistent with the nature he had given him, and the state he had placed him in. God created man a free agent,⁴ that he might make the system of the universe perfect, and supply that vast opening which must otherwise have happened between heaven and earth, had he not interposed some other creature (endued with rationality, master of his own elections, and consequently capable of serving him voluntarily and freely) between angels and brutes. In the very act of creating him, therefore, God intended that he should be rational, and determined, as it were by a law, that he should be free; and having engrafted this in his make, it would have been a violation of his own laws, and infraction on his own work, to have interposed, and hindered the use of that faculty, which by the law of nature, he had established. We do not expect, that the situation of the earth, or the course of the sun should be altered on our account, because these seem to be things of great importance; and we apprehend it unreasonable, that for our private advantage, the order and harmony of things should be changed, to the detriment of so many other beings. But to alter the will, to stop the election, is no less a violation of the laws of nature, than to interrupt the course of the sun, because a free agent is a more noble being than the sun. The laws of its nature are to be esteemed more sacred, and cannot be changed without a great miracle: there would then be a kind of shock and violence done to nature, if God should interfere, and hinder the actions of free-will; and perhaps it would prove no less pernicious to the intellectual system, than the sun's standing still would be to the natural.

To apply these reflections to the matter now before us. Had God, to prevent man's sin, taken away the liberty of his will, he had thereby destroyed the foundation of all virtue, and the very nature of man himself. For virtue would not have been such, had there been no possibility of acting contrary, and man's nature would have been divine, had it been made impeccable. Had God given our first parents then such powerful influences of his Holy Spirit, as to have made it impossible for them to sin, or had he sent a guard of angels, to watch and attend them so as to hinder the devil from proposing any temptation, or them from hearkening to any; had he, I say, supernaturally overruled the organs of their bodies, or the inward inclinations of their minds, upon the least tendency to evil; in this case he had governed them, not as free, but as necessary agents, and put it out of his own power to have made any trial of them at all. All therefore that he could do, and all that in reason might be expected from him to do, was to give them such a sufficient measure of power and assistance, as might enable them to be a match for the strongest temptation; and this, there is no question to be made, but that he did do.

make choice of any other. Their passions were sedate, and subordinate to their reason; and, when any difficulties did arise, they had God at all times to have recourse to: by which means it came to pass, that it was as hard for them to sin, as it is difficult for us to abstain from sinning; as easy for them to elude temptations then, as it is natural for us to be led away by temptations now. And therefore, if, notwithstanding all these mighty advantages towards a state of impeccancy, they made it their option to transgress, their perverseness only is to be blamed, and not any want of sufficient assistance from their bounteous Creator.

Great indeed is the disorder which their transgression has brought upon human nature; but there will be no reason to impeach the goodness of God for it, if we take but in this one consideration, That what he thought not fit to prevent by his almighty power, he has, nevertheless, thought fit to repair by the covenant of mercy in his Son Jesus Christ. By him he has propounded the same reward, everlasting life after death, which we should have had, without death, before; and has given us a better establishment for our virtue now, than we could have had, had we not been sufferers by this first transgression.

For let us suppose, ² that, notwithstanding our first parents had sinned, yet God had been willing that original righteousness should have equally descended upon their posterity; yet we must allow, that any one of their posterity might have been foiled by the wiles of the tempter, and fallen, as well as they did. Now had they so fallen, (the covenant of grace being not yet founded,) how could they ever have recovered themselves to any degree of acceptance with God? Their case must have been the same, as desperate, as forlorn, as that of fallen angels was before: whereas, in the present state of things, our condition is much safer. Sin indeed, by reason of our present infirmity, may more easily make its breaches upon us, either through ignorance or surprise; but it cannot get dominion over us, without our own deliberate option, because it is an express gospel promise against the power of sin, that ³ it 'shall not have dominion over us;' against the power of the devil, that ⁴ 'greater is he that is in you, than he that is in the world;' against the power of temptations, that ⁵ 'God is faithful, who will not suffer us to be tempted above what we are able;' against discouragement from the presence of our infirmities, that ⁶ 'we may do all through Christ that strengthens us;' and, in case of failing, that ⁷ 'we have an advocate with the Father, and a propitiation for our sins.' Thus plentifully did God provide for man's stability in that state of integrity, thus graciously for his restoration, in this state of infirmity. In both cases, his goodness has been conspicuous, and has never failed!

In like manner, (to absolve the divine nature from any imputation of passion or peevishness, of injustice or hard usage, in cursing the serpent and the earth; in driving our lapsed parents out of paradise, and in entailing their guilt and punishment upon the latest posterity,) we should do well to remember, that the serpent, against which the first sentence is denounced, is to be considered here in a double capacity; both as an animal, whose organs the devil employed in the seduction of the woman; and as the devil himself, lying hid and concealed under the figure of the serpent: for the sentence, we may observe, is plainly directed to an intelligent being and free agent, who had committed a crime which a brute could not be capable of.

Now if we consider what a glorious creature the serpent was before the fall, we cannot but suppose that God intended this debasement of it, ¹ not so much to express his indignation against it, (for it had no bad intention, neither was it conscious of what the devil did with its body,) as to make it a monument of man's apostasy, a testimony of his displeasure against sin, and an instructive emblem to deter all future ages from the commission of that which brought such vengeance along with it. In the Levitical law we find, that if a man committed any abomination with a beast, ² the beast was to be slain as well as the man; and, by parity of reason, the serpent is here punished, if not to humble the pride, and allay the triumph of the devil, by seeing the instrument of his success so shamefully degraded, at least to remind the delinquents themselves of the foulness of their crime, and the necessity of their repentance, whenever they chanced to behold so noble a creature as the serpent was, reduced to so vile and abject a condition, merely for being the means of their transgression.

But God might have a farther design in this degradation of the serpent: he foresaw, that in future ages, Satan would take pride in abusing this very creature to the like pernicious purposes, and, under the semblance of serpents of all kinds, would endeavour to establish the vilest idolatry, even the idolatry of his own hellish worship. That therefore the beauty of the creature might be no provocation to such idolatry, it was a kind and beneficent act in God to deface the excellence of the serpent's shape, and, at the same time, inspire mankind with the strongest horror and aversion to it. Nor can it be denied, but that, ³ if we suppose the devil possessed the serpent, and was, as it were, incarnate in it, the power of God could unite them as closely as our souls and bodies are united, and thereby cause the punishment inflicted on the literal serpent to affect Satan as sensibly as the injuries done our bodies do reach our souls; at least, while that very serpent was in being.

To consider Satan then under the form of a serpent, we shall see the propriety of the other part of the sentence denounced against him, and what comfort and consolation our criminal parents might reasonably collect from thence. That this part of the sentence, 'I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed: it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel,' ⁴ is not to be understood in a literal sense, (because such sense is absurd and ridiculous,) every reader of competent understanding must own: and therefore its meaning must be such as will best agree with the circumstances of the transaction. Now the transaction was thus.—Adam, tempted by his wife, and she by the serpent, had fallen from their obedience, and were now in the presence of God expecting judgment. ⁵ They knew full well, at that juncture, that their fall was the victory of the serpent, whom by experience, they found to be an enemy to God and man: to man, whom he had ruined by seducing him to sin; and to God the noble work of whose creation he had defaced. It could not therefore but be some comfort to them, to hear the serpent first condemned, and to see that, however he had prevailed against them, he had gained no victory over their Maker, who was able to assert his own honour, and to punish this great author of iniquity. Nor was it less a consolation to them to hear from the mouth of God likewise, that the serpent's victory was not a complete victory over even themselves; that they and their posterity should be able to contest his empire; and though they were to suffer much in the struggle, yet finally they should prevail, bruise the serpent's head, and deliver themselves from his power and dominion over them.

This certainly is the lowest sense wherein our first parents could have understood this part of the sentence wrestled with death, and, in the struggle, to have been brought upon one knee, to have 'bruised the head' of the great serpent with his mace; and in his final engagement with that monster to have beat him to the earth, and slain him. This victory, however, is not obtained but at the expense of his own life: "Receding back nine steps, he falls dead upon the spot, suffocated with the floods of venom, which the serpent vomits forth upon him." (Edda, Fab. 11. 25. 27. 32.) Much the same notion, we are informed, is prevalent in the mythology of the Hindoos. Two sculptured figures are yet extant in one of their oldest pagodas, the former of which represents Chreeshna, an incarnation of their mediatorial god Vishnu, trampling on the crushed head of the serpent; while in the latter it is seen encircling the deity in its folds, and biting his heel. (Mannie's History of Hindostan, vol. ii. p. 290.) It is said that Zeradusht, or Zoroaster, predicted in the Zendavesta, that in the latter days would appear a man called Osanderbeghâ, who was destined to bless the earth by the introduction of justice and religion; that, in his time, would likewise appear a malignant demon, who would oppose his plans, and trouble his empire, for the space of twenty years; that afterwards, Osiderbegha would revive the practice of justice, put an end to injuries, and re-establish such customs as are immutable in their nature: that kings should be obedient to him, and advance his affairs; that the cause of true religion should flourish; that peace and tranquillity should prevail, and discord and trouble cease. (Hyde on the Religion of the Ancient Persians, c. 31.) According to Amulpharagus, the Persian legislator wrote of the advent of the Messiah in terms even more express than those contained in the foregoing prediction. "Zeradusht," says he, "the preceptor of the Magi, taught the Persians concerning the manifestation of Christ, and ordered them to bring gifts to him, in token of their reverence and submission. He declared, that in the latter days a pure virgin would conceive; and that as soon as the child was born, a star would appear, blazing even at noon-day with undiminished lustre. "You, my sons," exclaims the venerable seer, "will perceive its rising, before any other nation. As soon, therefore, as you shall behold the star, follow it whithersoever it shall lead you, and adore that mysterious child, offering your gifts to him with the profoundest humility. He is the almighty Word, which created the heavens." (Cited by Hyde on the Religion of the Ancient Persians, c. 31.)

denounced against the serpent; and yet this very sense was enough to revive in them comfortable hopes of a speedy restoration. For when Adam heard that the seed of the woman was to destroy the evil spirit, he undoubtedly understood Eve to be that woman, and some issue of his by her to be that seed; and accordingly we may observe, that when Eve was delivered of Cain, the form of her exultation is, ¹ 'I have gotten a man from the Lord,' that is, I have gotten a man through the signal favour and mercy of God. ² Now this extraordinary exultation cannot be supposed to arise from the bare privilege of bearing issue, for that privilege (as she could not but know before this time) she had in common with the meanest brutes; and therefore her transport must arise from the prospect of some extraordinary advantage from this issue, and that could be no other than the destruction of her enemy.

Cain indeed proved a wicked man; but when she had conceived better expectations from Abel, and Cain had slain him, she, nevertheless, recovered her hopes upon the birth of Seth; because ³ God, saith she, 'hath appointed me another seed,' or one who will destroy the power of Satan, instead of Abel, whom Cain slew. Thus we see, that the obscurity in which it pleased God to foretell the destruction of the evil spirit, gave rise to a succession of happy hopes in the breast of Adam and Eve; who (if they had known that this happiness was to be postponed for four thousand years) would, in all probability, have inevitably fallen into an extremity of despair.

But how necessary soever God might think it, to give our first parents, some general hopes and expectations of a restoration; yet, being now fallen into a state of sin and corruption, which must of course infect their latest posterity, he found it expedient to deprive them of that privilege of immortality, wherewith he had invested them, and (as an act of justice and mercy both) to turn them out of paradise, and debar them from the tree of life: of justice, in that they had forfeited their right to immortality, by transgressing a command, which nothing but a vain, criminal curiosity could make them disobey; and of mercy, in that, when sin had entailed all kinds of calamity upon human nature, in such circumstances, to have perpetuated life, would have been to perpetuate misery.

This, I think, can hardly be accounted the effect of passion or peevishness: and, in like manner, God's cursing the ground, or (what is all one) his depriving it of its original fruitfulness, by a different turn given to the air, elements, and seasons, was not the effect of anger, or any hasty passion, (which God is not capable of,) but of calm and equitable justice; since it was man (who had done enough to incur the divine displeasure) that was to suffer by the curse, and not the ground itself: for the ground felt no harm by 'bringing forth thorns and thistles,' but Adam, who for some time had experienced the spontaneous fertility of paradise, was a sufficient sufferer by the change, when he found himself reduced to hard labour, and forced 'to eat his bread by the sweat of his brows.'

It must be acknowledged therefore, ⁴ that there was good reason, why the penalty of the first transgression should be greater than any subsequent one; because it was designed to deter posterity, and to let them see, by this example, that whatever condemnation God denounces against guilt will most infallibly be executed. We mistake, however, the nature of God's laws, and do in effect renounce his authority, when we suppose, that good and evil are in the nature of things only, and not in the commandments and prohibitions of God. ⁵ Whatever God is pleased to command or forbid, how indifferent soever it be in itself, is for that very reason, so far as it is commanded or forbidden by him, as truly good or evil, as if it were absolutely and morally so, being enacted by the same divine authority, which makes all moral precepts obligatory. God, in short, is our lawgiver, and whatever he commands, whether it be a moral precept or positive injunction, so far as he enacts it, is of the same necessary and indispensable obligation. Upon this it follows, that all sin is a transgression of the law, and a contempt of God's authority: but then the aggravations of a sin do arise from the measure of its guilt, and the parties' advantages to have avoided it; under which consideration, nothing can be more heinous than the sin of our first parents. It was not only a bare disobedience to God's command, by a perfect infidelity to his promises and threats; it was a sort of idolatry in believing the devil, and putting a greater trust in him, than in God. It was an horrible pride in them to desire to be like God, and such a diabolical pride, as made the evil angels fall from heaven. Covetousness, and a greedy theft it was, to desire and purloin, what was none of his own; and one of the most cruel and unparalleled murders that ever was committed, to kill and destroy so many thousands of their offspring. ⁶ Add to this, that it was a disobedience against God, an infinite being, and of infinite dignity; a God, who had given them existence, and that so very lately, that the impresses of it could not be worn out of their memory; that had bestowed so much happiness upon them, more than on all the creation besides; that had made them lords over all, and restrained nothing from them, but only the fruit of this one tree. Add again, that they committed this sin, against the clearest conviction of conscience, with minds fully illuminated by the divine Spirit, with all possible assistance of grace to keep them from it, and no untoward bent of nature, or unruly passion to provoke them to it: and, putting all this together, it will appear, that this was a sin of the deepest dye, and that no man, now-a-days, can possibly commit a crime of such a complicated nature, and attended with such horrid aggravations.

It is the opinion of some, ⁷ that the fruit of the forbidden tree might be impregnated with some fermenting juice, which put the blood and spirits into a great disorder, and thereby divested the soul of that power and dominion it had before over the body; which, by its operation, clouded the intellect, and depraved the will, and reduced every faculty of the mind to a miserable depravity, which, along with human nature, has been propagated down to posterity: ⁷ as some poisons (we know) will strangely affect the nerves and spirits, without causing immediate death; and ¹ as the Indians (we are told) are acquainted with a juice which will immediately turn the person who drinks it into an idiot, and yet leave him, at the same time, the enjoyment of his health and all the powers and faculties of his body. But whatever the effect of the fruit might be, and whether the corruption of our nature and death, (with all the train of evils, which have descended to us,) lay in the tree, or in the will of God, there is no question to be made, but that our wise Creator might very justly decree, that human nature in general should be affected with it, and our happiness or unhappiness depend upon the obedience or disobedience of our first parents. We daily see, that children very often inherit the diseases of their parents, and that a vicious and extravagant father leaves commonly his son heir to nothing else but the name and shadow of a great family, with an infirm and sickly constitution. And if men generally now partake of the bad habits and dispositions of their immediate parents, why might not the corruption of human nature, in the first, have equally descended upon all the rest of mankind? ² The rebellion of a parent, in all civil governments, reduces his children to poverty and disgrace, who had a title before to riches and honours; and for the same reason, why might not Adam forfeit for himself, and all his descendants, the gift of immortality, and the promise of eternal life? God might certainly bestow his own favours upon his own terms: and therefore, since the condition was obedience, he might justly inflict death, that is, withhold immortality from us; and he might justly deny us heaven (for the promise of heaven was an act of his free bounty) upon the transgression and disobedience of our first parents. We were in their loins, and from thence our infection came: they were our representatives, and in them we fell: but then, amidst all this scene of calamity, we have one comfortable, one saving prospect to revive us, namely, that ³ Adam was the figure of him that was to come; and therefore, as by the offence of one, judgment came upon all mankind to condemnation, even so by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life.⁴

This is the account we have of the fall: and though we pretend not to deny, that in some places there are figurative expressions in it, as best comporting with the nature of ancient prophecy, and the oriental manner of writing; yet this can be no argument, why we should immediately run to an allegorical interpretation of the whole.

That not only the poets, but some of the greatest philosophers likewise, had a strange affectation for such figurative documents, in order to conceal their true notions from the vulgar, and to keep their learning within the bounds of their own schools, we pretend not to deny: and yet, since it is apparent, that Moses could have no such design; ⁴ since he had no reason to fear any other philosophers setting up against him, or, running away with his notions; since he affects no other character, but that of a plain historian, and pretends to relate matters just as they happened, without any disguise or embellishment of art; since he orders his books (which he endeavours to suit to the vulgar capacity) to be 'read in the ears of all the people,' and commands 'parents to teach them to their children;' it cannot be supposed, but that the history of the fall as well as the rest of the book of Genesis, is to be taken in a literal sense. All the rest of the book is allowed to be literal, and why should this part of it only be a piece of Egyptian hieroglyphic? Fable and allegory, we know, are directly opposite to history: the one pretends to deliver truth, undisguised, the other to deliver truth indeed, but under the veil and cover of fiction; so that, if this book of Moses be allowed to be historical, we may as well say, that what Thucydides relates of the plague of Athens, or Livy of the battle of Cannæ, is to be understood allegorically, as that what Moses tells us of the prohibition of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, or of Adam and Eve's expulsion from the garden of paradise for breaking it, is to be interpreted in a mystical sense.

Nay, we will put the case, that it were consistent with the character of Moses to have amused the people with fables and allegories; ⁵ yet we can hardly believe, but that the people retained some tradition among them concerning the formation of our first parents, and the manner of their defection. This they might easily have had from their illustrious ancestor Abraham, who might have deduced it from Noah, and thence, in a few successions, from Adam himself; and if there was any such tradition preserved among them, Moses must necessarily have lost all his credit and authority, had he pretended to foist in a tale of his own invention, instead of a true narration. For the short question is, — ⁶ Did the children of Israel know the historical truth of the fall, or did they not? If they did know it, why should Moses disguise it under an allegory, rather than any of the rest of the book of Genesis? If they did not know it, how came it to be forgotten in so few generations of men, supposing it had ever been known to Adam's posterity? If Adam's posterity never rightly knew it, but had the relation thereof always conveyed down in metaphor and allegory, then must Adam, in the first place, impose upon his sons, and they upon succeeding generations; but for what reason we cannot conceive, unless that the most remarkable event that ever befell mankind (except the redemption of the world by Christ) so came to pass, that it was impossible to tell it to posterity any other way than in allegory.

It can scarce be imagined, but that some of the ancient writers of the Jewish church, as well as the inspired writers of the New Testament, had as true a knowledge of these distant traditions, as any modern espouser of allegories can pretend to; and therefore, ⁷ when we read in the book of Wisdom, that ⁸ 'God created man to be immortal, and made him to be the image of his own eternity;' but that, 'through the envy of the devil, death came into the world;' when the son of Sirach tells us, that ⁹ 'God,' at the first, 'filled man with the knowledge of understanding, and, shewed him good and evil,' but ¹ that 'error and darkness had their beginning, together with sinners;' that ² 'death is the sentence of the Lord over all flesh;' ³ that 'the covenant, from the beginning, was, Thou shalt die the death;' and that ⁴ 'of woman came the beginning of sin, and through her we all die:' when we read, and compare all these passages together, I say, can there be any reasonable foundation to doubt in what sense the ancient Jewish church understood the history of the fall?

Nay more. When not only we find the wicked, and the enemies of God represented under the image ⁵ of a 'serpent,' of a 'dragon,' of a 'leviathan, the crooked serpent,' &c.; and the prophet telling us expressly, that ⁶ 'dust shall be the serpent's meat;' but our blessed Saviour likewise declaring, that ⁷ 'the devil was a murderer from the beginning, a liar, and a father of lies;' St Paul asserting, that ⁸ the 'woman being deceived, was first in the transgression,' and that ⁹ the 'serpent beguiled her through his subtilty;' and St John, in his Revelation, ¹⁰ calling that wicked and malicious spirit, the devil, or the dragon, Satan, or the old serpent, indifferently; we cannot but perceive, that these passages are not only plain references to the first deception of mankind under the form of that creature, but that they virtually comprise the sum and substance of the Mosaic account. ¹¹ So that, if we have any regard either to the tradition of the Jewish church, or the testimony of Christ and his apostles, we cannot but believe, that the history of man's fall, and the consequences thereupon, were really such as Moses has represented them.

And to confirm us in this belief, we may observe farther, that the tradition of almost every nation is conformable to his relation of things: ¹² That not only the state of man's innocence, in all probability, gave rise to the poet's fiction of the golden age; but that the story of Adam and Eve, of the tree, and of the serpent, was extant among the Indians long ago, and (as travellers tell us) is still preserved among the Brachmans, and the inhabitants of Peru: ¹³ That, in the old Greek mysteries, the people used to carry about a serpent, and were instructed to cry Eva, whereby the devil seemed to exult, as it were, over the unhappy fall of our first mother; and that ¹⁴ in his worship in idolatrous nations, even now, there are frequent instances of his displaying this his conquest under the figure of a serpent: strong evidences of the truth of the Mosaic account! to say nothing of the rationale which it gives us of our innate 'pudor circa res venereas,' of the pains of childbirth, of the present sterility of the earth, of the slowness of children's education, of their imbecility above all other creatures, of the woman's subjection to her husband, of our natural antipathy to viperous animals, and (what hath puzzled the wisest of the heathen sages to discover) of the depravation of our wills, and our strong propensity to what is evil.

This origin of evil is a question which none of them could resolve. They saw the effect, but were ignorant of the cause; and therefore their conjectures were absurd. ¹⁵ Some of them laid the whole blame on matter, as if its union with the mind gave it a pernicious tincture. Others imagined a pre-existent state, and that the bad inclinations which exerted themselves in this world were first of all contracted in another. ¹⁶ Several established two principles, the one the author of all the good, and the other the author of all the evil (whether natural or moral) that is found in human nature: and, in prejudice to this absurdity, many betook themselves to atheism, and denied any first principle at all; accounting it better to have no God in the world, than such an unaccountable mixture of good and evil. But now, had but these wise men had the advantage of reading the Mosaic account, they would never have taken up with such wild hypotheses, but immediately concluded with our Saviour's argument, that ¹⁷ 'a corrupt tree cannot bring forth good fruit;' because the explication of the rise of sin, by an original lapse, is not only freed from these absurdities wherewith other explications abound, but, according to the sense which the author of the Book of Wisdom has of it, sets the goodness of God in the creation of the world in its proper light; namely, that ¹⁸ 'God made not death, neither hath he pleasure in the destruction of the living. He created all things, that they might have their being, and the generations of the world were healthful. There was no poison of destruction in them, nor the kingdom of death upon the earth, until that ungodly men called it to them;' ¹⁹ and so error and darkness had their beginning together with sinners.

CHAP. III.—On the Sentiments entertained by the Ancients concerning the Origin of Moral Evil.

(SUPPLEMENTAL BY THE EDITOR.)

THE opinions which were entertained by the ancients concerning the origin of moral evil were various.

The operation of some injurious principle vitiating the nature of man, and perverting his moral views, could not be disputed; and the influence of a malignant power seemed even to have introduced disorder in the original appointments of Providence, and to have counteracted the beneficial tendency of his ordinances.

Popular convictions everywhere prevailed touching the existence of some beings of the higher order, who had revolted from the heavenly power which presided over the universe. It is probable that these convictions were originally founded on the circumstances referred to in Scripture with respect to Satan and his angels, as powerful but malevolent beings, who having first seduced Adam from his obedience, incessantly labour to deceive, corrupt, and destroy his descendants. The notion of the Magi of Plutarch, and of the Manicheans, concerning two independent principles, acting in opposition to each other, was also founded on the real circumstances of the apostasy of angels, and of their interference and influence in the affairs of men.

The original temptation, by which they drew our first parents from their duty, and led them to transgress the only prohibition which God had imposed, is described in the first pages of Scripture; and it is repeated under much disguise, in many fables of classical mythology.

Origen considers the allegorical relations furnished by Plato, with respect to Porus tempted by Penia to sin when intoxicated in the garden of Jove, as a disfigured history of the fall of man in paradise. It seems to have been blended with the story of Lot and his daughters. Plato might have acquired, in Egypt, the knowledge of the original circumstances of the fall, and have produced them, under the veil of allegory, that he might not offend the Greeks by a direct extract from the Jewish Scriptures.

The particular circumstances also of the leader of the evil spirits having envied man's happiness, and by disguising himself under the form of a serpent, occasioned his ejection from paradise, was figured out in other accounts.

The worship established towards the evil spirit by his contrivance, sometimes under the very appearance in which he seduced mankind, is to be found among the Phœnicians and Egyptians.

The general idea of the serpent as a mysterious symbol annexed to the heathen deities, and particularly assigned to Æsculapius the god of healing, might have been suggested by perverted representations of the agency of the fallen spirit, who assumed the form of a serpent; and the invocation of Eve in the Bacchanalian orgies, (with the production of a serpent, consecrated as an emblem, to public view,) seems to bear some relation to the history of our first parents who introduced sin and death into the world.

The tutelary deity of particular districts was sometimes introduced in the same manner; thus a serpent is represented by Virgil to have appeared to Æneas.

The first worship of Apollo was offered to him under the representation of a serpent; but Apollo was generally regarded as the deity who had killed the serpent Python, which word was probably derived from the Hebrew word which signifies a serpent. The account of Discord being cast out from heaven, referred to by Agamemnon, in the nineteenth book of Homer's Iliad, has been thought to be a corrupt tradition of the fall of the evil angels.

The original perfection of man, the corruption of human nature resulting from the fall, and the increasing depravity which proceeded with augmented violence from generation to generation, are to be found in various parts of profane literature. Euryalus, the Pythagorean, declared that man was made in the image of God. The loss of that resemblance was supposed to have resulted from the effects of disobedience, and was considered as so universal that it was generally admitted, as is expressed by Horace, that no man was born without vices. The conviction of a gradual deterioration from age to age, of a change from a golden period, by successive transitions to an iron depravity, of a lapse from a state devoid of guilt and fear, to times filled with iniquity, was universally entertained.¹

CHAP. IV.—Of Original Sin.

ORIGINAL SIN indeed is a phrase which does not occur in the whole compass of the Bible; but the nature of the thing itself, and in what manner it came to be committed, are sufficiently related: so that those who admit of the authority of the Scriptures, make no question of the fact. The great matter in dispute is, what the effect of this transgression was; what guilt it contained; what punishment it merited; and in what degree its guilt and punishment both may be said to affect us.

Some have not stuck to affirm, ² that in the beginning of the world, there was no such thing as any express covenant between God and man; that the prohibition of the tree of knowledge was given to our first parents only, and they alone consequently were culpable by its transgression; that Adam, in short, was mortal, like one of us; he was no representative for his posterity; his sin purely personal; and that the imputation of guilt, down to this time, for an offence so many thousand years ago committed, is a sad reflection upon the goodness and justice of God.

In opposition to this, others think proper to affirm, that at the first creation of things, there was a covenant made with all mankind in Adam, their common head and proxy, who stipulated for them all; that by a transgression of this covenant, our first parents fell from their original righteousness, and thence became dead in sin, and actually defiled in all their faculties of soul and body; and that this corruption is not only the parent of all actual transgressions, but (even in its own nature) brings guilt upon every one that is born into the world, whereby he is bound over to the wrath of God, and the curse of the law, and so made subject to death, with all the miseries that attend it, spiritual, temporal, and eternal.

There is another opinion which concerns itself not with the imputation of the guilt, but only with the punishment of this transgression, and thereupon supposes, that though Adam, as to the composition of his body, was naturally mortal, yet, by the supernatural gift of God, (whereof the tree of life was a symbol or sacrament,) he was to be preserved immortal: from whence it is inferred, ³ That the denunciation of the sentence, 'In the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die,' is to be understood literally indeed, but then extended no farther than natural death; which, considering the fears, and terrors, and sundry kinds of misery which it occasions, may be reputed punishment severe enough, though fairly consistent with our notions of God's goodness and justice, because it is but a temporal punishment, and abundantly recompensed by that eternal redemption which all mankind shall have in Christ Jesus.

Others again do so far approve of this, as to think it in part the punishment of original sin; but then they suppose, that besides this natural mortality, there is a certain weakness and corruption spread through the whole race of mankind, which discovers itself in their inclination to evil, and insufficiency to what is good.

A. M. 1. A. C. 4004; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, 5411. GEN. CH. 3.

This, say they, ^a the very heathens complain of; this ^b the Scriptures every where testify; and therefore they conclude that since man was not originally made in this condition, (for God created him after his own image,) he must have contracted all this from his fall; and that therefore the threatening of death had an higher signification than the dissolution of the soul and body, namely, the loss of the divine favour, of all supernatural gifts and graces, and a total defection of the mind from God, which immediately ensued upon the transgression.

These are some of the principal opinions, (for the little singularities are innumerable,) and in the midst of so many intricacies, to find out a proper path for us to pursue, we may resolve the whole controversy into this one question:—“Whether human nature be so far corrupted, and the guilt of our first parents’ transgression so far imputed to their posterity, that every person, from the mother’s womb, must necessarily go astray, and must certainly fall into everlasting perdition, without the means appointed in the new covenant for his preservation?” And in searching into this, the sentiments of the fathers, much more the alterations of the schoolmen, will help us very little. ^c The former are so divided in their opinions, and the latter so abstruse in their arguments upon this subject, that an honest inquirer will find himself bewildered, rather than instructed: and therefore our safest recourse will be to the declarations of God’s will, explained in a manner comporting with his attributes.

That God, who is the fountain of our being, is infinitely pure and holy, and can therefore be neither the author nor promoter of any sin in us, is obvious to our first conceptions of him; and therefore, if the corruption of our nature be supposed to be such as necessarily and unavoidably determines us to wickedness, without the least tendency to good, to give it a counterpoise, those who maintain the negative of the question, are in the right so far as they stand in defence of God’s immaculate purity, and are known to be asserters of the freedom of human choice, without which the common distinctions of virtue and vice, and the certain prospects of rewards and punishments, are entirely lost. But when they carry the point so far as to deny any alteration in human nature now, from what it was at its first creation; as to deny, that Adam, in his state of uprightness, had any gifts and graces supernatural, any clearness in his understanding, any strength in his will, any regularity in his affections, more than every man of maturity and competent faculties has at this day; when they adventure to affirm, that there is no necessity of grace in our present condition, to assist our hereditary weakness, to enlighten our minds, and incline our wills, and conduct our affections to the purposes of holiness, but that every man may do what is good and acceptable to God by the power of his own natural abilities, they then run counter to the common experience of human infirmity; they overlook the declarations of God’s word concerning his gracious assistance: and seem to despise the kind overture of that blessed agent, whereby we are ‘renewed and sanctified in the spirit of our minds.’

In like manner, when the maintainers of absolute depravation contend, that man, in his present condition, is far departed from original righteousness, and, of his own accord, very much inclined to evil; that the order of his faculties is destroyed, and those graces which constituted the image of God, departed from him; that in this state he is now unable to raise himself from the level of common impotence, but requires the intervention of some superior principle to aid and assist him in his progress towards heaven; they say no more than what experience teaches us, and what the sacred records, which acquaint us with the dispensation of grace, are known to authorize. But when they carry their positions to a greater extent than they will justly bear; when they affirm, that ever since the first defection, the mind of man is not only much impaired, but grievously vitiated in all its faculties, having a strong aversion to every thing that is good, and an invincible propensity to what is evil; not one thought, word, or wish, that tends towards God, but the seeds and principles of every vice that bears the image and lineaments of the devil, inherent in it: when they advance such doctrines as these, I say, they debase human nature too low, and seem to impute such iniquity to its Maker as can hardly be wiped off, if every human soul be naturally inclined to all kind of wickedness when it comes from the hand of his creating power.

^a St Austin, in his fourth book against Julian, brings in Cicero, on Repub. b. 3., complaining “That nature, in bringing forth man to existence, had behaved like a stepmother, and not a mother, he possessing a body naked, weak, and soon subject to decay; with a mind, harassed by troubles, crushed by fears, and sinking under oppressions; in which, however, there exists a latent divine flame of intellect” Whereupon the holy father makes this remark, “That author saw the effect, but was ignorant of the cause, for he knew not there was a heavy yoke laid on the sons of Adam; he was not enlightened with the light of revelation, and consequently original transgression was to him a thing totally unknown.”

^b The Scriptures state the corruption of human nature in such terms as these, namely, that ‘by one man sin entered into the world’ by whose ‘disobedience many were made sinners,’ Rom. x. 19., that ‘by nature’ therefore ‘we are the children of wrath,’ Eph. ii. 3., and ‘unable to receive the things of the Spirit, or to know them because they are spiritually discerned,’ I Cor. ii. 14., for ‘what is born of flesh, is flesh,’ John iii. 6.; and ‘who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?’ Job xiv. 4. The royal Psalmist therefore makes, in his own person, this confession of our natural depravity; ‘Behold I was shapen in wickedness, and in sin did my mother conceive me,’ Ps. li. 5., and St Paul makes this public declaration of our inability to do good; ‘I know that in me (that is, in my flesh) dwelleth no good thing: for to will is present with me, but to perform that which is good, I find not; for though I delight in the law of God after the inward man, yet I see another law in my members, warring against the law in my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members. O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?’ Rom. vii. 18., &c.

^c Vossius, in his history of Pelagianism, assures us, that the whole Catholic church was always of opinion, that the guilt of Adam’s sin was imputed to his posterity to their condemnation; so that children dying therein were consigned to everlasting punishment, at least to an everlasting separation from God: and, to confirm this assertion, he quotes a multitude of passages out of almost all the doctors of the Greek church. Taylor and Whitby, and some other writers upon this argument, produce the testimony of the same fathers to evince the very contrary position; so that there is no depending upon any thing where authors are so inconsistent with themselves, and so repugnant to one another. The truth is, before Pelagius appeared in the world, most of the ancient writers of the church were very inaccurate, both in what they thought and wrote concerning original sin and free-will; and it seems as if the providence of God permitted that heretic to arise, that thereby he might engage the maintainers of orthodoxy to study those points more maturely.—Whitaker on Original Sin, b. 2.

A. M. I. A. C. 4004; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, 5411. GEN. CH. 3.

There is certainly therefore another way of accounting for these difficulties, without any prejudice to the divine attributes, and that is this:—Not by ascribing any positive malignity to human nature, but only the loss of the image of God; because a mere privation of rectitude, in an active subject, will sufficiently answer all the purposes for which a positive corruption is pleaded.¹ The soul of man, we know, is a busy creature: by the force of its own nature it must be in action; but then, without grace, and the image of God assisting and adorning it, it cannot act regularly and well. So that the difference between Adam and us, is not that we have violent inclinations to all manner of wickedness implanted in our nature, any more than he, in his innocence, had in his; but that we, in our present condition, want sundry advantages which he, in the height of his perfection, was not without. He had the free power of obedience; he had the perfect image of his Maker in all the divine qualities of knowledge and holiness, which we have not; and therefore, when we say, that he communicated to his posterity a corrupted nature, it must not be understood, as if that nature, which we receive, was infected with any vicious inclinations or habits, to sway and determine our mind to what is evil; but the meaning is, that he communicated to us a nature, which has indeed a power to incline, and act variously, but that he did not, withal, communicate to us the image of God, nor that fulness of knowledge and power of obedience, which were requisite to make all its actions and inclinations holy and regular: and our nature is therefore said to be corrupted, because it is comparatively bad; because it is reduced to its mere natural state, which at the best is a state of imperfection, and deprived of that grace which should have restrained it from sin, and of those other high endowments wherewith at first it was invested.

This is a fair account of our original corruption: it stands clear of the difficulties that attend the other opinions, and is not inconsistent with the notions we have of the divine attributes. For barely to withdraw those extraordinary gifts, which were not essential to man's nature, but such as God additionally had bestowed upon him; and he, by his transgression, unworthily forfeited, is what agrees very well with the wisdom and justice, and holiness of God to do; though to infuse a positive malignity, or such a strong inclination to wickedness in us, as induces a necessity of sinning, most certainly does not.

That 'the Judge of all the world cannot but do right,' and he, 'who keepeth mercy from generation to generation,' can have no hand in any cruel action, is a certain truth, and what our first reflections on the divine nature teach us. Those therefore who maintain, that Adam's sin is not imputed to us to our damnation, or that children unbaptized, are not the objects of divine vengeance, nor shall be condemned to hell, or an eternal expulsion from God's presence, for what was done many thousand years before they were born, are so far in the right, as they oppose an opinion which clouds the amiable attributes of God, and represents him in a dress of horror, and engaged in acts of extreme severity at least, if not unrelenting cruelty. Hell certainly is not so easy a pain, nor are the souls of children of so cheap and so contemptible a price, as that God should snatch them from their mother's womb, and throw them into perdition without any manner of concern; and therefore, when men argue against such positions as these, they are certainly to be commended, because therein they vindicate the sacred attributes of God: but when they carry their opposition to a greater length than it will justly go, so as to affirm—that there was no such thing as a covenant between God and Adam, or if there was, that Adam contracted for himself only; that his guilt consequently was personal, and cannot in justice, be imputed to us; that since we had no share in the transgression, there is no reason why we should bear any part in the punishment: that we are all born, in short, in the same state of innocence, and are under the same favour and acceptance with Almighty God, that Adam, before the first transgression, was: when they advance such positions as these, in maintenance of their opposition, they sadly forget, that while they would seem advocates for the mercy and goodness of God, they are taking away the foundation of the second covenant; destroying the necessity of a divine mediator; and overlooking those declarations in Scripture, which affirm, that² 'all the world is become guilty before God;' that 'all men, both Jews and Gentiles, are under sin; have come short of the glory of God,'³ and are by nature the children of wrath.⁴

To make an agreement then between the word of God, and his attributes in this particular, we may fairly allow, that there really was a covenant between God and Adam at the first creation; that in making that covenant, Adam, as their head and common representative, stipulated for all mankind, as well as for himself; and that, in his transgression of it, the guilt and the punishment due thereupon, were imputed to all his posterity. This we may allow was the state and condition wherein Adam left us; but then we must remember, that⁴ the whole scheme of man's salvation was laid in the divine counsel and decree from all eternity; that God, foreseeing man would fall, determined to send his Son to redeem him, and determined to do this long before the transgression happened: so that the wisdom and goodness of God had effectually provided beforehand against all the ill consequences of the fall, and made it impossible, that Adam's posterity should become eternally miserable, and be condemned to the flames and pains of hell, any other way than through their own personal guilt and transgressions. The redemption of the world was decreed, I say, from eternity, and was actually promised before any child of Adam was born, even before the sentence was pronounced upon our first parents; and as soon as it was pronounced, its benefits, without all controversy did commence. So that, upon this hypothesis, every infant that comes into the world, as it brings along with it the guilt of Adam's sin, brings along with it likewise the benefits of Christ's meritorious death, 'which God hath set forth, as a' standing 'propitiation for the sins of the whole world.' Nor can the want of baptism be any obstruction to this remedy, since the remedy was exhibited long before the rite was instituted; and since that rite, when instituted, (according to the sense of some learned fathers, was more a pledge of good things to come, a type of our future resurrection, a form of adoption into the heavenly family, and of admission to those 'rich promises of God, which are hid in Jesus Christ,' than any ordinance appointed for the 'mystical washing away of sin.'

In short, as long as St Paul's epistles are read, the original compact between God and man, the depravation of human nature, and the imputation of Adam's guilt, must be received as standing doctrines of the church of Christ: but then we are to take great care, in our manner of explaining them, to preserve the divine attributes sacred and inviolate: and this may happily be effected, if we will but suppose, that our hereditary corruption is occasioned, not by the infusion of any positive malignity into us, but by the subduction of supernatural gifts from us; that the covenant of grace commenced immediately after the covenant of works was broken, and has included all mankind ever since; that the blood of Christ shields his children from the wrath of God; and that the imputation of Adam's guilt, and obnoxiousness to punishment, is effectually taken away, by the meritorious oblation of that 'Lamb of God which was slain from the foundation of the world.'

SECT. IV.

CHAP. I.—Of the Murder of Abel, and the Banishment of Cain.

THE HISTORY.

OUR first parents, we may suppose, ^b after a course of penance and humiliation for their transgression, obtained

^a According to Chrysostom and Theodoret, infants are baptized in order that that sacred rite may be to them an ark of future benefits—a type of a coming resurrection—a communication of our Lord's suffering, and that being born again from on high and sanctified, they may be brought to the right of adoption, and become co-heirs of grace by their participation in these sacred mysteries.—Whitby on Original Sin.

^b The oriental writers are very full of Adam's sorrows and lamentations upon this occasion. They have recorded the several forms of prayer wherein he addressed God for pardon and forgiveness; and some of the Jewish doctors are of opinion, that the thirty-second psalm, wherein we meet with these expressions, 'I acknowledge my sin unto thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid; I said I will confess my transgression unto the Lord, and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin,' was of his composing.

Our excellent Milton, to the same purpose, introduces Adam, after a melancholy soliloquy with himself, and some hasty altercations with Eve, proposing at length this wholesome advice to her:

What better can we do, than to the place
Repairing where he judg'd us, prostrate fall
Before him reverent; and there confess Humbly our faults, and pardon beg; with tears
Wat'ring the ground, and with our sighs the air
Frequenting, sent from hearts contrite, in sign
Of sorrow unfeign'd, and humiliation meek?
Undoubtedly he will relent, and turn
From his displeasure: in whose looks serene,
When angry most he seem'd, and most severe,
What else but favour, grace, and mercy shone?

the pardon and forgiveness of God; and yet the corruption, which their sin introduced, remained upon human nature, and began to discover itself in that impious fact which Cain committed on his brother Abel. Cain was the first child that was ever born into the world; and his mother Eve was so fully persuaded, that the promised seed would immediately descend from her, that she supposed him to be the person who was to subdue the power of the great enemy of mankind; and therefore upon her delivery, she cried out, in a transport of joy, 'I have gotten a man from the Lord,' and accordingly gave him the name of Cain, which signifies possession or acquisition: never suspecting, that as soon as he grew up, he would occasion her no small sorrow and disconsolation.

The next son that she bore, (which was the year following,) ^d was called ^e Abel, denoting sorrow and mourning; but very probably he might not receive that name, until his tragical end, which caused great grief to his parents, verifying the meaning of it. Other children, we may presume, were all along born to our first parents; but these are the two, who, for some time, made the principal figure; and as they had the whole world before them, there was small reason (one would think) for those feuds and contentions, which, in after ages, embroiled mankind. But the misfortune was, they were persons of quite different tempers; and accordingly, when they grew up, betook themselves to different employments; Cain, who was of a surly, sordid, and avaricious temper, to the tilling of the ground; and Abel, who was more gentle and ingenuous in his disposition, to the keeping of sheep.

It was a customary thing, even in the infancy of the world, to make acknowledgments to God, by way of oblation, for the bountiful supply of all his creatures; and accordingly ^f these two brothers were wont to bring

^c Ish eth Jehovah, which our translation makes 'a man from the Lord,' should rather be rendered 'the man, the Lord,' Helvicus has shown, in so many instances in Scripture, that eth is an article of the accusative case, that it seems indeed to be the Hebrew idiom; besides, that it is a demonstrative, or emphatic participle, which points at some thing or person, in a particular manner; and therefore several, both Jewish and Christian doctors, have taken the words in this sense:—That our grandmother Eve, when delivered of Cain, thought she had brought forth the Messiah, the God-man, who was to 'bruise the serpent's head,' or destroy Satan's power and dominion according to the promise which God had made her.—Edward's Survey of Religion, vol. 1.

^e Others derive the name from a word which signifies vanity, and are of opinion, that Eve intended thereby, either to declare the little esteem she had of him, in comparison of her first born; or to show the vanity of her hopes, in taking Cain for the Messiah; or to denote, that all things in the world, into which he was now come, were mere 'vanity and vexation of spirit.'—Patrick's Commentary, and Scavin's Dissertation.

^f In the last verse of this chapter we read, that it was in the days of Enos, when 'men first began to call on the name of the Lord;' and yet, in the third and fourth verses thereof, we find that Cain and Abel brought their respective offerings to the place (as we may suppose) of divine worship. Now, if the beginning of divine worship was in the days of Enos, what worship was this in the days of Cain and Abel? To have two beginnings for the same worship, is a thing incongruous, unless we can suppose, that the two brothers, when they came with their oblations, did not worship at all; neither opening their lips in the divine benefactor's praise, nor invoking a blessing upon what his bounty had sent them, which is highly inconsistent offerings, suitable to their respective callings: Cain, as an husbandman, the fruits of the ground; and Abel, as a shepherd, the firstlings, or (as some will have it) the "milk of his flock. Upon some set and solemn occasion then ¹(and not improbably at the end of harvest,) as they were presenting their respective offerings, God, who estimates the sincerity of the heart more than the value of the oblation, ²gave a visible token of his acceptance of Abel's ³sacrifice, preferable to that of Cain, which so enraged, and transported him with envy against his brother, that he could not help showing it in his countenance.^d with the character of worshippers. But in answer to this, we must observe that the worship of God is of two kinds, public and private: that the worship wherein these brothers were concerned, was of the latter sort; for Cain is mentioned by himself, and Abel by himself. They came to the place of worship severally: their sacrifices were not the same: neither were the offerers of the same mind. But the worship which was instituted in the time of Enos, was of a public nature, when several families, under their respective heads, met together in the same place, and joined in one common service, whether of prayers, praises, or sacrifices. Though the phrase of 'men's beginning to call upon the name of the Lord,' may possibly bear another construction, as we shall show when we come to examine the place itself.—Street's Dividing of the Hoof.

It is a pretty common opinion, that the eating of flesh was not permitted before the flood; and it is the position of Grotius, that no carnal sacrifices were at that time, offered; because nothing, but what was of use to man, was to be consecrated to God. The scarcity of cattle might very well excuse their being slain in the worship of God; and therefore since the same word in Hebrew, Hhalab, or Hheleb, according to its different punctuation, signifies both fat and milk, and accordingly is rendered both ways by the Seventy, many learned men seem rather to favour the latter, as finding it a custom among the ancient Egyptians, to sacrifice milk to their deities, as a token and acknowledgment of the fecundity of their cattle.—Le Clerc's Commentary, and Saurin's Dissertation. But the learned Heidegger is of an opinion quite the contrary.—See Essay 15, on the Food of the Antediluvians.

^b The Jews are generally of opinion, that this visible token of God's accepting Abel's sacrifice, was a fire, or lightning, which came from heaven, and consumed it. The footsteps of this we meet with in a short time after, Gen. xv. 17., and the examples of it were many in future ages, namely, when Moses offered the first burnt-offering according to the law, Lev. ix. 24.; when Gideon offered upon the rock, Jud. vi. 21.; when David stayed the plague, 1 Chron. xxi. 26.; when Solomon consecrated the temple, 2 Chron. vii. 1.; and when Elijah contended with the Baalites, 1 Kings xviii. 38., &c. And accordingly, we find the Israelites, (when they wish all prosperity to their king,) praying, that God would be pleased 'to accept' (in the Hebrew, 'turn into ashes') 'his burnt sacrifice,' Ps. xx. 3.—Patrick and Le Clerc's Commentary.

^c Dr Hales is of opinion that these sacrifices were not offered till Cain and Abel were each about 100 years old. If so, they were offered, according to his computation, about the year of the world, 200 or 201; and 5210 or 5211 before Christ.—Ed.

^d Gen. iv. 4. 'Abel brought of the firstlings of his flock.' The universality of sacrificial rites will naturally produce an inquiry into the source, from which such a custom so inexplicable upon any principles of mere natural reason could have been derived. And here we are involuntarily led to the first institution of this ordinance, which is so particularly recorded in Scripture. When it pleased God to reveal his gracious purpose of redeeming lost mankind by the blood of the Messiah, it would doubtless be highly expedient to institute some visible sign, some external representation, by which the mysterious sacrifice of Mount Calvary might be prophetically exhibited to all the posterity of Adam. With this view, a pure and immaculate victim, the firstling of the flock, was carefully selected; and after its blood had been shed, was solemnly appointed to blaze upon the altar of Jehovah. When the first typical sacrifice was offered

God, however, in great kindness, condescended to expostulate the matter with him, telling him, ²"That his respect to true goodness was impartial, wherever he found it, and that ^etherefore it was purely his own fault, that his offering was not equally accepted, that piety was the proper disposition for a sacrificer; and that, if herein he would emulate his brother, the same tokens of divine approbation should attend his oblations; ³that it was folly and madness in him to harbour any revengeful thoughts against his brother; because, if he proceeded to put them in execution, ^fa dreadful punishment would

up, fire miraculously descended from heaven, and consumed it; and when this primitive ordinance was renewed under the Levitical priesthood, two circumstances are particularly worthy of observation—that the victim should be a firstling—and that the oblation should be made by the instrumentality of fire. It is remarkable that both these primitive customs have been faithfully preserved in the heathen world. The Canaanites caused their first born to pass through the fire, with a view of appeasing the anger of their false deities; and one of the kings of Moab is said to have offered up his eldest son as a burnt-offering, when in danger from the superior prowess of the Edomites, 2 Kings iii. 27. Nor was the belief, that the gods were rendered propitious by this particular mode of sacrifice, confined to the nations which were more immediately contiguous to the territories of Israel. We learn from Homer, that a whole hecatomb of firstling lambs was no uncommon offering among his countrymen. Iliad, iv. ver. 202. And the ancient Goths, having "laid it down as a principle, that the effusion of the blood of animals appeased the anger of the gods, and that their justice turned aside upon the victims those strokes which were destined for men," (Mallet's North. Antiq. vol. 1. chap. 7.) soon proceeded to greater lengths, and adopted the horrid practice of devoting human victims. In honour of the mystical number three, a number deemed particularly dear to heaven, every ninth month witnessed the groans and dying struggles of nine unfortunate victims. The fatal blow being struck, the lifeless bodies were consumed in the sacred fire, which was kept perpetually burning; while the blood, in singular conformity with the Levitical ordinances, was sprinkled partly upon the surrounding multitude, partly upon the trees of the hallowed grove, and partly upon the images of their idols. (Mallet's North. Antiq. vol. 1. chap. 7.) Even the remote inhabitants of America have retained similar customs, and for similar reasons.

^e The words in our translation are, 'If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted?' ver. 7. which some render, 'shalt thou not receive,' namely, a reward? others 'shalt thou not be pardoned?' and others again, 'thou shalt be elevated to dignity.' But if we consider, what God says to Cain in the two foregoing verses, 'that his countenance was fallen,' we cannot but perceive, that in this he promises him, that if he did well, he should have his face 'lifted up,' and that he should have no more reason to be sad; for so the Scripture frequently expresses a fearless and cheerful state: 'If iniquity be in thine hand,' says one of Job's friends, 'put it away from thee, and let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacles; for then thou shalt lift up thy face without spot,' Job xi. 15.—Essay for a New Translation.

^f The words in our translation are, 'Sin lieth at thy door;' where, by 'sin,' the generality of interpreters mean, the punishment of sin, which is hard at hand, and ready to overtake the wicked. But our learned Lightfoot observes that God does not here present himself to Cain, in order to threaten, but to encourage him, as the first words of his speech to him do import; and that therefore the bare description of 'lying at the door,' does plainly enough insinuate, that the text does not speak either of errors or punishment, but of a 'sacrifice for sin,' which the Scripture often calls by the Hebrew word here, and which was commonly placed before the door of the sanctuary, as may be seen in several passages of Scripture. So that, according to this sense, God is here comforting Cain, even though he did amiss in maligning his brother, and referring him to the propitiation of Christ, which, even then, was of standing force for the remission of sin.—Essay for a New Translation. But this sense of the word seems a little too far-fetched.

immediately overtake him; and that least of all he had reason to be angry with him whose preference was only a token of his superior virtue, and not intended to supplant him of his birthright, which ¹ should always be inviolate, and his brother be obliged to ^a pay him the respect and homage that was due to his primogeniture; which, if he was minded to preserve, his wisest way would be to be quiet, and not proceed one step farther in any wicked design.²

This was a kind admonition from God; but so little effect had it upon Cain, that instead of being sensible of his fault, and endeavouring to amend, he grew more and more incensed against his brother; insomuch that at last he took a resolution to kill him; but dissembled his design, until he should find a proper opportunity.

And, to this purpose, coming to his brother one day, and pretending great kindness to him, he asked him very friendly to take a walk with him in the fields, where, having got him alone, ^b upon some pretence or other, he picked a quarrel with him, and so fell upon him, and slew him, and afterward ² buried him in the ground; to prevent all discovery: but it was not long before he was called to an account for this horrid fact. God appeared to him, and having questioned him about his brother, and received some sullen and evasive answers from him,

^a The words in the text are 'unto thee shall be his desire,' Gen. iii. 16., which (however some expositors have clouded them) will appear to be plain and easy enough, if we do but consider, that there are two expressions, in the Hebrew tongue, to signify the readiness of one person to serve and respect another. The one is (aine el yad) or 'our eyes are to his hand;' the other (teshukah el) or 'our desire is to him.' The former expresses our outward attendance, and the latter the inward temper and readiness of our mind to pay respect. Of the former we have an instance in Ps. exxiii. 'The eyes of servants are to the hand of their masters, and the eyes of a maiden are to the hand of her mistress;' that is, they stand ready with a vigilant observance to execute their orders. We meet the other expression in the place before us, and it imports an inward temper and disposition of mind to pay respect and honour. 'His desire will be unto thee,' that is, he will be heartily devoted (as we say in English) to honour and respect you. And 'thou shalt (or mayest) rule over him,' that is, you may have any service from him you can desire.—Shuckford's Connexion, vol. 1.

^b According to the English translation, Moses tells us, ver. 8. that 'Cain talked with Abel his brother.' The words strictly signify, 'Cain said unto Abel his brother;' after which there is a blank space left in the Hebrew copies, as if something was wanting. The Samaritan Pentateuch and the Septuag. version supply this, by adding the words,—'Let us go into the fields;' but the Jerusalem Targum, and that of Jonathan, have supplied us with their whole conversation: "As they went along, I know, says Cain, that the world was created by the mercy of God, but it is not governed according to the fruit of our good works, and there is respect of persons in judgment. Why was thy oblation favourably accepted, when mine was rejected? Abel answered and said unto Cain, The world was created in mercy, and is governed according to the fruits of our good works. There is no respect of persons in judgment: for my oblation was more favourably received, because the fruit of my works was better, and more precious, than thine. Hereupon Cain in a fury breaks out, 'There is no judgment, nor judge, nor any other world; neither shall good men receive any reward, nor wicked men be punished. To which Abel replied, 'There is a judgment and a judge, and another world, in which good men shall receive a reward, and wicked men be punished.' Upon which there ensued a quarrel, which ended in Abel's death. So that, according to this account, Abel suff'ered for the vindication of the truth, and was, in reality, the first martyr.—Estivus on the more Difficult Passages.

directly charged him with his murder; and then representing it, in its proper aggravations, as a crime unpardonable, and what cried aloud to Heaven for vengeance, he proceeded immediately to pass sentence upon him.

Cain's chief ³ design and ambition was, to make himself great and powerful, in favour with God, and in credit with men, without any one to stand in competition with him; but in every thing he intended, he found himself disappointed, for attempting to accomplish his ends in so wicked a manner. Instead of growing great and opulent, the ground was sentenced 'not to yield him her strength,' that is, he was to be unprosperous in his husbandry and tillage: instead of enjoying God's favour without a rival, he was banished from his presence, and for ever excluded from that happy converse with the Deity, which, in these first ages of the world, it was customary for good men to enjoy: and instead of being a man of renown among his family, he became 'a fugitive and vagabond;' was banished from his native country, and compelled to withdraw into some distant and desolate part of the earth, as an abominable person, not worthy to live, nor fit to be endured in any civil community.

The same principle, which leads wicked men to the commission of crimes, in hopes of impunity, throws them into despair, upon the denunciation of punishment. This sentence of Cain, though infinitely short of the heinousness of his guilt, made him believe, ^c that he was to undergo much greater evils than it really imported; and that not only the miseries of banishment, but the danger likewise of being slain by every one that came near him, was ensuing upon it. But, to satisfy him in this respect, God was pleased to declare, that his providence should protect him from all outward violence: and, to remove the uneasy apprehension from his mind, vouchsafed to give him a sign (very ⁴ probably by some sensible miracle) that no creature whatever should be permitted to take away his life; but, that whoever attempted it should incur a very severe punishment; because God ⁵ was minded to prolong his days in this wretched estate, as a monument of his vengeance, to deter future ages from committing the like murder.

Thus, by the force of the divine sentence, Cain left his parents and relations, and went into a strange country. He was banished from that sacred place where

^c The words in our translation are, 'My punishment is greater than I can bear;' but as the Hebrew word (aven) signifies 'iniquity,' rather than punishment, and the verb (nasah) signifies 'to be forgiven,' as well as to 'bear,' it seems to agree better with the context, if the verse be rendered either positively, 'My iniquity is too great to be forgiven,' or (as the Hebrew expositors take it) by way of interrogation, 'Is my iniquity too great to be forgiven?' which seems to be the better of the two.—Shuckford's Connexion, vol. 1. A learned annotator has observed, that as there are seven abominations in the heart of him that loveth not his brother, Prov. xxvi. 25., there were the like number of transgressions in Cain's whole conduct; for, 1. he sacrificed without faith; 2. was displeased that God respected him not; 3. hearkened not to God's admonition; 4. spake dissemblingly to his brother; 5. killed him in the field; 6. denied that he knew where he was; and, 7. neither asked, nor hoped for mercy from God, but despaired and so fell into the condemnation of the devil.—Ainsworth's Annotations.

God vouchsafed ^a frequent manifestations of his glorious presence; and though by the divine decree no person was permitted to hurt him, yet, being conscious of his own guilt, he was fearful of every thing he saw or heard: till having wandered about a long while in many different countries, he settled at length with his wife and family in the land of Nod; where, in some tract of time, and after his descendants were sufficiently multiplied, he built a city, that they might live together, and be united, the better to defend themselves against incursions, and ^b to secure their unjust possessions; and this place he called after the name of his son Enoch, which, in the Hebrew tongue, signifies a dedication.

This Enoch begat Jarad; Jarad begat Mehujael; Mehujael begat Methusael; and Methusael begat Lamech, who was ^c the first introducer of polygamy. For he married two wives, Adah and Zillah, by the former of which he had two children; Jabal, ^d who made great

^a Both Lightfoot, Heidegger, and Le Clerc, seem to be of opinion, that what we render the 'presence of the Lord,' was the proper name of that particular place where Adam, after his expulsion from paradise, dwelt; and accordingly we find that part of the country which lies contiguous to the supposed situation of paradise, called by Strabo (b. 16. prosopora.) However this be, it is agreed by all interpreters, that there was 'a divine glory,' called by the Jews SENECHINAH, which appeared from the beginning, (as we said before, page 15, in the notes) and from which Cain being now banished, never enjoyed the sight of it again. If, after this, Cain turned a downright idolater, (as many think,) it is very probable that he introduced the worship of the sun (which was the most ancient idolatry) as the best resemblance he could find of the glory of the Lord which was wont to appear in a flaming light.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b The words of Josephus are these. "So far was Cain from mending his life after his afflictions, that he rather grew worse and worse, abandoning himself to his lusts, and all manner of outrage, without any regard to common justice. He enriched himself by rapine and violence, and made choice of the most profligate of monsters for his companions, instructing them in the very mystery of their own profession. He corrupted the simplicity and plain dealing of former times, with a novel invention of weights and measures, and exchanged the innocency of that primitive generosity and candour for the new tricks of policy and craft. He was the first who invaded the common rights of mankind by bounds and enclosures, and the first who built a city, fortified, and peopled it."—Antiq. b. 1. c. 3; and Le Clerc's Commentary.

^c Le Clerc, supposing that the increase of females at the beginning of the world was much greater than that of males, is of opinion that there might possibly want a man to espouse one of the women which Lamech married; nor can he think that Moses intended to blame him for what was the constant practice of some of the most eminent of the postdiluvian patriarchs. Bishop Patrick likewise makes this apology for him. "His earnest desire of seeing that blessed seed," says he, "which was promised to Eve, might perhaps induce him to take more wives than one, hoping, that by multiplying his posterity, some or other of them might prove so happy as to produce that seed. And this he might possibly persuade himself to be more likely, because the right which was in Cain, the first-born, he might now conclude, was revived in himself; and that the curse laid upon Cain was by this time expired, and his posterity restored to the right of fulfilling the promise." Both Selden and Grotius plead for the lawfulness of polygamy before the Levitical dispensation; but the learned Heidegger (who has a whole dissertation upon the subject) has sufficiently answered them, and proved at large, that this custom of multiplying wives is contrary both to the law of God and the law of nature.—History of the Patriarchs, Essay 7th.

^d The words in the text are,—'He was the father of such as dwell in tents;' for the Hebrews call him the father of any thing who was the first inventor of it, or a most excellent master of that art: and from the affinity of their names, as well as the similitude of their inventions, learned men have supposed, that improvements in the management of cattle, and found out the use of tents, ¹ or movable houses, to be carried about to places of fresh pasture; and Jubal, who was the first inventor of all musical instruments, and himself a great master and performer. By the latter he had Tubal-Cain, the first who discovered ² the art of forging and polishing metals, and thereupon devised the making all sorts of armour, both defensive and offensive; and whose sister Naamah (a name denoting fair and beautiful,) is supposed to have first found out the art of spinning and weaving.

³ This is the register of Cain's posterity for seven generations: and Moses, perhaps, might the rather enumerate them, to show who were the real authors and inventors of certain arts and handicrafts, ⁴ which the Egyptians too vainly assumed to themselves: but then he barely enumerates them, without ever remarking how long any of them lived, (a practice contrary to what he observes in the genealogy of the Sethites,) as if he esteemed them a generation so reprobate as ⁵ not to deserve a place in the book of the living.

The murder of Abel had, for a long time, occasioned a great animosity between the family of Seth and the descendants of Cain, who, though at some distance, lived in perpetual apprehensions that the other family might come upon them unawares, and revenge Abel's untimely death: but Lamech, when he came to be head of a people, endeavoured to reason them out of this fear. For ⁶ calling his family together, ^e he argued with them to Jabal was the Pales; and Jubal the Apollo; Tubal-Cain (which in the Arabic tongue, still signifies a 'plate of iron' or 'brass') the Vulcan, and his sister Naamah the Venus, or (as some will have it) the Minerva of the Gentiles.—Heidegger's History of the Patriarchs; and Stillingfleet's Origins, b. 3. c. 5.

^e This speech of Lamech, as it stands unconnected with any thing before it, is supposed by many to be a fragment of some old record which Moses was willing to preserve; and, because it seems to fall into a kind of metre, some have thought it a short sketch of Lamech's poetry, which he was desirous to add to his son's invention of music, and other arts. Many suppose, that Lamech, being plagued with the daily contentions of his two wives, here blusters and boasts of what he had done and what he would do, if they gave him any farther molestation. Others imagine, that as the use of weapons was found out by one of his sons, and now become common, his wives were fearful, lest somebody or other might make use of them to slay him; but that, in this regard, he desires them to be easy, because, as he was not guilty of slaying any body himself, there was no reason to fear any body would hurt him. The Targum of Onkelos, which reads the words interrogatively, favours this interpretation much? 'Have I slain a man to my wounding or a young man to my hurt?' that is, I have done no violence or offence to any one, either great or small, and have therefore no cause to be apprehensive of any to myself. But the Rabbins tell us a traditional story, which, if true, would explain the passage at once. The tradition is,—'That Lamech, when he was blind, took his son Tubal-Cain to hunt with him in the woods, where they happened on Cain, who being afraid of the society and converse of men, was wont to lie lurking up and down in the woods; that the lad mistook him for some beast stirring in the bushes, and directed his father, how, with a dart, or an arrow, he might kill him; and this (they say) was the man whom he killed by his wounding him; and that afterwards, when he came to perceive what he had done, he beat Tubal-Cain to death for misinforming him; and this was the young man whom he killed by hurting or beating him.' But besides the incongruity of a blind man's this purpose. "Why should we make our lives uneasy with these groundless suspicions? What have we done, that we should be afraid? We have not killed any man, nor offered any violence to our brethren of the other family; and surely reason must teach them, that they can have no right to hurt or invade us. Cain indeed, our ancestor, killed Abel; but God was pleased so far to forgive his sin, as to threaten to take the severest vengeance on any one that should kill him; and if so, surely they must expect a much greater punishment, who shall presume to kill any of us. For 'if Cain shall be avenged seven-fold, surely Lamech, or any of his innocent family, 'seventy-seven-fold.'" And it is not improbable, that by frequent discourses of this kind, as well as by his own example, he overcame the fears and shyness of the people, and (as we shall find hereafter) encouraged them to commence an acquaintance with their brethren, the children of Seth. This is the sum of what the Scripture teaches us of the deeds of Cain, and his wicked offspring, who were all swept away in the general deluge.

CHAP. II.—Difficulties obviated, and Objections answered.

THOUGH it cannot be denied but that Moses might principally design to give us a history of the Jewish nation; yet, in the beginning of his account, and till they came to be distinguished from other nations in the patriarch Abraham, he could not have that under his peculiar consideration. He acquaints us, we find, with the origination of the first of other animals, whence they arose, and in what manner they were perfected; and when he came to treat of the formation of human creatures, it is but reasonable to imagine, that he intended likewise to be understood of the first of their kind. Now, that Adam and Eve were the first of their kind, the words of our Saviour, 'from the beginning of the creation God made them male and female,' are a full confirmation; because he produces the very same precept that was applied to Adam and Eve at their creation, 'therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and cleave to his wife:' and that there could be none before them, the reason why 'Adam called his wife's name Eve, because she was the mother of all living,' i. e. the person who was to be the root and source of all mankind that were to be upon earth, is a plain demonstration: for if she was the mother of all living, there certainly was no race of men or women before her.

going a hunting, this story is directly contrary to the promise of God, which assured Cain, that no person should kill him, and seems indeed to be devised for no other purpose, but merely to solve the difficulty of the passage. Among the many interpretations which have been made of it, that which I have offered seems to be the most natural and easy, and is not a little countenanced by the authority of Josephus. "As for Lamech," says he, "who saw as far as any man into the course and methods of divine justice, he could not but find himself concerned in the prospect of that dreadful judgment which threatened his whole family, for the murder of Abel, and, under this apprehension, he breaks the matter to his two wives."—Antiquities, b. 1. c. 3.

St Paul, while he was at Athens, endeavoured to convince the people of the vanity of that idolatry into which he perceived them fallen, by this argument, among others,—that 'God had made of one blood all nations of men, for to dwell on all the face of the earth.' 'Some Greek copies read it ἐξ ἑνός, 'of one man,' leaving out ἀνθρώπος, wherein they are followed by the vulgar Latin: but allowing the common reading to be just, yet still the word αἷμα, or blood, must be taken in the sense wherein it occurs in the best Greek authors, namely, for the stock or root out of which mankind came; and so the apostle's reasoning will be—"That however men are now dispersed in their habitations, and differ much in language and customs from each other, yet they all were originally the same stock, and derived their succession from the first man that God created." Neither can it be conceived, on what account Adam is called in Scripture 'the first man,' and that 'he was made a living soul of the earth, earthly,' unless it were to denote, that he was absolutely the first of his kind, and so was to be the standard and measure of all that followed.

The design of Moses is not to give us a particular account of the whole race of mankind descended from Adam, but only of those persons who were most remarkable, and whose story was necessary to be known, for the understanding of the succession down to his time. Besides those that are particularly mentioned in Scripture, we are told in general, that 'Adam' begat sons and daughters; and if we will give credit to an ancient eastern tradition, he had in all thirty-three sons, and twenty-seven daughters, which, considering the primitive fecundity, would in a short time be sufficient to stock that part of the world at least where Adam dwelt, and produce a race of mechanics able enough to supply others with such instruments of husbandry as might then be requisite for the cultivation of the ground. For in the infancy of the world, the art of tillage was not come to such a perfection but that Cain might make use of wooden ploughs and spades, and instead of knives and hatchets, form his tools with sharp flints or shells, which were certainly the first instruments of cutting. And though in those early days there was no great danger of Abel's losing his cattle by theft; yet, to provide them with cool shades in hot climates, to remove them from place to place as their pasture decayed, to take care of their young, and guard them from the incursions of beasts of prey, (with many more incidental offices,) was then the shepherd's province, as well as now.

According to the computation of most chronologers, it was in the hundred and twenty-ninth year of Adam's age, that Abel was slain; for the Scripture says expressly, that Seth, (who was given in the lieu of Abel) was 'born in the hundred and thirtieth year, (very likely the year after the murder was committed,) to be a coun-

a Homer employs it in this acceptation:—

'Since mine thou art indeed, and of my blood.'

Thence those that are near relations are called by Sophocles, 'of the same blood,' and accordingly Virgil uses sanguis, or blood, in the same sense: 'sprung from Trojan blood.'—Stillingfleet's Sacred Origins, b. 3. c. 4.

fort to his disconsolate parents. So that Cain must have been an hundred and twenty-nine years old when he abdicated his own country; at which time there might be a sufficient quantity of mankind upon the face of the earth, to the number, it may be, of an hundred thousand souls. For if the children of Israel, from seventy persons, in the space of a hundred and ten years, became six hundred thousand fighting men, (though great numbers of them were dead during this increase,) we may very well suppose, that the children of Adam, whose lives were so very long, might amount at least to a hundred thousand in a hundred and thirty years, which are almost five generations.

Upon this supposition, it will be no hard matter to find Cain a wife in another country; "though it is much more probable that he was married before his banishment, because we may well think that all the world would abhor the thoughts of marriage with such an impious vagabond and murderer. Upon this supposition we may likewise find him men enough to build and inhabit a city; especially ¹ considering that the word Hir, which we render city, may denote no more than a certain number of cottages, with some little hedge or ditch about them: and this cluster of cottages (as was afterwards customary) he might call by his son's name rather than his own, which he was conscious was now become odious every where. Upon this supposition, lastly, we may account for Cain's fear, lest every one that lighted on him would kill him; for by this time mankind was greatly multiplied, and ² though no mention is made of Abel's marriage, (as, in so short a compendium, many things must necessarily be omitted,) yet he perhaps might have sons who were ready to pursue the fugitive, in order to revenge their father's death; or some of his own sisters, enraged against him for the loss of their brother, might possibly come upon him unawares, or when they found him asleep, and so dispatch him.

Various are the conjectures of learned men ^b concern-

a There is an original tradition, that Eve, at her two first births, brought twins, a son and a daughter: Cain, with his sister Azron, and Abel, with his sister Avin: that when they came to years of maturity, Adam proposed to Eve, that Cain should marry Abel's twin-sister, and Abel Cain's, because that was some small remove from the nearest degree of consanguinity, which even in those days, was not esteemed entirely lawful; that Cain refused to agree to this, insisting to have his own sister, who was the handsomer of the two; whereupon Adam ordered them both to make their offerings, before they took their wives, and so referred the dispute to the determination of God; that while they went up to the mountain for that purpose, the devil put it into Cain's head to murder his brother, for which wicked intent his sacrifice was not accepted; and that they were no sooner come down from the mountain, than he fell upon Abel, and killed him with a stone.—Patrick's Commentary; and Universal History, No. 2.

b Almost all the versions have committed a mistake in translating ver. 15, that 'God had put a mark upon Cain, lest any finding him should kill him.' The original says no such thing, and the LXX have very well rendered it thus: 'God set a sign before Cain, to persuade him, that whoever should find him should not kill him.' This is almost the same with what is said in Ex. x. 1., that 'God did signs before the Egyptians;' and Isa. lxvi. 19., that 'he would set a sign before the heathen;' where it is evident, that God did not mean any particular mark which should be set on their bodies, but only those signs and wonders which he wrought in Egypt, to oblige Pharaoh to let his people go; and the miraculous manner wherein he delivered them from ing the mark which God set upon Cain, to prevent his being killed. Some think that God stigmatized him on his forehead with a letter of his own name, or rather set such a brand upon him, as signified him to be accursed. Others fancy that God made him a peculiar garment, to distinguish him from the rest of mankind, who were clothed with skins. Some imagine, that his head continually shaked; others, that his face was blasted with lightning; others, that his body trembled all over: and others again, that the ground shook under him, and made every one fly from him: whereas the plain sense of the words is nothing more, than that God gave Cain a sign, or wrought a miracle before his face, thereby to convince him, that though he was banished into a strange land, yet no one should be permitted to hurt him; and to find out the land into which he was banished, is not so hard a matter as some may imagine.

The description which Moses gives us of it is this:—³ 'And Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the land of Nod, on the east side of Eden; and there he built a city, and called the name of it after the name of his son Enoch.' Hereupon ⁴ the learned Huetius observes, that Ptolemy, in his description of Susiana, places there a city called Anuchtha; and that the syllable tha, which ends the word, is, in the Chaldee language, a termination pretty common to nouns feminine, and consequently no part of the name itself: from whence he infers, that this Anuchtha, mentioned by Ptolemy, is the same with the city Enoch mentioned by Moses; especially since Ptolemy places it on the east side of Eden, which agrees very well with what Moses says of the land of Nod. ⁵ But though it be allowed, that Anuchtha and Enoch be the same name, yet it will not therefore follow, that there was no other city so called but that which was built by Cain. It is certain, that there was another Enoch, the son of Jared, and father of Methuselah, a person of remarkable piety, in the antediluvian age; and why might not the city, mentioned by Ptolemy, be called after him, in respect to his illustrious character, and miraculous exemption from death? or rather, why might it not take its name from some other Enoch, different from both the former, and living some generations after the flood? For it is scarce imaginable, how the city of Enoch, built before the flood, should either stand or retain its ancient name, after so violent a concussion, and total alteration of the face of nature.

Nor should it be forgot, that the province of Susiana, where Huetius places the land of Nod, is one of the most fruitful and pleasant countries in the world; whereas, considering that Cain's banishment was intended by God to be part of his punishment, it seems more reasonable to think, that he should, upon this account, be sent into some barren and desolate country, remote from the place of his nativity, and separated by mountains, and other the Babylonish captivity. This exposition is natural, and agreeable to the methods of divine providence, which is wont to convince the incredulous by signs and wonders; nor could any thing else assure Cain, in the fear he was under, that the first who met him should not kill him, after what God had said to him in the exprobation of his crime.—Patrick's Commentary, and Saurin's Dissertation.

natural obstructions, from the commerce of his relations. For which reason the learned Grotius is clearly of opinion, that the country into which Cain was sentenced to withdraw, was Arabia Deserta: to the barrenness of which, the curse that God pronounces against him, seems not improperly to belong. ¹ 'And now thou art cursed from the earth, and when thou tillest the ground, it shall not, henceforth, yield unto thee her strength.' But after all, their opinion is not to be found fault with, who suppose, that the word Nod, which signifies an exile, or fugitive, is not a proper, but only an appellative name; and that therefore, wherever the country was where Cain took up his abode, that, in after ages, was called the land of Nod, or the land of the banished man.

Thus the account, which Moses gives us of the murder of Abel, stands clear of the imputation of all absurdity or contradiction, wherewith the lovers of infidelity would gladly charge it. The time when his brother murdered him, was in the 129th year of the world's creation, when, ² according to a moderate computation, their and their parent's descendants could not but be very numerous. The manner in which he murdered him might not be with a sword or spear (which perhaps then were not in use,) ³ since a club, or stone, or any rural instrument, in the hand of rage and revenge, was sufficient to do the work. The place where he murdered him, is said to be in the field, ⁴ not in contradistinction to any large and populous city then in being, but rather to the tents, or cottages, where their parents and offspring might then live. The cause of his murdering him, was ⁵ a spirit of emulation, which, not duly managed, and made a spur to virtue, took an unhappy turn, and degenerated into malice: and the true reason of all (as the apostle has stated it) was, that ⁶ Cain was of that wicked one, and slew his brother, because his own works were wicked, and his brother's righteous.'

^a Though we should suppose that Adam and Eve had no other children than Cain and Abel in the year of the world 128, which (as the best chronologers agree) was the time of Abel's murder; yet, as it must be allowed, that they had daughters married with these two sons, we require no more, than the descendants of these two children, to make a considerable number of men upon the earth in the said year 128. For, supposing them to have been married in the 19th year of the world, they might easily have had each of them eight children, some males, some females, in the 25th year. In the 50th year there might proceed from them, in a direct line, 64 persons; in the 74th year, there would be 572; in the 98th, 4096; and in the 122d year, 421,164 men, capable of generation, without ever reckoning the women, both old and young, or such children as are under the age of 17 years.—See Chronological and Geographical Dissertation on the Bible History, in the Journal of Paris, January, 1712, vol. li. p. 6.

^b There is an oriental tradition, that when Cain was confirmed in the design of destroying his brother, and knew not how to go about it, the devil appeared to him in the shape of a man, holding a bird in his hand; and that, placing the bird upon a rock, he took up a stone, and with it squeezed its head in pieces. Cain, instructed by this example, resolved to serve his brother in the same way; and therefore, waiting till Abel was asleep, he lifted up a large stone, and let it fall, with all its weight, upon his head, and so killed him: whereupon God caused him to hear a voice from heaven, to this purpose, 'The rest of thy days shalt

CHAP. III.—Of the Institution of Sacrifices.

THE first plain account that we meet with of sacrifices, is here in the examples of Cain and Abel. Mention is made indeed of the skins of some beasts, wherewith God directed our first parents to be clothed; but expositors are not agreed, whether what we render skins might not denote some other sort of covering, or shelter from the weather; or, if they were the real skins of beasts, whether these beasts were offered unto God in sacrifice or no; whereas, in the Scripture before us, we have oblations of both kinds, bloody and unbloody sacrifices, (as they are commonly distinguished;) the fruits of the field, offered by Cain, and the firstlings of the flock, by Abel. So that from hence we may very properly take an occasion, to inquire a little into the original of sacrifices; for what ends and purposes they were at first appointed; and by what means they became an acceptable service unto God.

The Scriptures indeed make no mention of the first institution of sacrifices; and from their silence, in this respect, some have imagined that they proceeded originally from a dictate of nature, or a grateful inclination to return unto God some of his own blessings. But in so short an account of so large a compass of time, (as we have said before,) it may well be expected, that several things should be omitted. To this purpose, therefore, others have observed, that Moses says nothing of ⁵ Enoch's prophecy; nothing ⁶ of Noah's preaching; nothing ⁷ of the peopling of the world; though these be referred to in other parts of Scripture: ⁸ nor does he here introduce the sacrifices of Cain and Abel, with an intent to inform us of the origin of that rite, but merely to let us know what was the unhappy occasion of the first murder that ever was committed in the world.

The ⁹ Jews indeed, to whom he primarily wrote, knew very well, that their own sacrifices were of divine institution, and that God had manifested his acceptance of them, at the very first solemn oblation after that institution, by a miraculous fire from the divine presence; nor had they any reason to doubt, but that they were so instituted, and so accepted from the beginning: and therefore there was less reason for Moses to expatiate upon a matter, which had doubtless descended to them in a clear and uninterrupted tradition.

A grateful sense of God's blessings will, at any time, engage us to offer him the calves of our lips, (as the Scripture terms them,) or the warmest expressions of our praise and thanksgiving; but what dictate of nature, or deduction of reason, could ever have taught us, that, to destroy the best of our fruits, or the best of our cattle, would have been a service acceptable to God? Goodness, and mercy, and lenity, and compassion, are the ideas we have of that infinite being; and who would then have thought, that putting an innocent and inoffensive creature to torture, spilling its blood upon the earth, and burning its flesh upon an altar, would have been either a grateful sight, or 'an offering of a sweet smelling savour' to the Most High?

No¹ being, we know, can have a right to the lives of other creatures, but their Creator only, and those on whom he shall think proper to confer it: but it is evident, that God, at this time, had not given man a right to the creatures, even for necessary food, much less for unnecessary cruelty; and therefore to have taken away their lives, without God's positive injunction, would have been an abominable act, and enough to desecrate all their oblations. When therefore we read, that his acceptance of sacrifices of old was usually testified by way of inflammation, or setting them on fire, by a ray of light which issued from his glorious presence, we must allow, that this was a proof of his previous institution of them; otherwise we cannot possibly think, why he should so far concern himself about them, as even to be at the expense of a miracle, to denote his approbation of them. ² 'Who hath known the mind of the Lord,' is the Apostle's way of arguing, 'or who hath been his counsellor?' And, in like manner, without a divine revelation, it would have been the height of vanity and presumption, to have pretended to determine the way of reconciliation with him, and (without his order and appointment) to have entered upon a form of worship, entirely new and strange, by killing of beasts, and burning their fat. ³ 'No man,' says another Apostle, 'taketh this honour to himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron;' nor can any one lay hold on the promise of forgiveness of sins (which is the great design of all sacrificing) any other way than by symbols of God's own institution.

In ⁴ most nations indeed, the custom of sacrificing did prevail: but that it did not arise from any principle of nature or reason, is manifest from hence—⁵ that the gravest and wisest of the heathen philosophers always ^a condemned bloody sacrifices as impious, and unacceptable to their gods; but this they would not have done, had they looked upon them as any branch of natural religion, which none were more warm in extolling than they. It is no improbable conjecture, therefore, that other nations might take the rite of sacrificing from the Jews, to ⁶ which the devil, in heathen countries, might instigate his votaries, purely to ape God, and imitate his ordinances: or if this commencement of sacrificing among them is thought to be too late, why may not we suppose, that they received it by tradition from their forefathers, who had it originally from Adam, as he had it from God by a particular revelation? Now that there was some warrant and precept of God for it, seems to be intimated by the author to the Hebrews, when he tells us, that ⁷ 'by faith Abel offered unto God a more acceptable sacrifice, than Cain:' ⁸ if 'faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God, faith is founded on some word, and relieth on divine command or promise; and therefore, when Abel offered the best of his flock in sacrifice, he did what was enjoined him by God, and his practice was founded upon a divine command, which was given to Adam, and his sons, though Moses, in his short account of things, makes no mention of it.

In fine, if it appears from history, that sacrifices have been used all over the world, have spread as far, as universally among men, as the very notions of a Deity; if we find them almost as early in the world as mankind upon the earth, and, at the same time, cannot perceive that mankind ever could, by the light of reason, invent such notions of a Deity, as might induce them to think, that this way of worship would be an acceptable service to him; if mankind indeed could have no right to the lives of the brute creation, without the concession of God; and yet it is evident, that they exercised such right, and God approved of their proceeding, by visible indications of his accepting the sacrifices; then must we necessarily suppose, that sacrifices were of his own institution at first; and that they were instituted for purposes well becoming his infinite wisdom and goodness.

For we must remember, that Adam and Eve were, at this time, become sinners, and though received into mercy, in constant danger of relapsing; that, by their transgression, they had forfeited their lives, but as yet could have no adequate sense, either of the nature of the punishment, or the heinousness of the sin which procured it; and that now they were to beget children, who were sure to inherit their parents' corruption and infirmity. Since man, therefore, had forfeited his life by his transgressions, and God, notwithstanding, decreed to receive him into mercy, nothing certainly could better become the divine wisdom and goodness, than the establishment of some institution, which might at once be a monition both of the mercy of God, and the punishment due to sin. And because God foresaw that man would often sin, and should often receive mercy, it was necessary, that the institution should be such as might frequently be repeated; and in such repetition, frequently remind man of his own endless demerit, and of God's infinite goodness to him; to which purpose the institution of sacrifices for sin was of excellent use and service.

Both from the commandment which at first was given to Adam, and the sentence which was afterwards denounced against him, we learn, that death was the penalty of his disobedience; and since it was so, certainly it was highly proper, that he should know what he was to suffer; and consequently that he should see death in all its horror and deformity, in order to judge rightly of the evil of disobedience. And what could exhibit this evil

^a It is the opinion of Tertullian, Apol. c. 46. that none of the ancient philosophers ever compelled the people to sacrifice living creatures. Theophrastus is quoted by Porphyry in Eusebius' Evangelical Preparation, b. 1. c. 9. as asserting that the first men offered handfuls of grass: that, in time, they come to sacrifice the fruits of the trees: and, in after ages, to kill and offer cattle upon altars. Many other authors are cited for this opinion. Pausanias on Phrygian Crops, seems to intimate, that the ancient sacrifice was only fruits of trees (of the vine especially,) and of honeycombs and wool. Empedocles on the most Ancient Times, affirms, that the first altars were not stained with the blood of creatures; and Plat on Laws, b. 6. was of opinion, that living creatures were not anciently offered in sacrifice, but cakes of bread, and fruits, and honey, poured upon them; for 'The heavenly deities delight not in the sacrifice of an ox,' was an old position of more writers than Ovid.—See Shuckford's Connection, vol. 1. b. 2 more strongly, than the groans and struggles of innocent creatures, bleeding to death for his guilt, before his eyes, and by his own hands? Sights of this kind are shocking to human nature even yet, though custom hath long made them familiar: with what horror then, may we imagine that they pierced the hearts of our first parents, and how was that horror aggravated, when they considered themselves as the guilty authors of so much cruelty to the creatures which were about them? Nay, when the groans of these dying animals were over, what a sad, a ghastly spectacle must their cold carcasses yield? and even after their oblation, how dismal a meditation must it be, to consider the beauty and excellency of these animate beings reduced to an handful of dust; especially, when they could not see them in that condition, but under sad conviction, that they themselves must follow the same odious steps to destruction?

We can hardly conceive, how God could strike the human soul with a deeper sense of misery from guilt, or with more abhorrence of the sad cause of that misery, than by this method of appointing sacrifices: nor can we imagine how our first parents could have ever sustained themselves under such afflicting thoughts, had not God, in his infinite goodness, caused some ray of hope to shine through this scene of mortality and misery, and made sacrifices (at the same time that they were such lively emblems of the horror of guilt) the means of its expiation, and the seals of his covenant of grace.

That God entered into a covenant of mercy with man, immediately after the fall, is evident from the sentence passed upon the serpent, wherein that covenant is comprised: and therefore, as we find that, in after ages, his usual way of ratifying covenants of this kind was by sacrifices; so we cannot imagine that he failed to do so at this time, when such mercy was more wanted than ever it was since the foundation of the world. Sacrifices indeed have no natural aptitude to expiate guilt, in which sense, the apostle affirms it ² 'to be impossible for the blood of bulls, and of goats, to take away sins.' The death of a beast is far from being equivalent to the death of a man, but infinitely short of that eternal death to which the man's sinfulness does consign him: but still, as sacrifices are federal rites, and one of those external means which God had instituted, under the antediluvian dispensation, for man's recovery from sin, we cannot but suppose, but that, when piously and devoutly offered, they were accepted by him, for the expiation of transgressions; though it must be owned, that they did not, of themselves, or by their own worthiness, atone for any thing, but only in virtue of the expiatory sacrifice of the Messiah to come, whereof they were no more than types and shadows. To speak strictly and properly, therefore, these sacrifices did not really and formally, but typically and mystically expiate, that is, they did not pacify God's anger, and satisfy his justice, and take away sin, by their own force and efficacy, but as they were figures and representations of that universal sacrifice, which (in the divine intention) 'was slain from the foundation of the world,' and, 'in the fulness of time,' was to come down from heaven, in order to fulfil the great undertaking of 'making atonement for the sins of all mankind.'

Thus to represent the horrid nature of sin, and to seal the eternal covenant of mercy; to be types of the great expiatory sacrifice of Christ's death, and a standing means of obtaining pardon and reconciliation with God, seem to be some of the principal ends of God's instituting sacrifices at first: and what was of use to gain them a favourable acceptance in his sight, we may, in some measure, learn from the reasons, that are usually alleged, for his rejection of Cain's, and approbation of Abel's sacrifice.

Most of the Jewish interpreters have placed the different events of these two sacrifices in the external quantity or quality of them. They tell us, that 'Cain brought of the fruits of the ground' indeed, but not of the first-fruits (as he should have done,) nor the fullest ears of corn, (which he kept for himself,) but the lankest and latest; and, even what he brought, 'twas with a niggardly hand and grudging mind; so that he raised God's aversion ³ 'by offering to him of that which cost him nothing: whereas Abel found a kind acceptance, because ⁴ 'he honoured the Lord with his substance: he brought of the 'firstlings of his flock,' and the very best and fattest of them, as thinking nothing too good to be offered in devotion and gratitude to him from whom he received all.

⁵ Allowing the maxim of the Jewish church, namely, 'that without blood there is no remission,' to have been good, from the first institution of sacrifice, a very learned writer supposes, that Abel came, as a petitioner for grace and pardon, and brought the atonement appointed for sin; but Cain appeared before God as a just person, wanting no repentance, and brought an offering in acknowledgment of God's goodness and bounty, but no atonement in acknowledgment of his own wretchedness; and that upon this account his oblation was rejected, as God's expostulation with him seems to imply: 'If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? And if thou doest not well, sin lieth at thy door,' that is, if thou art righteous, thy righteousness shall save thee; but if thou art not, by what expiation is thy sin purged? it lieth still at thy door.

The author to the ⁶ Hebrews has given us, I think, a key to this difficulty, when he tells us, that 'by faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain.' ⁷ The faith (of which the apostle gives us several instances in this chapter) is the belief of something declared, and, in consequence of such belief, the performance of some action enjoined by God: 'By faith Noah, being warned by God, prepared an ark,' that is, he believed the warning which God gave him and obediently made the ark which he had appointed him, to make: 'By faith Abraham, when called' to go into a strange land, 'which God promised to give him for an inheritance, obeyed,' that is, he believed that God would give him what he had promised, and, in consequence of such belief, did what God commanded him: and thus it was, that 'Abel, by faith, offered a better sacrifice than Cain,' because he believed what God had promised, that 'the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head,' and, in consequence of such belief, offered such a sacrifice for his sins, as God had appointed to be offered, until the seed should come.

¹ In order to offer a sacrifice by faith then, there are three things requisite. 1st, That the person who offers should do it upon the previous appointment and direction of God. 2dly, That he should consider it as a sign and token of the promise of God made in Christ, and of remission of sins through his blood; and 3dly, That, while he is offering, he should be mindful withal (in the phrase of St Paul) 'to present himself a living sacrifice, holy, and acceptable unto God.' In the first of these qualifications Cain was right enough, because he had learned from his father, that, as God had appointed sacrifices, it was his duty to offer them: but herein was his great defect, that while he was offering, he gave no attention to what he was about; nor once reflected on the promise of God, made in paradise, nor placed any confidence in the merits of a Saviour, to recommend his services; but, vainly imagining that his bare oblation was all that was required to his justification, he took no care to preserve his soul pure and unpolluted, or to constitute his members as 'instruments of righteousness unto God.' In short, his oblation was the service of an hypocrite, lying unto God, and using the external symbols of grace 'for a cloak of maliciousness;' whereas Abel's sacrifice was attended with awful meditations on that 'seed of the woman' which was to become the world's Redeemer, with warm applications to him for mercy and forgiveness, and with holy resolutions of better obedience, of abandoning all sin, 'and always abounding in the work of the Lord;' and therefore there is no wonder, that their services met with so different a reception. For, however sacrificing was an external rite, yet the rite itself would by no means do, unless the attention of the mind, and the integrity of the heart went along with it, ² 'he that killed an ox was as if he slew a man; and he that sacrificed a lamb as if he cut off a dog's neck;' so detestable in the sight of God was a the richest oblation, when the sacrificer was not a good man; nay, so ready was he to pass by all observances of this kind, if the worshipper came but, in other respects, qualified: ³ 'For he that keepeth the law bringeth offerings enough; he that taketh heed to the law offereth a peace-offering; he that requiteth a good turn offereth fine flour; and he that giveth alms sacrificeth praise. To depart from wickedness is a thing pleasing to the Lord; and to forsake unrighteousness is a propitiation.'

CHAP. IV.

On the Design of Sacrifice:—On the Sacrifices of the Patriarchal Dispensation.

(SUPPLEMENTAL BY THE EDITOR.)

SCRIPTURE assures us that Christ was 'the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world.' But what meaning are we to attach to these expressions, unless we understand them as referring to the significant and emblematical rite of sacrifice, instituted to prefigure the death incurred by sin, and the atonement by which its guilt was to be expiated? It is admitted that this atonement had a retrospective efficacy; that through it God declared his righteousness for the remission of sins that were past; and have we not, therefore, the best grounds for regarding the institution of sacrifice as having been intended from the beginning impressively to show forth the death of the Redeemer? He is described as 'the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world,' because he really fulfilled that which the sacrifice of lambs and of other animals prefigured.

In the first promise there is allusion to the sufferings of the Mighty Deliverer. In order that the great truths comprehended in this promise might be more clearly understood and deeply felt, we have every reason to believe that sacrifice was immediately and divinely instituted as an explanatory ordinance. Though the words of the institution are not recorded, the fact cannot be questioned; because sacrifice constituted a part of the worship of God from the fall of man; and we must feel assured that it could not be acceptably used in his worship but in consequence of divine appointment. We know that the inferior animals were not used as food, at least with the divine permission, till after the flood; and, consequently, there could be no occasion for slaying them, unless it were for sacrifice, till after that period. Our first parents having been clothed at the expense of life, and by the special interposition of God, had a striking representation given them of the mode in which forfeited happiness should be restored, and of that perfect righteousness by which they were justified before God. It was an intimation to them that the Deliverer, denominated the Seed of the woman, should redeem them by his sufferings.

Thus have we presented to our view immediately after the fall, and before the first transgressors were expelled from paradise, the two principal methods in which God unfolded to mankind the way of salvation, namely, prophecy and typical sacrifice. Both these methods of divine revelation were continued in the church with increasing clearness and precision till the coming of Christ; and both were intended to direct the faith of the people to the Substitute and Surety of sinners, who by the one offering up of himself was to obtain eternal redemption. In the first promise we have the foundation of that series of prophecies which was delivered from age to age, which announced the divine nature, the incarnation, the sufferings, death, and subsequent glories of the Redeemer. In the first sacrifice we have the basis of that series of typical observances, which prefigured the mediation and atonement of the Son of God.

A. M. 128. A. C. 3876; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 200. A. C. 5211. GEN. CH. 4. TO VER. 25.

Prophecy was the annunciation of what was future, expressed not by words but by signs. These signs were indefinitely varied; and, accordingly, the rites appointed to be observed in the worship of God, and the vicissitudes of the church in its trials and triumphs, recorded in the Old Testament, were emblematical. They served unto the example and shadow of good things to come. But the most prominent of these emblems was sacrifice, which by its direct reference to the atonement of Christ, aided the faith and hope of believers, and which by its universal use, even when its original design was forgotten, may have prepared mankind for that message of salvation which, in the fulness of time, was sent to them through a crucified Redeemer.

These views are confirmed by the circumstances recorded in Scripture regarding the sacrifice of Abel. By faith we are told that Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts. Cain brought of the fruit of the ground an offering unto the Lord: and Abel, he brought of the firstlings of his flock. If we bear in mind the observations already made, we shall readily perceive the ground on which the sacrifice of Abel was accepted, while that of Cain was rejected. Abel offered his sacrifice in faith, in strict accordance with the command of God, and in firm reliance on his promise: he acknowledged by the death inflicted on an innocent animal his own desert as a sinner, and his trust in the way of redemption and recovery which God had mercifully provided: he thus as a true penitent approached God in worship, looking for pardon and reconciliation, renewing and sanctifying grace, through an atonement. But Cain, viewing God merely as his Creator and Preserver, offered the fruits of the earth as an acknowledgment of his goodness, entirely overlooking his own character as a sinner, and disregarding the divinely instituted sacrificial rite, the appointed emblem of the new and living way of access to God. "In short, Cain, the first-born of the fall, exhibits the first-fruits of his parents' disobedience, in the arrogance and self-sufficiency of reason, rejecting the aids of revelation, because they fell not within its apprehension of right. He takes the first place in the annals of deism, and displays, in his proud rejection of the ordinance of sacrifice, the same spirit, which, in later days, has actuated his enlightened followers, in rejecting the sacrifice of Christ."

The terms in which God expostulates with Cain convey a rebuke for his not offering an animal sacrifice like his brother Abel: "If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doest not well, a sin-offering lieth even at the door." There is here a reference to sin-offering as a known institution, the neglect of which in Cain incurred the divine displeasure, and the observance of animal sacrifice is anew enforced. The sacrifice which Abel presented unto God was of this description. The reason of its acceptance, according to the apostle Paul, was the faith in which it was offered; faith in the Redeemer promised under the appellation of the seed of the woman. "Of this faith, the offering of an animal in sacrifice, appears to have been the legitimate, and consequently the instituted, expression. The institution of animal sacrifice, then, was coeval with the fall, and had a reference to the sacrifice of our redemption.

But, as it had also an immediate, and most apposite, application to that important event in the condition of man, which, as being the occasion of, was essentially connected with, the work of redemption; that likewise, we have reason to think, was included in its signification. And thus, upon the whole, sacrifice appears to have been ordained, as a standing memorial of the death introduced by sin, and of that death which was to be suffered by the Redeemer."

First, then, it is evident, that the offering of Abel was different in its nature from that which was presented by Cain; and that this difference constituted the principal ground for the acceptance of the one, and the rejection of the other. It was a more full, a more ample sacrifice, that is, it partook more essentially of the nature of sacrifice, than the offering of Cain. It was 'of the firstlings of his flock,' an animal slain in solemn sacrifice unto God, in obedience to a known divine command, whereas Cain offered merely of the fruit of the ground, as an expression of thankfulness to the bounty of God. Hence,

Secondly, Abel is said to have offered his more excellent sacrifice by faith. On this circumstance there is much stress laid by the apostle, as he adduces it in the eleventh chapter of the Hebrews, as an example illustrative of the power and efficacy of faith. But what was the object of this faith? Unquestionably a divine revelation, the promise of the Messiah, to which such frequent allusion is made in Scripture, and in firm reliance on which the patriarchs lived and died. 'These all,' Abel and all the others whom the apostle had named, 'not having received the fulfilment of the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth.' This could not be the promise of entering the land of Canaan, because to Abel, Enoch, and Noah, no such promise was given, and because that even in regard to Abraham, the evangelist (John viii. 56.) explains the expression of his seeing the promises afar off, and embracing them, as signifying his seeing the day of Christ and rejoicing. To the completion of the great promise of the coming of the Seed of the woman, to accomplish the redemption of mankind, Abel looked with firm reliance on the truth of God. In the faith of this promise he offered unto God the kind of sacrifice which had been enjoined as the evidence of dependence on divine mercy, and as the typical expression of that atonement which was to be made in the fulness of time. And, therefore,

In the third place, he obtained the testimony of God to the acceptableness of his sacrifice, and to his own personal justification before God. 'By which he obtained witness that he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts: and by it, he being dead, yet speaketh.' He thus became heir of the righteousness of God which is by faith, 'even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all, and upon all them that believe.' It was declared by God himself, that he was righteous before him, by his visibly attesting the excellency and acceptableness of his oblation.

We thus discover the reason for the difference in the divine reception of the sacrifices of Cain and Abel. This cannot be accounted for by those who deny the divine origin of sacrifice. Abel's sacrifice, as our author remarks, was more excellent than his brother's, because it was offered with faith in the great atonement, which he believed was in due time to take away the sin of the world; and because it consisted of what had been divinely instituted to prefigure the atonement in which he appears to have reposed all his trust.

CHAP. I.—Of the General Corruption of Mankind.

THE HISTORY.

GREAT a WAS the grief, no doubt, which our first parents felt upon the loss of the righteous Abel, and the expulsion of their wicked son Cain; but, to alleviate, in some measure, this heavy load of sorrow, God was pleased to promise them another son, whose fate should be different, and himself a lasting comfort and consolation to them: and therefore, as soon as Eve was delivered of the child, she called his name Seth, which signifies substitute, because God had been so good as to send him in the room of his brother Abel, whom Cain slew. Adam, when he had Seth, was 130 years old: he lived after that 800 years, and begat several other children (though Moses makes no mention of them.) So that the b whole of his life was 930 years.

A. M. 235, or 435. Seth, when he was 105 years old, had a son named Enos: after which time he lived 507 years; so that the whole of his life was 912.

A. M. 325, or 625. Enos, when 90, had a son named Cainan: after which he lived 815 years; in the whole 905.

A. M. 365, or 795. Cainan, when 70, had a son named Mahalaleel: after which he lived 840 years; in all 910.

A. M. 460, or 960. Mahalaleel, when 65, had a son named Jared: after which he lived 830 years; in all 895.

a The Jewish, and some Christian doctors, say, that Adam and Eve mourned for Abel one hundred years, during which time they lived separate, Adam particularly, in a valley near Hebron thence named the valley of tears. And the inhabitants of Ceylon pretend, that the salt lake on the mountain of Columbo, was formed by the tears which Eve shed on this occasion. All fiction.—Calnet's Dictionary.

b If it be asked, how it came to pass, that Adam, who was immediately created by God, and, consequently, more perfect than any of his kind, did not outlive Methuselah, who was the eighth from him? the answer which some have given, namely, that his grief and affliction of mind for the loss of paradise, and the misery which, by his transgression, he had entailed upon his offspring, might affect his constitution, and by degrees, impair his strength, is not much amiss: but there is another reason which seems to me better founded, namely, that, whereas Adam was created in the full perfection of his nature, and all his descendants, being born infants, did gradually proceed to maturity; subtracting the time from their infancy to their manhood, we shall find, that Adam outlived them all. For we must not compute, as we do now, (when the extent of man's life is usually no more than seventy) that his complete manhood was at thirty, or thereabouts. In the very catalogue now before us, we read of none (except Enoch, and two others, who begat children before they were ninety or upwards;) and therefore, subtracting those years (which we may suppose interfered between his birth and his manhood) from the age of Methuselah, we may perceive, that Adam surpassed him to the number of almost sixty.—On the more Difficult Passages.

A. M. 622, or 1122. Jared, when 162, had a son named Enoch: after which he lived 800 years; in all 962.

A. M. 687, or 1287. Enoch, when 65, had a son named Methuselah: after which he lived 300: in all 365.

A. M. 874, or 1474. Methuselah, when 187, had a son named Lamech: after which he lived 782: in all 969.

A. M. 1056, or 1656. Lamech, when 192, had a son named Noah: after which he lived 595; in all 777: and

A. M. 1556, or 2256. Noah, when he was 500 years old, had three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japhet, c from whom the world, after the deluge, was replenished.

d This is the genealogy which Moses gives us of the posterity of Adam, in the line of Seth, until the time of the deluge; but we must observe, that these are far from being all his progeny. In the case of our great progenitor Adam, he informs us, that after the birth of Seth, 1 'he had several sons and daughters,' though he does not so much as record their names; and the like we may suppose of the rest of the antediluvian patriarchs. For c Of these three sons, the eldest was Japhet, as appears from Gen. x. 21., the second was Shem, from Gen. x. 21., and the youngest Ham, from Gen. ix. 24. Nevertheless, both here, and a little lower, Shem is named first; whether it was, that the rights of primogeniture were transferred to him (though the sacred historian says nothing of it,) or God was minded, thus early, to show that he would not be confined to the order of nature, in the disposal of his favours, which he frequently bestowed upon the younger children; or (what I think the most likely) because the nation of the Jews were to descend from him, and he, and his posterity, were to be the principal subject of this whole history.—Patrick and Le Clerc's Commentary, and Pool's Annota.

d From this catalogue we may further observe, that the custom in those times was, to give children their names according to the occurrences in life, or expectations of their parents. Thus Seth, being a good man, was grieved to see the great degeneracy in other parts, though he endeavoured to preserve his own family from the contagion; and therefore called his son Enos, which signifies sorrowful. Enos, perceiving the posterity of Cain to grow every day worse and worse, was concerned for their iniquity, and began to dread the consequences of it; and therefore called his son Cainan, which denotes lamentation. Though Cainan had his name from the wickedness of Cain's family, yet he himself was resolved to maintain the true worship of God in his own; and therefore called his son Mahalaleel, that is, a praiser and worshipper of God. In the days of Mahalaleel (as the tradition tells us) a defection happened among the sons of Seth, who went down from the mountains where they inhabited, and adjoined themselves to the daughters of Cain: and therefore he called his son's name Jared, which signifies descending. Jared, to guard against the general corruption, devoted himself and his descendants, more zealously to the service of God, and, accordingly, called his son Enoch, which means a dedication. Enoch, by the spirit of prophecy, foreseeing the destruction which would come upon the earth, immediately after the death of his son, called his name Methuselah, which imports as much; for the first part of the word, Methu, signifies he dies, and Selah, the sending forth of water. Methuselah, perceiving the wickedness of the world, in the family of Seth, as well as that of Cain, to grow every day worse and worse, called his son Lamech, which intimates a poor man, humbled, and afflicted with grief, for the present corruption and fear of future punishment. And Lamech conceiving better hopes of his son (as some imagine) that he should be the promised seed, the restorer of mankind after the deluge, or a notable improver of the art of agriculture, called his name Noah, which denotes a comforter.—Beiford's Scripture Chronology. We may observe, from this catalogue, however, that the patriarchs, in those days, were not so superstitious, as to think any thing ominous in names; and therefore we find, that Jared feared not to call his son Enoch, by the very name of Cain's eldest son, Gen. iv. 17., even a Methuselah called his son Lamech, by the name of one of Cain's grandchildren, ch. iv. ver. 18.—Patrick's Commentary.

A. M. 130. A. C. 3874; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 230. A. C. 5181. GEN. CH. 5. AND 6. TO VER. 13.

it is incongruous to think, that Lamech was 181, and Methuselah, 187, before they ever had a child, when it so plainly appears that his father Enoch had one at 65. The true reason then of this omission is,—that the historian never intended to give us a catalogue of the collateral branches (which doubtless were many) but only of the principal persons by whom, in a right line, the succession was continued down to Noah, and thence to Abraham, the founder of the Jewish nation.

Not long after the departure of Cain, the whole world was divided into two families, or opposite nations: the family of Seth, which adhered to the service of God, ^a became more frequent in religious offices; and, as their number increased, met in larger assemblies, and in communion, to perform the divine worship by way of public liturgy; and, ¹ for this their piety and zeal, were styled the sons or servants of God, in distinction to the family of Cain, which now became profligate and profane, renouncing the service of God, and addicting themselves to all manner of impiety and lasciviousness; from whence they had the name of the ‘sons and daughters of men.’

In this period of time, Enoch, one of the family of Seth, and the seventh in a direct line from Adam, a per-

^a The words in our translation are,—‘Then,’ that is, in the days of Enos, ‘began men to call upon the name of the Lord,’ ch. iv. 26.; but, it being very probable, that public assemblies for religious offices, were held long before this time, and that even when Cain and Abel offered their sacrifices, their families joined with them in the worship of God; some men of great note, such as, Bertram, Hackspan, and Heidegger, take them in the same sense with our marginal translation; ‘then began men,’ that is, the children of Seth, ‘to call themselves by the name of the Lord,’ that is, the servants and worshippers of the Lord, in contradistinction to the Cainites, and such profane persons as had forsaken him. It must not be dissembled, however, that the word Hockal, which we translate began, in several places of Scripture signifies to profane; and upon this presumption many of the Jewish writers, and some of no obscure fame among us, have taken the words so, as if Moses intended to intimate to us, that men began now to apostatize from the worship of God, to fall into idolatry, and to apply the most holy name, which alone belongs to the great Creator of heaven and earth, to created beings, and especially to the sun. But, considering that Moses is here speaking of the pious family of Seth, and not of that of Cain; that when the Hebrew word signifies to profane, it has always a noun following it; but when an affirmative mood follows, (as in the passage before us,) it always signifies to begin; and withal, that the eastern writers represent this Enos as an excellent governor, who, while he lived, preserved his family in good order, and, when he died, called them all together, and gave them a charge to keep all God's commandments, and not to associate themselves with the children of Cain; considering all this, I say, we can hardly suppose that Moses is here pointing out the origin of idolatry, but rather the invention of some religious rites and ceremonies in the external worship of God at this time, or the distinction which good men began to put between themselves and such as were openly wicked and profane. For that the true meaning of the expression Karabeshem, according to our marginal translation, is to call or nominate by, or after the name of any one, is manifest from several instances in Scripture. Thus, Gen. iv. 17, Jikra, he called the name of the city Beshem, by, or after the name of his son, Numb. xxxii. 42, Jikra, he called it Nobabshem, by, or after his own name; and in Psal. xlix. 11, Kareau, they call their lands Bishmotham, by, or after their own names; and the name here intimated is afterwards expressly given them by Moses himself, Gen. vi. when he tells us, that ‘the sons of God saw the daughters of men.’—Patrick's Commentary; and Calmel's Dictionary on the word Enos; and Shuckford's Connection, vol. 1. b. 1.

son of singular piety and sanctity of life, not only took care of his own conduct, ^b as considering himself always under the eye and observation of a righteous God, but, by his good advices and admonitions, endeavoured likewise to put a stop to the torrent of impiety, and reform the vices of the age; for which reason God was pleased to show a signal token of his kindness to him; for he exempted him from the common fate of mankind, and, without suffering death to pass upon him, translated him into the regions of bliss.

In this period of time, Adam, who (according to the sentence denounced against him at the fall) was to return to his native dust, departed this life, and (as the tradition is) having called his son Seth, and the other branches of his numerous family about him, he gave them strict charge, that they should always live separate,

^b This seems to be the natural sense of the expression of walking with God; and excellent to this purpose is this passage of Seneca, if we take what he tells us of the presence of God in a Christian sense:—

“Verily we must so conduct ourselves as if we lived in God's presence,—we must so think as if some one could look into the recesses of our hearts, and there is one who can, for what availeth it that any thing be kept hid from man? nothing is concealed from God; he is present in our minds, and knoweth our thoughts.”—B. I. Epist. 83; Le Clerc's Commentary.

But, considering how usual a thing it was, in these early ages of the world, for angels to be conversant with good men, it may not improperly be said of Enoch, and of Noah both, that they walked with God in this sense, namely, that they had oftentimes familiar converse with these messengers, who might be sent with instructions from him how they were to behave upon several occasions: for this answers the traditions of the heathens, namely, that in the golden age, their gods had frequent intercourse with men:

An endless life shall be his gift, and he,
Great heroes with the gods convened shall see;
While he by them with loving eyes beheld.

Virg. Ec. 4.

And to the same purpose:—

More oft of old th' inhabitants of heaven,
Went wont to show themselves to human eyes,
When piety not yet was held in scorn.

Catul. in Nap. Thet. et Peloi.

^c Where Adam was buried cannot be collected from Scripture. St Jerome, in Matt. xxvii. seems to approve of the opinion of those who imagine that he was buried at Hebron, in the cave of Machpelah, or the double cave, which Abraham, many ages after, bought for a burying place for himself and family, Gen. xxiii. 3. &c. The oriental Christians say, that when Adam saw death approaching, he called his son Seth, and the rest of his family to him, and ordered them to embalm his body with myrrh, frankincense, and cassia, and deposit it in a certain cave, on the top of a mountain, which he had chosen for the repository of his remains, and which was thence called the cave of All-Konuz, a word derived from the Arabian Kanaza, which signifies to lay up privately. And this precaution (as the Jews will have it) was ordered by Adam to be taken, lest his posterity should make his relics the object of idolatry. Several of the primitive fathers believe, that he died in the place where Jerusalem was afterwards built, and that he was interred on Mount Calvary, in the very spot where Christ was crucified; but others are of opinion, that (though he did not die at Jerusalem,) yet Noah, at the time of the deluge, put his body into the ark, and took care to have it buried there by Melchisedec, the son of Shem, his grandson. The Mahometans will have his sepulchre to have been on a mountain near Mecca; and the ancient Persians, in Serendil, or Ceylon: so ambitious is every nation to have the father of all mankind reposed with them. When Eve, the mother of all living, died is nowhere expressed in Scripture; but there are some who venture to tell us, that she outlived her husband ten years.—See the Universal History; and Calmel's Dictionary on the word Adam.

and have no manner of intercourse with the impious family of the murderer Cain.

In this period of time, Noah, the great-grandson of Enoch, and a person of equal virtue and piety, was born: and as it was discovered to Enoch at the birth of Methuselah, that soon after that child's death, the whole race of mankind should be destroyed for their wickedness; so was it revealed to Lamech, at the birth of his son,¹ that he and his family should be preserved from the common destruction, and so become the father of the new world; and for this reason^a he called him Noah, which signifies a comforter: though others imagine, that the name was therefore given him, because his father, by the spirit of prophecy, foreknew, that God, in his days, would remove the curse of barrenness from off the face of the earth, and, after the time of the deluge, restore it to its original fertility.

After the death of Adam, the family of Seth (to fulfil

^a The substance of Lamech's prophecy, according to our translation, is this:—He called his son Noah, saying; This same shall comfort us, concerning the work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed; and the sense of learned men upon it hath been very different. Some are of opinion, that there is nothing prophetic in this declaration of Lamech's, and that the only cause of his rejoicing was, to see a son born, who might in time be assisting to him in the toil of cultivating the ground. But in this there is nothing particular: in this sense Lamech's words may be applied by every father at the birth of every son; nor can we conceive why a peculiar name should be given Noah, if there was no particular reason for it. The Jewish interpreters generally expound it thus: 'He shall make our labour in tilling the ground more easy to us,' in that he shall be the inventor of several proper tools and instruments of husbandry, to abate the toil and labour of tillage; and some will tell us, that he therefore received his name, because he first invented the art of making wine, a liquor that cheers the heart, and makes man forget sorrow and trouble. But the invention of fit tools for tillage, after that Tubal-Cain had become so great an artificer in brass and silver, seems to belong to one of his descendants, rather than Noah; and as Noah was not the first husbandman in the world, so neither can it be concluded from his having planted a vineyard, that he was the first vine-dresser. Another opinion, not altogether unlike this, is,—that Lamech, being probably informed by God, that his son Noah should obtain a grant of the creatures for food, Gen. ix. 5. and knowing the labour and inconveniences they were under, rejoiced in foreseeing what ease and comfort they should have, when they obtained a large supply of food from the creatures, besides what they could produce from the ground by tillage. The restoration of mankind by Noah, and his sons surviving the flood, is thought by many to answer the comfort which Lamech promised himself and his posterity: but the learned Heidegger, after an examination of all these, and some other opinions, supposeth that Lamech, having in mind the promise of God, expected that his son should prove the blessed seed, the Saviour of the world, who was to bruise the serpent's head, and, by his atonement, expiate our sins, which are the works of our own hands, and remove the curse which lay upon sinners. But this, in my opinion, is too forced an exposition. Lamech, it is certain, in virtue of God's promise, expected a deliverance from the curse of the earth, and foresaw that that deliverance would come through his son: but how came it through his son, unless it came in his son's days? And in what instance could it appear, unless it were something subsequent to the flood? And what could that possibly be, unless the removal of the sterility of the earth, and restoring it to its original fruitfulness? For which reason we find God, after the flood, declaring, that 'he will not curse the earth for man's sake;' and solemnly promising, that 'while the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest shall not cease.' Gen. viii. 22. See Heidegger's History of the Patriarchs; Patrick and Le Clerc's Commentary; Poole's Annotations; Shuckford's Connection; and Bishop Sherlock's Use and Intent of Prophecy, Dissertation 4.

their father's will) removed from the plain where they had lived, to the mountains over against paradise, where Adam is said to have been buried; and for some time lived there in the fear of God, and in the strictest rules of piety and virtue. But as the family of Cain, daily increased, they came at length to spread themselves over all the plain which Seth had left, even to the confines of the hill-country, where he had fixed his abode, and there they^b lived in all kind of riot, luxury, and licentiousness.

The noise of their revellings might possibly reach the holy mountain where the Sethites dwelt; whereupon some of them might be tempted to go down, merely to gratify their curiosity perhaps at first, but being taken with their deluding pleasures, and^c intoxicated with the charms of their women, (who were extremely beautiful,) they forgot the charge which their forefathers had given them, and so took to themselves wives of the daughters of Cain; from which criminal mixture were born men of vast gigantic stature, who for some time infested the earth: and, in a few generations after, the whole family of Seth (very probably after the death of their pious ancestor) followed the like example, and, forgetting their obligations to the contrary, entered into society with the Cainites, and made intermarriages with them; from whence arose another race of men, no less remarkable for their daring wickedness than for their bold undertakings and adventurous actions.

Evil communications naturally corrupt good manners; and so the example of the wicked family prevailed, and, by degrees, eat out all remains of religion in the posterity of Seth. Noah indeed, who was a good and pious man, endeavoured what he could,² both by his counsel and authority, to bring them to a reformation of their manners, and to restore the true religion among them;

² Josephus's Antiquities, b. i. c. 4.

^b Some of the oriental writers have given us a large account of their manner of living. "As to the posterity of Cain," say they, "the men did violently burn in lust towards the women, and, in like manner, the women, without any shame, committed fornication with the men; so that they were guilty of all manner of filthy crimes with one another, and, meeting together in public places for this purpose, two or three men were concerned with the same woman, the ancient women, if possible, being more lustful and brutish than the young. Nay, fathers lived promiscuously with their daughters, and the young men with their mothers; so that neither the children could distinguish their own parents, nor the parents know their own children. So detestable were the deeds of the Cainites, who spent their days in lust and wantonness, in singing and dancing, and all kinds of music, until some of the sons of Seth, hearing the noise of their music and riotous mirth, agreed to go down to them from the holy mountain, and, upon their arrival, were so captivated with the beauty of their women, (who were naked) that they immediately defiled themselves with them, and so were undone. For when they offered to return again to their former abodes, the stones of the mountain became like fire, and permitted them to pass no farther."—Eutyck. Annals, p. 27.

^c Our excellent Milton describes the manner of their being captivated with the daughters of Cain in these words:

—They on the plain
Long had not walk'd, when from their tents, behold,
A bevy of fair women, richly gay,
In gems, and wanton dress: to th' harp they sung
Soft amorous ditties, and in dance came on.
The men, though grave, eyed them; and let their eyes
Rove without rein; till in the amorous net
First caught, they lik'd, and each his liking chose.

“but all he could do was to no purpose. The bent of their thoughts had taken another turn; and all their study and contrivance was, how to gratify their lusts and inordinate passions. In one word, the whole race of mankind was become so very wicked, that one would have really thought they had been confederated together against Heaven, to violate God’s law, to profane his worship, and spurn at his authority; so that his patience and long-suffering came at length to be wearied out: and though he is not a man that he should repent, or the son of man, that he should grieve at any thing, yet his concern for the general corruption is represented under that notion, the better to accommodate it to our capacity, and to express his fixed resolution of destroying all mankind for their iniquity, and with them all other creatures made for their use, ^b as if he had repented that ever he made them.

Before he resolved upon their destruction, however, we find him in great struggle and conflict with himself; his justice calling for vengeance, and his mercy pleading for forbearance; till at length his justice prevailed, and denounced the sentence of condemnation upon the wicked world: but still with this reserve—That if, ^c within the

^a Josephus tells us, that Noah, for a long while, opposed the growing impiety of the age; but that at last, finding himself and family in manifest danger of some mortal violence for his goodwill, he departed out of the land himself, and all his people;—Antiq. b. l. c. 4; and (as the tradition is,) he settled in a country called Cyparission, which had its name from the great quantity of cypress-trees which grew there, and whereof (as we shall observe hereafter) in all probability he built the ark.

^b As languages were at first invented by such persons as were neither philosophers nor divines, we cannot at all wonder, that we meet with many improprieties in speech, and such actions imputed to God, as no ways comport with the dignity of his nature. Thus, when the Holy Scriptures speak of God, they ascribe hands, and eyes, and feet to him; not that he has any of these members, according to the literal signification; but the meaning is, that he has a power to execute all those acts, to the effecting of which, these parts in us are instrumental, that is, he can converse with men, as well as if he had a tongue or mouth; can discern all that we do or say, as perfectly as if he had eyes and ears; and can reach us, as well as if he had hands or feet, &c. In like manner, the Scripture frequently represents him, as affected with such passions as we perceive in ourselves, namely, as angry and pleased, loving and hating, repenting and grieving, &c.; and yet, upon reflection, we cannot suppose, that any of these passions can literally affect the divine nature; and therefore the meaning is, that he will as certainly punish the wicked, as if he were inflamed with the passion of anger against them; as infallibly reward the good, as we will those for whom we have a particular affection; and that when he finds any alteration in his creatures, either for the better or the worse, he will as surely change his dispensations towards them, as if he really repented, or changed his mind. It is by way of analogy and comparison, therefore, that the nature and passions of men are ascribed to God; so that when he is said to repent or grieve, the meaning must be, not that he perceived any thing that he was ignorant of before, to give him any uneasiness, (for ‘known unto him are all his ways from the beginning,’) but only that he altered his conduct with regard to men, as they varied in their behaviour towards him, just as we are wont to do when we are moved by any of those passions and changes of affections, we, ‘who dwell in houses of clay, and whose foundations are in the dust:’ for the very heathens can tell us, that “to alter what hath been accomplished is a lessening of majesty, and a confession of error, for of necessity the same thing must always satisfy him whom nothing but the best can please.” Seneca in Praef. Nat. Quest.—See Le Clerc’s Commentary; Bishop King on Predestination; and Ainsworth’s Annotations.

^c This was the term allowed mankind for their repentance, and prevention of their ruin: and yet, if we compare ch. v. 32.

space of 120 years, (which was the term limited for their revival,) they should forsake their evil ways, repent, and reform, his mercy should be at liberty to interpose, and reverse their doom. All which he communicated to his servant Noah, who, for his justice and singular piety in that corrupt and degenerate age, had found favour in his sight; and for whose sake his family, which consisted of eight persons in all, was to be exempted from the general destruction.

THAT God of his infinite wisdom might, for very good reasons, think proper to create man at first, and in all the full perfection of his nature, notwithstanding he could not but foresee, that he would sadly degenerate, and turn rebel to his will, is a question we have already endeavoured to resolve, ¹ when we treated of the fall of Adam; and by what means his posterity, in the succession of so few generations, as passed from the creation to the flood, became so very corrupt, as to lay God under a necessity to destroy them, may in a great measure be imputed to the length of their lives, and the strength and vigour of their constitutions. For, supposing all mankind, since the original defection, to be born in a state of depraved nature, with their understandings impaired, their wills perverted, and their passions inflamed; ² we can scarce imagine any restraint consistent with human freedom, sufficient to check their unruly appetites in that height of vigour, and confidence of long life. For if we, who rarely, and with no small difficulty, stretch out the span of seventy years, are hardly withheld from violence and villany by all the dictates of reason and terrors of religion, what can we conceive sufficient to have kept them back, in their strength and security in sin from a continued series of eight or nine hundred years? No interposition of Providence can be supposed available to the reformation of mankind under these circumstances, unless it were such as would either change their nature, or destroy their freedom; and therefore we have reason to believe, that in the space of about 1500 years from the creation, God found them degenerated to such a degree, as if they had lost all sense of their humanity; for this some have made the import of the text, ‘my Spirit shall not always strive with man, for that he also is flesh,’ that is, it is in vain to use any farther methods of mercy, or monitions of providence with man, who is now entirely given up with ch. vii. 11., we shall find, that between this time and the flood, there were but 100 years. How then did God perform his promise? Now, in answer to this, it may be said, that the increasing wickedness of mankind might justly hasten their ruin, and forfeit the benefit of this indulgence; but what I take to be the true solution is this:—This promise (though mentioned after what we read in ch. v. 32.) seems nevertheless to have been made 20 years before it; for that verse is added there out of its proper place, only to complete the genealogy; and therefore, after this narrative of the wickedness of the world it is repeated here in its due order, in the 10th verse: nor are such transpositions uncommon in Scripture, without any diminution to its authority.—Poole’s Annotations.

A. M. 1536. A. C. 2468; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 2136. A. C. 3275. GEN. CH. 5. AND 6. TO VER. 13.

to fleshly appetites, and by that means sunk down into the lowest condition of brutality.

By what gradations man arrived at his height of corruption, is not so evident from Scripture: but there are two passages, ¹ 'the earth was corrupt before God, and the earth was filled with violence;' which seem to point out some particular vices: for by 'violence' is plainly meant cruelty, and outrage, and injustice of every kind; and by corruption, the Jews always understand, either idolatry, or unlawful mixtures and pollutions; the latter of which seems to be denoted here because of the subsequent explication of the words, 'for all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth.'

Now, if we look into the history, we shall find, that the first act of violence was committed by Cain upon his brother Abel; the first act of incontinence by Lamech, in the matter of his polygamy; and that as one of his sons invented the instruments of luxury, so the other invented the instruments of violence and war. As luxury therefore naturally begets a disposition to injure others in their property, and such a disposition, armed with offensive weapons, in the hands of men of a gigantic stature and strength, (as many of the antediluvians very probably were,) tends to beget all manner of insolence and outrage to our fellow-creatures; so these two cardinal vices might naturally enough introduce that train of corruption which drew God's judgments upon the inhabitants of the earth.

Had God indeed given them no intimations of this his design, no calls to repentance, no means and opportunities of becoming better, before he determined their destruction, something might then be said in opposition to the righteousness of this procedure; but ² since, from the very beginning, he was pleased, in the sentence he passed upon the serpent, to give them a remarkable promise, that the seed of the woman should destroy the power of that evil spirit which brought sin into the world, and consequently, ³ that all parents were obliged to train up their children in the ways of virtue and religion, without which it was impossible for any of them to be the promised seed, which was to restore mankind to their original perfections; since he himself instituted sacrifices, as a means admirably well fitted to inspire mankind with an horror of guilt, and be, at the same time, a perpetual memorial of the divine mercy from generation to generation; since, in his expulsion of Cain from his presence, and exaltation of Enoch into heaven, he made an open declaration to all future ages, that his vengeance should at all times pursue sin, but his bounty had always in store an ample reward for the righteous; since at this time he exhibited himself to mankind in a more sensible manner than he does now, causing them to hear voices, and to dream dreams, and, by sundry extraordinary means, convincing them of their duty, and giving them directions for the conduct of their lives; since, at this time, they had the principles of religion (which were but very few) conveyed to them by an easy tradition, which, by Methuselah's living 248 years with Adam, and dying but a little before the flood, in the compass of 1600 years and more, had but two hands to pass through: and, lastly, since God appointed Noah in particular to be 'a preacher of righteousness,' ⁴ as the apostle styles him, to exhort that wicked race to forsake their sins, and return unto him; to warn them of their impending doom, if they persisted in their provocations; to give them notice, that 120 years was the stated time of their reprieve, and that, at the end of that period, his fixed determination was to destroy them utterly, unless their amendment averted the judgment. Since these and many more methods of mercy were all along employed by God (and especially in the days that his long-suffering waited, while the ark was preparing) for the recovery of mankind, before the deluge came upon them, they are sufficient to vindicate the ways of God with man, and to justify his severity in bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly, which neither his restraints nor rewards, nor all the monitions and exhortations of his prophets, added to his own declarations, institutions, inflictions, and denunciations of vengeance, could reclaim, in the course of so many centuries.⁵

Other living creatures, it is true, were not culpable in this manner: they all answered the ends of their production, and man was the only rebel against his Maker. But as, in an universal deluge, it was impossible to preserve them alive without a miracle; so, having, in some measure, been made instrumental to man's wickedness, innocent though they were, they were all to be destroyed, in order to evince the malignity of sin, and God's abhorrence of it. For the great end of his providence, in sending the deluge was not so much to ease himself of his adversaries, as to leave a perpetual monument of his unrelenting severity, that thereby he might deter future ages from the like provocations. And this is the inference which the apostle draws from all his judgments of old: ⁶ 'If God spared not the angels,' says he, 'that sinned, but cast them down to hell; if he spared not the old world, but brought in a flood upon the ungodly; if he turned the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes, and condemned them with an overthrow; these are an ensample unto those, that after shall live ungodly;' for (however they may escape in this life) 'he hath reserved the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished.'

The Scripture indeed seems to impute all this iniquity to the marriages between the sons of God and the daughters of men; but the misfortune is, that several interpreters, being led away by the authority of the LXX, who (according to Philo) did anciently render what we style the sons of God, by ἄγγελοι τοῦ Θεοῦ, have supposed, that wicked and apostate angels assumed, at this time, human bodies, and, having had carnal communication with women, begat of them a race of giants; and from this original, the notion of incubi, or devils conversing with women in the like manner, has ever since been derived. St Austin, "among many others, is very positive a Dr Whitty, in his Writings of the Fathers, page 5, has instanced in almost all the fathers of the four first centuries, who were of this opinion; such as Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Athenagoras, Clemens Alexandrinus, Tertullian, St Cyprian, Lactantius, Eusebius, &c., and supposes that this notion took its rise from the vain traditions of the Jews; because we find not only Philo reading the word ἄγγελοι, or angels, in the Septuagint version, but Josephus likewise asserting, "that the angels of God mixing with women, begat an insolent race (not much unlike that of the giants in the Greek fables) overbearing right with power."—Antiquities, b. 1. c. 4.

in this opinion. ¹“Several people have had the trial,” says he, “and several have heard it from those who knew it to be true, that the silvani and fauni, commonly called incubi, have been often fatal to women, and have defiled their bed. It is likewise affirmed with so much confidence, that certain demons (called durii among the Gauls) have not only attempted, but likewise perpetrated these kinds of impure actions, that it would be foolish to make any question of it.” But besides the incompatibility of the notion of a spirit, and the nature of an incubus, the sons of God are here represented under circumstances quite different to what we may suppose of any demons assuming human shape.

²An incubus (if any such there be) can desire commerce with a woman, for no other reason, but only to draw her into the gulf of perdition. Any carnal gratification of his own cannot be his motive, because pleasure, in an assumed body, if it is pretended to, must be fictitious: but here the sons of God are said to be enamoured with the daughters of men, and (to satisfy their lusts) ‘to take to themselves wives of all that they chose,’ which denoting a settled marriage and cohabitation with them, can hardly be imagined in the case before us. From those marriages we may farther observe, that a generation of living men, called in Scripture men of renown, did ensue; but it is impious to think, that God would ever concur with the devil, violating the laws of generation which he had established, and prostituting the dignity of human nature, by stamping his own image upon, or infusing an human soul into whatever matter a fiend should think fit to ingenerate.

In prejudice taken to this opinion, therefore, several interpreters have made choice of another, which, though somewhat more reasonable, is nevertheless subject to exceptions. It supposes, that, by the sons of God in this place, are meant the princes, great men, and magistrates in those times, who, instead of using their authority to punish and discountenance vice, were themselves the greatest examples and promoters of lewdness and debauchery; taking the daughters of men, or of the inferior and meaner sort of the people, and debauching them by force. But ³besides the harshness of the construction, which (contrary to Scripture-phrases) makes all great and powerful sons to be called the sons of God, and all mean and plebeian women the daughters of men, there is this error in the supposition, that the great men we are now speaking of, did not offer any force or violence to these inferior women; ‘they saw that they were fair, and made choice of them for wives.’ They did not take them merely to lie with them, and so dismiss them; but voluntarily entered into a state of matrimony and cohabitation with them. And this being all the matter, wherein is the heinousness of the offence, if men of a superior rank marry with their inferiors, especially when an excess of beauty apologizes for their choice? Or, why should a few unequal matches be reckoned among some of the chief causes which brought upon the world an universal destruction?

The most common, therefore, and indeed the only probable opinion is, that the sons of God were the descendants of Seth, who, for the great piety wherein they continued for some time, were so called, and that daughters of men were the progeny of wicked Cain. And why the intermarriages of these two families (even though there was no express prohibition from God) came to be so provoking to him, and in the end so destructive to themselves, is the next point of our inquiry.

It has been a question among the learned, whether or no, in the ages before the flood, idolatry was practised? but there seems to be no great foundation for our doubting it, though some have endeavoured to establish it upon incompetent texts. The only expression in Scripture that bears a proper aspect this way is in Gen. vi. 5. where we are told, ‘That God saw, that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually.’ The words seem parallel to that passage of the apostle, ⁴‘they became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened;’—whereupon it follows, ‘that they changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image, made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things.’ Since therefore Moses makes use of ⁵the like expression concerning the age soon after the flood, men fell into idolatry, until the true worship of God was again established in Abraham’s family, it seems very probable that he intended us an intimation hereof in the manner of his expressing himself. Nor can we imagine but that, when St Peter compares the false teachers of his age with the people of the antediluvian world, in the nature of their punishment, he means to inform us, that they resembled them likewise in the nature of their crime, in their ⁶‘bringing in damnable heresies,’ and abetting such doctrines, as ‘even denied the Lord that bought them;’ or that, when St Jude ⁷expresses his indignation against certain ungodly men in his days, ‘who denied the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ,’ in such words as these, ‘Woe unto them, for they are gone in the way of Cain;’ he leaves us to infer, that Cain and his posterity were the first that threw off the sense of a God, and, instead of the Creator, began to worship the creature.

Now if the Cainites were, at this time, not only profligate in their manners, but abettors of infidelity, and promoters of idolatry; for the family of Seth, who professed the true worship of God, to enter into communion, or any matrimonial compacts with them, could not but prove of fatal consequence. ’Tis a solemn injunction which God gives the Israelites, against all idolatrous nations, ⁸‘Thou shalt not make marriages with them; thy daughter thou shalt not give unto his son, nor his daughter shalt thou take unto thy son.’ And, that this is no special but a general prohibition, extensive to all nations that profess the true worship of God, is evident from the reason that is annexed to it; ‘for they will turn away thy son from following me, that they may serve other gods.’ This was what Balaam knew full well, and therefore, perceiving that he could injure the children of Israel no other way, he advised the Moabites to commence a familiarity with them; whereupon it soon came to pass, that ⁹‘The people began to commit whoredom with the daughters of Moab, and they called the people unto the sacrifices of their gods, and the people did eat, and bowed down to their gods.’

⁷ 'Twas the danger of seduction into a state of idolatry that made Abraham, before the law, so very anxious and uneasy, lest his son Isaac should marry a Canaanitish woman; and though we, under the gospel, 'know,' very well, 'that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God but one,' yet we are admonished by the same apostle, who teaches us this, 'Not to be unequally yoked together with unbelievers; for what fellowship,' says he, 'has righteousness with unrighteousness, what communion hath light with darkness, or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel?'² From all which it seems to follow, that the sin was very heinous in the family of Seth, to mix with the wicked seed of Cain, when they could not but foresee, that the consequence would be their seduction from the true worship of God; and that the heinousness of their sin seems still to be enhanced, if, what some oriental writers tell us be true, namely, that God gave them this prohibition by the mouth of their great forefather Adam, and that their custom was, at certain times, to swear by 'the blood of Abel' (which was their solemn oath) that they would never leave the mountainous country where they inhabited, nor have any communion with the descendants of Cain.

How the commixture of the two different families came to produce a set of giants is not so easy a matter to determine. Those who pretend to reduce it to natural causes, or the eager lust and impetus of their parents, are vastly mistaken,³ because giants there were among the Canites, before this conjunction, and we read of several in other nations many ages after the flood. The more probable opinion therefore is,⁴ that God permitted it in vengeance to their parents' crimes, and that the children begotten by such unlawful mixtures might, (some of them at least,) be accounted monstrous in their kind, (for thus the word Nephilim "certainly signifies,) and so become the abhorrence of all future generations.

It must be acknowledged, indeed, that translators have not agreed in their notions of this word. Aquila, instead of gigantes, renders it ⁵ men who attack, or fall with impetuosity upon their enemies; and Symmachus will have it mean ⁶ violent and cruel men, the only rule of whose actions is their strength and force of arms: and from hence some have imagined, that the giants spoken of in Scripture were famous for the crimes and violences they committed rather than the height or largeness of their stature. But to hinder this from passing for a truth, we have the histories of all ages, both sacred and profane, and several other remains and monuments, to evince ^b the being of such prodigious creatures in almost every country.

⁷ That there were multitudes of giants in the land of promise, before the Israelites took possession of it, such as Og king of Basan, and the Anakims, whom ⁸ the Moabites called Enims, that is, terrible men, and ⁹ the Ammonites, Zamzummins, that is, the inventors of all wickedness, whose posterity were in being in the days of David, and whose bones were to be seen at Hebron, the chief place of their abode, is manifest from the sacred records. ¹⁰ 'All the people,' say the spies who were sent to take a survey of the land, 'are men of stature; and there we saw the giants, the sons of Anak, which came of the giants,' so immeasurably large, that 'we were but like grasshoppers' in comparison of them. And therefore we need less wonder, that we find ¹¹ Josephus, upon the same occasion, telling us, "That the race of giants was not then extinct, who, on account of their largeness and shapes (not at all to be likened to those of other men) were amazing to see, and terrible to hear of." Homer ¹² speaks of the giants Otus and Ephialtes, who, at the age of nine years, were nine cubits about, and six and thirty in height; he likewise describes ¹³ the bigness of the Cyclops Polyphemus, who was of such prodigious strength, that he could, with the greatest facility, take up a stone which two and twenty four-wheeled chariots would scarce be able to move. This we allow to be, in some measure, romantic, but still it confirms the tradition, that several persons of old were of a gigantic stature.

"That the Cyclopes and Læstrigones," ¹⁴ says Bochart, "were once in Sicily, we have the account, not only in the poets, Homer, Hærod, and Euripides, Virgil, Ovid, and Silius, but in the historians and geographers (I mean Thucydides and Strabo) who were Grecians, and in Trogus, Mela, Pliny and others, who were Romans; and that there was something of truth in the fables concerning them, we are assured by those bones of giants, which were dug out of the earth in the memory of our fathers."^c

^a There were giants in the earth, or nephilim, from naphal, "he fell." Those who had apostatized, or fallen from the true religion. The Septuagint translated the original word by γίγαντες, which literally signifies earth-born, and which we, following the m, term giants, without having any reference to the meaning of the word, which we generally conceive to signify persons of enormous stature. But the word when properly understood makes a very just distinction between the sons of men and the sons of God: those were the nephilim, the fallen, earth-born men, with the animal and devilish mind. These were the sons of God, who were born from above; children of the kingdom, because children of God. It may be necessary to remark here, that our translators have rendered seven different Hebrew words by the one term giants, namely, nephilim, gibborim, evachim, rephaim, emim and zamzummin; by which appellatives are probably meant in general, persons of great knowledge, piety, courage, wisdom, &c., and not of men of enormous stature as is generally conjectured.—*Dr A. ^b Dr Whiston, in his Original Records, has a supplement concerning the old giants, wherein, according to the apocryphal book of Enoch, he divides the giants into three kinds, and in this division thinks himself countenanced by the works of Moses, Gen. vi. 2, &c.; the first and lowest kind of which are called Andim, and are of stature from 4 cubits to 15; the second are nephilim, from 15 to 40 cubits; and the third, or great giants, 40 cubits at least, and many times above.

^c Fazellus relates, and out of him Claverius, that, A. D. 1547, near Panormum in Sicily, the body of a giant was dug up, about 18 cubits or 27 feet tall. The same authors relate, that, A. D. 1516, was dug up, near Mazarene in Sicily, the body of a giant, 20 cubits or 30 feet tall. The same authors relate, that, A. D. 1518, near Syracuse, was dug up another body of the same dimension. They inform us, that, A. D. 1550, near Entella in Sicily, was dug up a body of about 22 cubits or 33 feet high, whose skull was about 10 feet in circumference; and they describe the corpse of a giant of portentous magnitude, found standing in a vast cave, near Drepanum in Sicily, A. D. 1342,

But I forbear more instances of this kind, and, ^a referring the reader, for his farther conviction, to such authors as have professedly handled this subject, shall only crave leave to make this remark—¹ that, in all probability, no small part of the eldest cities, towers, temples, obelisks, pyramids, and pillars, some of which are still remaining, and deservedly esteemed the wonders of the world, ^b were the structure of these ancient giants; and, as they surpass the abilities of all later ages, so they seem to me to be the visible and undeniable remains, monuments, and demonstrations, not only of their existence, but of their prodigious stature and strength likewise; since in an age, ignorant of mechanical powers and engines, such vast piles of building could no otherwise have been erected.

Without concerning ourselves then with the fictions and fables of the poets, or ² whether the giants of old rebelling against heaven, were able to heap mountains upon mountains, in order to scale it, or to hurl rocks, and islands, and huge flaming trees against it, in order to shake, or set it on fire; all that we pretend to say is, that in ancient days, there were giants, in great numbers, who (excepting the largeness of their stature) were formed and fashioned like other men, and waged no other war with heaven, than what all wicked persons are known to do, when they provoke the Divine Majesty by their crimes and enormous impieties. This is the whole of what the Scriptures assert, and I know no occasion we have to defend the wild hyperboles of the poets.

Amidst the antediluvian corruption, and even while these abominable and gigantic men were in being, Moses makes particular mention of one person of eminent sanctity, and who found a favour extraordinary, for having preserved his innocence, and persisted in his duty, notwithstanding the wickedness of the age wherein he lived. Enoch was certainly, in other respects, an extraordinary person. ³ St Jude distinguishes him as a prophet: ⁴ the Arabians represent him as a great scholar; the Babylonians look upon him as the author of their astrology; the Greeks call him their Atlas, and affirm, that he was the first who taught men the knowledge of the stars; but it was not for these rare qualities, so much as for his singular piety and virtue, that God exempted him from the common fate of mankind.

The Jewish doctors indeed will have the words of Moses concerning him to import no more, than his sudden and untimely death, because he lived not near so long as the other patriarchs. But the paraphrase which St Paul gives us of them, ⁵ 'By faith Enoch was translated, that he should not see death, and was not found, because God had translated him; for, before his translation, he had this testimony, that he pleased God;' this paraphrase, I say, will not suffer us to doubt of the truth of the Christian interpretation. And indeed, ⁶ unless the Christian interpretation be true, the whole emphasis of Moses' words is lost, and they become a crude tautology. For, if we say, that Enoch was not, that is, was no longer living, because God took him, that is, God caused him to die; it is the same, as if we should say, God caused him to die, because he took him away by death, which is flat and insipid, a proof of the same thing by the same thing, and hardly consistent with common sense: whereas, if we interpret the words in this manner—Enoch was not, that is, was nowhere to be found, was seen neither among the living nor the dead here on earth, for God took him, that is, because God translated to another place, soul and body together, without undergoing the pains of death; here is a grace and energy in the expression, not unbecoming the style of an inspired penman.

The reason which Moses assigns for God's taking him, in this wise, is, that 'he walked with God:' but if God's taking him means no more than his hasty death, it was far from being a divine attestation of his piety, (because length of days are the promised reward of that:) and therefore we may be allowed to infer, that his walking with God was not the cause of his ablation by death, but of his assumption into glory. The truth is, ⁷ about fifty-seven years before this event, Adam, the father of all living, had submitted to the sentence denounced against him, and resigned his breath; and whatever notions his posterity might have of a life immortal in reversion, yet it seemed expedient to the divine wisdom, at this time, in the person of Enoch, to give them, as it were, anticipation of it, and to support and comfort them under the sense of their mortality, with the prospect, and assured hope, that after the dark entry of death was passed, they were to be admitted into the mansions of bliss.

Our Saviour, indeed, when he came upon earth, (though declared from heaven to be the Son of God,) was not exempted from the common condition of our mortality. ⁸ 'Forasmuch as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him who had the power of death, that is, the devil.' His errand was to propitiate for our sins; but since,¹ without shedding of blood there is no remission, the decree was, that he should die, which when he had satisfied he rose again; and after forty days' converse with his disciples 'even² while they beheld him,' we are told, 'he was taken up into heaven, and a cloud received him out of their sight.' And, in like manner, if the end of Enoch's assumption was for the conviction of mankind in that great article of faith, the reality of another world, it seems reasonable to believe, that the thing was done publicly and visibly; that either some bright and radiant cloud, guided by the ministry of angels, gently raised him from the earth, and mounted with him up on high, (which seems to be our Saviour's case,) or that a³ 'strong gust of wind,' governed by the same angelic powers, in some vehicle or other, resembling a bright 'chariot and horses,' transported him into heaven, (which seems to be the case of Elijah,) and that, in his passage thither, his body was transformed, his corruptible into incorruption, his mortal into immortality 'in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye,'⁴ as we are told it will happen to those who are alive, when the 'last trumpet shall sound.'

It is an idle conceit therefore of some of the Jewish, as well as Christian doctors, that Enoch was not translated into the celestial, but only into the old terrestrial paradise, wherein Adam, before his transgression lived. Whether the beauty of that place went to ruin, or no, as soon as our first parents were ejected, and no hand left to dress it, it is certain, it could never withstand the violence of the flood; and consequently Enoch must have perished in it, unless we can suppose, ^a that he was preserved by some such miracle as the Israelites were, when they passed through the Red sea, and that the waves, towering up on all sides, surrounded it like a wall, and kept that particular spot dry; which is by too much bold a supposition, especially when it contradicts that authority, which tells us, that ^b 'the waters prevailed exceedingly upon the earth, and that all the high hills, which were under the whole heavens, were covered.'

Whatever therefore some may fancy to themselves, we acknowledge now no other paradise, than what is represented in the Scriptures, as a place in which God gives the brightest evidence of his presence, and communicates his glory with the utmost majesty: a place which St Paul calls ^c 'the third heaven,' whereunto Elijah was translated, and wherein our blessed Saviour is now ^d 'preparing mansions for us, that where he is, we may be also.' Into this happy place we suppose Enoch to have been conveyed, and it is no mean confirmation of the truth of the Mosaic account, that we find, among the heathen world, notions of the like translation: that we find Bacchus assuring Cadmus, that by the help of Mars, he should live for ever in the isles of the blessed; that we find Aganympha made immortal by the favour of Jupiter; and, after the death of her husband, Hercules, Alcmena, translated by Mercury, and married to Rhadamanthus; with many more allusions of the like nature.⁸

And in like manner, it is far from being a bad argument for the truth and reality of the flood,⁹ that we find, almost every where in the Latin and Greek historians, horrid descriptions of the lives of the giants, which occasioned that heavy judgment: that we find Berosus the Chaldean, as he is quoted by ¹⁰ Josephus, relating the same things which Moses does, concerning the great deluge, the destruction of mankind by it, and the ark, in which Noachus (the same with Noah) was preserved, and which rested on the tops of the Armenian mountains: that we find Abydenus, the Assyrian (as he is cited ¹¹ by Eusebius) taking notice of the wood of the vessel, wherein Xisuthrus (^b for so he calls Noah) was saved, and telling us, that the people of Armenia made use of it for amulets to drive away diseases, that we find Alexander Polyhistor, in a passage produced ¹² by Cyril, informing us of an Egyptian priest who related to Solon, out of the sacred books of the Egyptians, (as he supposes,) that, before the particular deluges known and celebrated by the Grecians, there was of old an exceeding great inundation of waters, and devastation of the earth: and (to mention no more) that we find ¹³ Lucian giving us a long account of an ancient tradition, which the people of Hierapolis had of the deluge, ^c varying very little from

^b M. Le Clerc, in his notes upon Grotius on Truth, b. 1. sect. 16, seems to intimate, that Xisuthrus, Ogyges, and Deucalion, are all names signifying the same thing in other languages, as Noah does in Hebrew, wherein Moses wrote: and that the deluges which are said to have happened in their times, and are thought to be different, were in reality one and the same.

^c The account, though somewhat long, is not unpleasant, and deserves our observation. This race of men (says he) which now is, was not the first: these are of a second generation, and from their first progenitor Deucalion, who increased to so great a multitude as we now see. Now of these former men they tell us this story.—They were contentions, and did many unrighteous things; they neither kept their oaths, nor were hospitable to strangers: for which reason this great misfortune came upon them. All on a sudden the earth disembowelled itself of a great quantity of water, great showers fell, the rivers overflowed, and the sea swelled to a prodigious height: so that all things became water, and all men perished. Only Deucalion was left unto the second generation, upon the account of his prudence and piety; and the manner in which he was saved was this:—He had a great ark or chest, into which he came with his children and the women of his house, and then entered hogs, and horses, and lions, and serpents, and all other animals which live upon the earth, together with their mates. He received them all, and they did him no harm; for by the assistance of heaven there was a great amity between them, so that all sailed in one chest as long as the water did predominate. This is the account which all the Greek historians give of Deucalion. But what happened afterwards (as it is told by the people of Hierapolis) is worthy our observation, namely, That in their country there was a chasm, into which all this water sunk, whereupon Deucalion built an altar, and erected a temple over it, which he consecrated to Juno; and to verify this story, not only the priests, but the other inhabitants likewise of Syria and Arabia, twice every year, bring abundance of water which they pour into the temple, and though the chasm be but small, yet it receives a prodigious quantity of it; and when what our sacred historian relates: when we find all this, I say, we cannot but acknowledge, that these, and the many more historians who are usually produced upon this head, are a strong testimony of the truth and authority of Moses; and therefore, to conclude this reply, or vindication of him, with the reflection of the learned ¹ Scaliger upon the agreement he perceived between Moses and Abydenus, in the account they both give of the dove and the raven which Noah is said to have sent out; "Though the Greek historians," says he, "do not always agree in particulars with the sacred one, yet they are rather to be pitied for not having had the advantage of true and authentic antiquities and records to set them right, than to forfeit their value and authority, from such slips and deviations from the truth of the story as render their testimony and confirmation of the truth of the sacred history much stronger, because much less to be suspected than if they agreed with it in every circumstance."

CHAP. III.—Of the Heathen History, the Chronology, Religion, Learning, Longevity, &c., of the Antediluvians.

WE are now arrived at a period, where it may be convenient to take some notice of such heathen writers as have given us an account of the times before the flood, through which we have hitherto been tracing Moses: and those that are esteemed of the best credit and repute, are only three; Berosus, who wrote the history of the Chaldeans; Sanchoniatho, who compiled that of the Phœnicians; and Manetho who collected the antiquities of Egypt.

The Chaldeans were certainly a nation of great and undoubted antiquity. ² In all probability they were the first formed into a national government after the flood, and therefore were more capable of having such arts and sciences flourish among them as might preserve the memory of eldest times, to the latest posterity: and yet, even among these people, who enjoyed all the advantages of ease, quiet, and a flourishing empire, we find no credible and undoubted records preserved. ^a Berosus, their historian, was, (as ³ Josephus assures us) a priest of Belus, and a Babylonian born, but afterwards flourished in the isle of Cos, and was the first who brought the Chaldean astrology into request among the Greeks; in honour of whose name and memory, the Athenians (who were great encouragers of novelties) erected a statue for him with a golden tongue, a good emblem of his history, ⁴ says one, which made a fair and specious show, but was not within what it pretended to be, especially when it attempts to treat of ancient times. It cannot be denied, however, but that some fragments of it which have been preserved from ruin by the care and industry of Josephus, Tatianus, Eusebius, and others, have been very useful, not only for proving the truth of Scripture history to the heathens, but for confirming likewise some passages relating to the Babylonish empire.

After a description of Babylonia, and a strange story concerning a certain creature, which, in the first year of the world, came out of the Red sea, and, conversing familiarly with men, taught them the knowledge of letters, and several arts and sciences, he proceeds to give us a short account of ten kings which reigned in Chaldea before the flood, and these corresponding with the number which Moses mentions, Alorus, the first, is supposed to be Adam; and Xisuthrus, the last, Noah; and of this Xisuthrus he pursues the story in this manner.

Sanchoniatho is highly recommended both by Porphry, the great adversary of Christianity, and by his translator into Greek, Philo Biblius. Theodoret is of opinion, that his name, in the Phœnician tongue, signifies Φιλαλήθης, a lover of truth; which name, as Bochart imagines, was given him when he first set himself to write history: but how faithful he has been in transcribing his account of things from his records, we cannot determine, unless we had the books of Tarantus, and the sacred inscriptions and records of cities, from whence he pretends to have extracted his history, to compare them together. If we may judge by what remains of his writings, which is only his first book concerning the Phœnician theology extant in Eusebius, we shall hardly think him deserving so large a commendation: but be that as it will, the method wherein he proceeds is this.—After having delivered his cosmogony, or generation of the other parts of the world, he tells us, that the first pair of human creatures were Protogonus and Æon, (as Philo, his translator, calls them,) the latter of whom found out the food which is gathered from trees: that their issue were called Genus and Genea, who were the first that practised idolatry; for, upon the occasion of great droughts, they made their adorations to the sun, calling him Beel-amen, which, in Phœnician, is the Lord of heaven; that the children of these were Phos, Pur, and Phlox, that is, light, fire, and flame, who first found out the way of generating fire, by rubbing pieces of wood against one another: that these begat sons of vast bulk and stature, whose names were given to mount Cassius Libanus, Antilibanus, and Brathys, whereon they seized: that of these were begotten Memrumus, and Hypsuranius, the latter of whom was the inventor of huts made of reeds and rushes, and had a brother called Usous, the first worshipper of fire and wind, in whose time women became very abandoned and debauched: that many years after this generation, came Agreus and Halicus, the inventors of the arts of hunting and fishing: that of these were begotten two brothers, the first forgers and workers in iron; the name of one is lost, but Chrysor (who is the same with Vulcan) found out all fishing tackle, and, in a small boat, was the first that ventured to sea, for which he was afterwards deified: that from this generation came two brothers, Technites and Autochthon, who invented the art of making tiles; from these Agrus, and Agrotus, who first made courts about houses, fences, and cellars; and from these Anynus, and Magus, who showed men how to constitute villages, and regulate their flocks. This is the substance of what Sanchoniatho relates during this period; and how far it agrees with the account of Moses, especially in the idolatrous line of Cain, our learned bishop Cumberland has all along made his observations.

^a The common opinion that they were the descendants of Chisid, the nephew of Abraham, is at once unsatisfactory and indefensible, for they were a nation before the call of that patriarch when he dwelt with his father Terah in Ur of the Chaldees. They are mentioned in the book of Job, not a very great portion of time after the call of Abraham, and if the hypotheses of Dr Hales and the astronomical calculations of Dr Brindley be true, the era of Job carries their antiquity still higher, as it is fixed by both these gentlemen at upwards of 400 years before the call of Abraham. If, with Josephus and some of the rabbins, we suppose, that the Chaldeans are the progeny of Arphaxad, they may have been a nation long before the call of Abraham.—Bell's edition of Rollin's Ancient History, p. 161.

Manetho Sebennita was high priest of Heliopolis in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, by whose order he wrote his history; but that which destroys the credit of it, (though it gave him an opportunity of invention,) is, that he professes to transcribe his Dynasties from inscriptions on the pillars of Hermes (whom the Egyptians, out of veneration, call Trismegistus) in the land of Seriad, which land no one knows any thing of, and which pillars being engraven before the flood, can hardly be supposed to escape undefaced.

The plain truth is, the LXX translation was, not long before this time, finished; and when the Jewish antiquities came to appear in the world, the Egyptians (who are mighty pretenders this way) grew jealous of the honour of their nation, and were willing to show, that they could trace up their memoirs much higher than Moses had carried those of the Israelites. ² This was the chief design of Manetho's making his collections. He was resolved to make the Egyptian antiquities reach as far backwards as he could; and therefore, as many several names as he found in their records, so many successive monarchs he determined them to have had; never considering that Egypt was at first divided into three, and afterwards into four sovereignties for some time, so that three or four of his kings were many times reigning together: which, if duly considered, will be a means to reduce the Egyptian account to a more reasonable compass.

^a The substance of the account however (as it stands unexplained in Manetho) is this:—That there were in Egypt thirty dynasties of gods, consisting of 113 generations, and which took up the space of 36,525 years; that when this period was out, then there reigned eight demigods in the space of 217 years; that after them succeeded a race of heroes, to the number of fifteen, and their reign took up 443 years; that all this was before the flood, and then began the reign of their kings, the first of whom was Menes.

Now, in order to explain what is meant by this prodigious number of years, we must observe, ³ that it was a very usual and customary thing for ancient writers to begin their histories with some account of the origin of things, and the creation of the world. Moses did so in his book of Genesis; Sanchoniatho did so in his Phœnician history; and it appears from Diodorus, that the Egyptian antiquities did so too. Their accounts began about the origin of things, and the nature of the gods; then follows an account of their demigods, and terrestrial deities; after them came their heroes, or first rank of men; and last of all, their kings. Now, if their kings began from the flood; if their heroes and demigods reached up to the beginning of the world: then the account which they give of the reigns of their gods, before these, can be only their theological speculations put into such order as they thought most philosophical.

To make this more plain, we must observe farther, that the first and most ancient gods of the Egyptians, and of all other nations, (after they had departed from the worship of the true God,) were the luminaries of heaven; and it is very probable, that what they took to be the period of time in which any of these deities finished their course, that they might call the time of his reign. Thus a perfect and complete revolution of any star which they worshipped, was the reign of that star;

^a The accounts of Manetho seem at first sight so extravagant that many great writers look upon them as mere fictions, and omit attempting to say any thing concerning them; though other learned men (and more especially our countryman Sir John Marsham, in his Canonical Chronology, p. 1.) not well satisfied with this proceeding, have undertaken an examination of them and with some success. The misfortune is, we have none of the original works from whence they were collected, nor any one author that properly gives us any sight or knowledge of them. The historians Diodorus Siculus and Herodotus, did not examine these matters to the bottom; and we have no remains of the old Egyptian Chronicon, or of the works of Manetho, except some quotations in the works of other writers. The Chronographia of Synellus, wrote by one George, an abbot of the monastery of St Simeon, and called St Synellus, as being sutragan of Tarasius, patriarch of Constantinople, is the only work we can have recourse to. From these antiquities Synellus collected the quotations of the old Chronicons of Manetho, and of Eratothenes, as he found them in the works of Africanus and Eusebius; and the works of Africanus and Eusebius being now lost, (for it is known that the work which goes under the name of Eusebius' Chronicon is a composition of Scaliger's) we have nothing to be depended upon but what we find in Synellus above mentioned. —Shuckford's Connection.

and as a period of 36,525 years is what they call an entire mundane revolution, that is, when the several heavenly bodies come round to the same point, from which all their courses began; so is it very remarkable, that they made the sum total of the reigns of all their several gods, to amount to the self-same space of time. This I take to be a true state of the Egyptian dynasties: and if so, it makes their history not near so extravagant as has been imagined, and sinks their account of time some hundred years short of the Jewish computation.

The Jewish computation indeed is not a little ambiguous, by reason of the different methods, which men find themselves inclined to pursue. The three common ways of computing the time from the creation to the flood, are, that which arises from the Hebrew text, from the Samaritan copies, and from the LXX. interpretation.

THE COMPUTATION OF MOSES.

1. According to the Hebrew text.	Began his life in the year of the world	Had his son in the year of his life	Lived after his son's birth, years	Lived in all, years	Died in the year of the world

Lamech.....	1474	188	565	753	2227
Noah	1662	500

The difference between the Hebrew and Samaritan computation is easily perceived, by comparing the two former tables together; nor will it be any hard matter to reconcile them, if we consider what ¹ St Jerome informs us of, namely, that there were Samaritan copies which made Methuselah 187 years old at the birth of Lamech; and Lamech 182 at the birth of Noah. Now, if this be true, it is easy to suppose 62 (the age of Jared at the birth of Enoch) to be a mistake of the transcriber, who might drop a letter, and write 62 instead of 162; and thus all the difference between the Hebrew and Samaritan copies will entirely vanish.

But it is not so between the Hebrew and the Septuagint. The Hebrew, according to the highest calculation, makes no more than 1656 years before the flood, but the Septuagint raises it to no less than 2262; so that in this one period (without saying any thing of the wide difference between them in subsequent times) there is an addition of above 600 years, which can hardly be accounted for by any mistake of transcribers, because all the ancient and authentic copies, both of the Hebrew and Septuagint, agree exactly in their computation. And therefore the generality of learned men, despairing a Lud. Capellus, in his Sacred Chronology prepared by Watson for the Polyglot Bible, attempts to reconcile this difference by telling us from St Austin, On the Government of God, c. 13 that this edition was not made by the LXX. themselves, but by some early transcriber from them, and probably for one or other of these two reasons. 1st, Perhaps, thinking the years of the antediluvians to be but lunar, and computing, that at this rate the six fathers (whose lives are thus altered) must have had their children at five, six, seven, or eight years old (which could not but look incredible) the transcriber, I say, finding this, might be induced to add one hundred years to each in order to make them of a more probable age of manhood at the birth of their respective children; or, 2dly, If he thought the years of their lives to be solar, yet still he might imagine, that infancy and childhood were proportionably longer in men who were to live seven, eight, or nine hundred years, than they are in us; and that it was too early in their lives for them to be fathers at sixty, seventy, or ninety years of age; and for this reason, might add one hundred years, to make their advance to manhood (which is commonly not till one-fourth part of life is over) proportionable to what was to be the term of its duration.—Shuckford's Connection, c. 4.

A. M. 1536. A. C. 2168; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 2136. A. C. 3275. GEN. CH. 5. AND 6. TO VER. 13.

of a reconciliation, have fairly entered the lists, and taken the side which they thought most tenable.

Those who espouse the cause of the Greek version, draw up their arguments in this rank and order. They tell us, that the alteration in the Septuagint computation must have been purposely made; because, where letters must necessarily have been added, and where sometimes both parts of a verse, and sometimes two verses together are altered, and so altered, as still to keep them consistent with one another; this, whenever done, must be done designedly, and for no other reason that they can imagine, but rarely a detection of errors in the Hebrew copies.

They tell us, that, though they have no positive proof of such errors in the present Hebrew copies, yet they have good grounds to suspect there are such, because that, before the time of Antiochus, the Jews, while in peace, were so very careless about their sacred writings, that they suffered several variations to creep into their copies; that when Antiochus fell upon them, he seized and burnt all the copies he could come at, so that none, but such as were in private hands, escaped his fury; that, as soon as that calamity was over, those copies which were left, in private hands, the Jews got together, in order to transcribe others from them: and that, from these transcriptions, came all the copies now in use. Now suppose, say they, that these private copies which escaped the fury of Antiochus, but were made in an age confessedly inaccurate, had any of them dropped some numerical letters, this might occasion the present Hebrew text's falling short in its computations: and, to confirm this,

They tell us, that Josephus,¹ who expressly declares, that he wrote his history from the sacred pages,² in his account of the lives of the antediluvian patriarchs, agrees with the Septuagint; and that the Greek historians before Josephus, such as Demetrius Phalerius, Philo the elder, Eupolemus, &c., very accurate writers, and highly commended by Clemens Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, in their calculation, differ very much from the common Hebrew: so that not only Josephus, but these elder historians likewise must have either seen, or been informed of certain Hebrew copies which agreed with the Septuagint, and differed from what have descended to us. In short,

They tell us,³ that the whole Christian church, Eastern and Western, and all the celebrated writers of the church, are on their side; that all the ancient manuscripts have exactly the same computations with the common Septuagint, except here and there a variation or two, not worth regarding; and therefore they conclude, that, as there is a manifest disagreement between the Greek and Hebrew copies in this respect, the mistake should rather be charged upon the Hebrew, than the Septuagint; because, as the Hebrew is thought by some to fall short, and the Septuagint to exceed, in its account of the lives of the patriarchs, it is obvious to conceive, that a fault of this kind may be incurred by way of omission rather than addition.

Those who maintain the authority of the Hebrew text, as the standard and rule of reckoning the years of the patriarchs, oppose their adversaries in this manner.

They tell us⁴ that the Hebrew text is the original, in which the Spirit of God indicted the Scriptures of the Old Testament, and being, consequently, authentic, is better to be trusted than any translation made by men liable to error, as the Seventy interpreters were; and that the Jews, to whom⁵ were committed these oracles of God, used the greatest diligence to preserve them pure and entire, insomuch, that in the course of so many years (as⁶ Josephus testifies in his time) no person durst add, take away, or misplace any thing therein.

They tell us, that no reason can be assigned, why the Hebrew text should be corrupted, but many very probable ones, why the Septuagint might; since, either to exalt the antiquity of their own nation, or to conform to the dynasties of the Egyptians, the Jewish interpreters at Alexandria might falsify their chronology; since, in this very point, there are so many different readings in the Septuagint, and so many errors and mistranslations in it, that⁷ the learned Dr Lightfoot (to whom, as yet, no sufficient reply has been made) has proved it a very corrupt and imperfect version.

They tell us that the Hebrew computations are supported by a perfect concurrence and agreement of all Hebrew copies now in being; that there have been no various readings in these places, since the Talmuds were composed; that, even in our Saviour's time, this was the current way of calculation, since the paraphrase of Onkelos (which is on all hands agreed to be about that age) is the same exactly with the Hebrew in this matter; that St Jerome and St Austin (who were the best skilled in the Hebrew tongue of any fathers in their age) followed it in their writings, and the vulgar Latin, which has been in use in the church above 100 years, entirely agrees with it.

They tell us, that Demetrius, the real historian, (for a Phalerius was none,) lived not before the reign of Ptolemy Philopater, the grandson of Philadelphus, near seventy years after the Septuagint translation was made: that Philo was contemporary with our Saviour, wrote almost 300 years after the said translation, and, living constantly at Alexandria, might very well be supposed to copy from it; that Josephus, though a Jew, and perfectly skilled in the Hebrew language, in many instances, (which learned⁸ men have pointed out) a Demetrius Phalerius was the first president of the college of Alexandria, to which the library belonged, where the original manuscripts of the Septuagint were reposit. He was a great scholar as well as an able statesman and politician; but I doubt Bishop Walton is mistaken, when (in his ninth Preface to the Polyglot Bible) he quotes him as one of those Greek historians whose works might prove the Septuagint computation to be more probable than the Hebrew. The Phalerian Demetrius lived a busy, active life, was a great officer of state, both at home and abroad, and I do not find that ever he wrote any history. It was Demetrius the historian therefore, that the Bishop should have quoted; but he, living in the time that I mentioned, does not make much to this purpose.—Shuckford's Connection, b. 1.

adheres to the Greek in opposition to the Hebrew; and that the fathers of the first ages of the church, though they were very good men, had no great extent of learning; understood the Greek tongue better than the Hebrew; and for that reason gave the preference to the Septuagint computation.

In this manner do the advocates for the Hebrew text defend its authority: and, since it is confessed, there has been a transmutation somewhere, if that transmutation was designedly and on purpose done, (as the adverse party agrees,) it is indifferent¹ whether it was done by way of addition or subtraction: only as it is evident, that the Greeks did compute by numerical letters, whereas it is much questioned, that the Hebrews ever did, the mistake or falsification rather seems to lie on the side of the Greek translators, the very form of whose letters was more susceptible of it.

This is a true state of the controversy, wherein the arguments for the Hebrew computation do certainly preponderate; though the names, the venerable names, on the contrary side, have hitherto been more numerous.^b a The names for the Septuagint computation, which the learned Heidigger, in his History of the Patriarchs, (as he takes them from Baronius;) has reckoned up, are such as these: Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, St Cyprian, Clemens Alexandrinus, Hippolytus, Origen, Lactantius, Epiphanius, Philastrius, Orosius, Cyril, the two Anastasii, Nicephorus, and Suada; to whom he might add several more, as Heidigger suggests, while those among the ancients who contended for the Hebrew calculation, were only St Austin and St Jerome, but men of great skill and proficiency in the Hebrew language.—On the Age of the Patriarchs, Essay 10.

b Such may have been the case 100 years ago: but it certainly is not so now. Dr Hales has proved, with the force of demonstration, that there was originally no difference between the Hebrew genealogies and those of the Greek version: that the computation of Josephus was, in his own time, conformable to both; and consequently that the chronology either of the original Hebrew, or of the Greek version of the Scriptures, as well as of the writings of Josephus, has been since adulterated. That the wilful adulteration took place in the Hebrew rather than in the Greek copies, is rendered highly probable by the reasons which follow. According to Dr Hales, who has bestowed much pains on the question, the Masorites, who published the edition of the Hebrew Bible which is now in use, deducted a century from the age at which each of the patriarchs—Adam, Seth, Enos, Cainan, Mahaleel, and Enoch—had their respective sons whose genealogy is decided by Moses. Their motive for this conduct he states from Ephrem Syrus, who lived about the period at which the change was made, and of whom the learned Cave says (Hist. Lit.)—"From his earliest years he exercised himself in monastic philosophy, and with all his energy so perfected himself in the studies of the more learned sciences, that with ease he could understand the most difficult theorems." Such a man was not likely to write at random of a fact, of which he had the best possible opportunity of ascertaining either the truth or the falsehood. That Ephrem had such an opportunity is unquestionable; for he died A. D. 378; and the corruption of the Hebrew chronology, though it began as early as A. D. 130, appears not to have made any considerable progress for two centuries, Eusebius having found, in the Hebrew copies which he consulted, different accounts of the same times, some following the longer, and others the shorter computations. Now Ephrem affirms, that the Jews "subtracted 600 years from the generations of Adam, Seth, &c., in order that their own books might not convict them concerning the coming of Christ: he having been predicted to appear for the deliverance of mankind after 5500 years.

The reader will look in vain for this prediction in the books of the Old Testament; but the Cabalists found in the first chapter of the book of Genesis, that the world would last 6000 years, because the letter Mem, which stands for 1000, occurs six times in the first verse; because God was six days about the creation; and because with him "a thousand years are but as one day!" after this, they taught that there was to be "a seventh day, or a millenary sabbath of rest." Now it being certainly foretold that the Messiah should be sent in the last times, it appears that the Rabbis inferred his advent to be about the middle of the sixth millenary, or the 5500th year of the world: and to find a pretence for rejecting Jesus as the Messiah, it occurred to them to alter the generations of the patriarchs, by which the age of the world might be known, by subtracting a century from Adam's age until the birth of Seth, and adding the same to the residue of his life, and doing the same thing with respect to the generation of many others of Adam's descendants down to Abraham. By this device their computation showed that Jesus Christ was manifested near the middle of the fifth, instead of the sixth, millenary of the world, which according to them was to last 7000 years; and they said, We are still in the middle of the time, and the time appointed for the Messiah's advent is not yet come.

It might be some entertainment to the reader, could we but give him any tolerable view of the religion,

Those Rabbis, however, were obliged to leave the ages at which Jared, Methuselah, and Lamech had their several sons, as they found them. "Had these been curtailed, like the rest, and the century taken from each added to the subsequent life of the patriarch as is done in other cases, Jared would have survived the deluge 66 years; Methuselah 200 years; and Lamech 95 years. Not daring, therefore, to shorten the lives of these three patriarchs, the Jews were forced to let the original amounts of their generations remain unaltered."

"The tradition of the Jews respecting the age of the world was found also in the Sybilline Oracles; in Hesiod; in the writings of Darius Hystaspes, the old king of the Medes, derived probably from the Magi; and in Hermes Trismegistus, and was adopted by the early Christian fathers. Its prevalence therefore throughout the Pagan, Jewish, and Christian world, whether well-founded, or otherwise, was a sufficient reason for the Jews to invalidate it, by shortening their chronology." This probability is heightened by the testimony of Justin Martyr and Irenaeus, who were both eminent Christian writers of the second century, the former a Samaritan by birth, and well skilled in the Hebrew tongue, as well as in the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures. Now, in his celebrated conference with Trypho the Jew, Justin expressly charges the Rabbis with having expunged many passages out of the Septuagint version; whilst Irenaeus affirms of the same Rabbis, that if they had known the use that was to be made of their Scriptures, they would not have hesitated to burn these Scriptures? The Septuagint version was indeed their abhorrence, because it was generally referred to by the Christian writers; and, in order to bring it as much as possible into disrepute, they instituted, in the beginning of the second century, a solemn fast on the 8th of Tebeth (December) to curse the memory of its having been made! Had it been in their power, there cannot be a doubt, but that, with these dispositions, they would have destroyed that version entirely; but this was not in their power, whilst it was easy to alter the chronology of the Hebrew text, so as to make it suit their own purposes.

"In the course of the Jewish war," says Dr Hales, "until the final destruction of Jerusalem, and expulsion of the Jews from Judea in the reign of Adrian, vast numbers of the Hebrew copies must have been lost or destroyed, besides those that were taken away by the conquerors among other spoils; and the few, that were left, were confined in a great measure to the Jews themselves, as the Hebrew language was not generally understood like the Greek. Whereas, of the Greek copies, even if all, that were possessed by the Hellenistic Jews, not only in Palestine, but throughout the world, had been destroyed, which was far from being the case, yet the copies of the Septuagint, in the possession of the Christians everywhere, rendered any material adulteration of the Greek text, at least in so important a case as that of the genealogies, well nigh impossible." The Jews did however all that they could to deprive the Christians of the arguments with which it furnished them in proof of Jesus of Nazareth being the Messiah promised in the Old Testament. They set up three other Greek versions in opposition to the Septuagint, polity, and learning, of the antediluvian people: but the sacred history, in this respect, is so very short, and the hints suggested therein, so very few, and so very obscure withal, that, during this period, we are left, in a great measure, in the dark. However, we cannot but observe, that it is a mistaken notion of some authors, who affirm, that at the beginning of the world, for almost 2000 years together, mankind lived without any law, without any precepts, without any promises from God; and that the religion from Adam to Abraham was purely natural, and such as had nothing but right reason to be its rule and measure. The antediluvian dispensation indeed was, in the main, founded upon the law of nature; but still it must be acknowledged, that there was (as we showed before) a divine precept concerning sacrifices; that there was a divine promise concerning the blessed Seed; and that there were several other precepts and injunctions given the patriarchs, besides those that were built upon mere reason.

The law of sacrifices (which confessedly at this time obtained) was partly natural, and partly divine. As sacrifices were tokens of thankfulness and acknowledgments, that the fruits of the earth, and all other creatures, for the use and benefit of man were derived from God; they were a service dictated by natural reason, and so were natural acts of worship: a but, as they carried with them the notion of expiation and atonement for the souls of mankind especially as they referred to the Messiah, and signified the future sacrifice of Christ, they were certainly instituted by God, and the practice of them was founded upon a divine command.

It is not to be doubted, ¹ but that Adam instructed his children to worship and adore God, to commemorate his goodness, and deprecate his displeasure; nor can we suppose, but that they, in their respective families, put his instructions in execution; and yet we find, that in framed on the Hebrew text curtailed in the manner which has been already mentioned. The first was that of Aquila, published about A. D. 128—two years before the Seder Olam Rabba; the second by Symmachus; and the third by Theodotion. Aquila was originally a pagan priest, and afterwards a Christian; but being excommunicated for the irregularity of his conduct, he became a Jew, and the most rancorous enemy of the gospel of Christ. By Epiphanius he is charged with wresting the Scriptures, in order to invalidate their testimonies to the claim of our Lord to the character of the Messiah; and, in an unpublished Greek tract in the Bodleian Library, Oxford, it is said—“Wherever you find in the Hebrew (for even there he also obliterated) or in the Greek, the testimonies concerning Christ disguised, know that it was the insidious contrivance of Aquila.”

That he might be able to perform these exploits, Aquila, when he became a Jew, put himself under the tuition of the famous Rabbi Akiba, who, for forty years was president of the Sanhedrim, and had 40,000 pupils, which qualified him to become one of the most subtle and formidable as well as most malignant adversaries of Christianity. It was under the auspices, and by the instigation of this famous Rabbi, that in the year 130, was published or “sealed,” says Dr Hales, “the Seder Olam Rabba, or Jewish curtailed system of chronology; and as Aquila’s version agrees with it, there can be little doubt, but that in this exploit, he was aiding to his master. These facts were undoubtedly known to Usher and other eminent chronologers; but, as Dr Hales observes, “the superstitious veneration for what was called the Hebrew verity, or supposed immaculate purity of the Masorite editions of the Hebrew text, which generally prevailed among the most eminent divines and Hebrew scholars of the last age, precluded all discussions of this nature.” “But the inspection of various editions since, and the copious collations of the Hebrew text with a great number of MSS. collected from all parts of the world, by the laudable industry and extensive researches of Kennicott, De Rossi, and other learned men, have proved that the sacred classics are no more exempt from various readings than the profane.” Errors many and great have crept into the chronology of the Scriptures as well in the original Hebrew as in the Septuagint version; nor have the antiquities of Josephus by any means escaped the confusion with respect to dates, which disfigures the Sacred Oracles from which those antiquities were transcribed.

It is, however, chiefly by the means of some genuine dates and numbers which still fortunately subsist in the work of Josephus, that our author has been enabled to restore the Scripture chronology to its original state. This he has done by strictly following the analytical method of investigation, which, he truly observes, is at least as applicable to chronology as to natural philosophy. The leading elementary date, by reference to which he has adjusted the whole range of sacred and profane chronology, “is (I quote his own words) the birth of Cyrus, before Christ 599, which led to his accession to the throne of Persia, B. C. 559; of Media, B. C. 551; and of Babylonia, B. C. 536; for, from these several dates carefully and critically ascertained and verified, the several respective chronologies of these kingdoms branched off; and from the last especially, the destruction of Solomon’s temple by Nebuchadnezzar, B. C. 586, its correcter date, which led to its foundation, B. C. 1027; thence, to the Flood, B. C. 1648; thence to Abraham’s birth, B. C. 2153; thence to the reign of Nimrod, 2554; thence to the deluge, B. C. 3155; and thence to the creation, B. C. 5411. And this date of the creation is verified, by the rectification of the systems of Josephus, and Theophilus, who was bishop of Antioch, A. D. 169, and the first Christian chronologist.” By the same patient and analytical investigation, Dr Hales has ascertained the genealogies of the antediluvian patriarchs, to have been very different from what they are represented to have been in the present Hebrew; and though it would undoubtedly be presumptuous to say that his system is without errors, it appears to approach so near to perfection, that the following computation, which differs widely from those of the Hebrew, Samaritan, and Septuagint texts at present, must, I think, be acceptable to the reader. It may be considered as the original computation of a This seems inconceivable, though it is an opinion that has been held by men of the highest eminence in the church, as well for learning as for piety. Whilst men possessed no notion of property, what could lead them to offer gifts to God? And though they must have been all conscious of guilt, is it possible that they could hope to propitiate the Creator by taking away the life of his, not their, guiltless creatures. For complete proof of the Divine institution of all kinds of sacrifice, the reader may have recourse to Gleig’s Discourse and Dissertations on the Scriptural Doctrines of Atonement and Sacrifice.—Gleig’s Edit.

the days of Enos, (besides all private devotion) a public form of worship was set up; that the people had the rites of their religion, which God had appointed, fixed, and established; and that, very probably, as Cain built cities for his descendants to live in, so Enos might build temples, and places of divine worship, for his to resort to.⁶

The distinction of clean and unclean animals was another divine injunction under this dispensation. God refers Noah to it, as a thing well known, when he commands him¹ to put into the ark seven pairs of clean, and two of unclean creatures: and² though, in respect of man's food, this distinction was not before the law of Moses, yet some beasts were accounted fit and others unfit for sacrifices from the beginning. The former were esteemed clean, and the latter unclean; and it seems safer to make a positive law of God the foundation of this distinction, than to imagine that men, in such matters as these, were left to their own discretion.

The prohibition of marrying with infidels or idolaters, was another article of this dispensation, as appears from God's angry resentment when the children of Seth entered into wedlock with the wicked posterity of Cain. And, to mention no more, under this period were given those six 'great precepts of Adam' (as they are generally called) whereof the Jewish doctors make such boast; ^b and of these the 1. was of strange worship, or idolatry; the 2. of cursing the most holy name, or blasphemy; the 3. of uncovering the nakedness, or unlawful copulation; the 4. of bloodshed, or homicide; the 5. of theft and rapine; and the 6. of judgment, or the administration of justice in the public courts of judicature. So that, from the very first, 'God did not leave himself without a witness' (as the apostle terms it) but, in one degree or other, made frequent manifestations of his will to mankind.

That government of one kind or other, is essential to the well-being of mankind, seems to be a position 'founded in the nature of things, the relation wherein men, at first, stood towards one another, and the several qualifications in them, which, in a short time, could not but appear. The first form of government, without all controversy, was patriarchal; but this form was soon laid aside, when men of superior parts came to distinguish themselves; when the head of any family either outpowered or outwitted his neighbour, and so brought him to give up his dominion, either by compulsion or resignation. Government, however, at this time, seems to have been placed in fewer hands, than it is now: not that the number of people was less, but their communities were larger, and their kingdoms more extensive, than since the flood;³ insomuch, that it may well be questioned, whether, after the union of the two great families of Seth and Cain, there was any distinction of civil societies, or diversity of regal governments at all. It seems more likely, that all mankind then made but one great nation, living in a kind of anarchy, and divided into several disorderly associations; which, as it was almost the natural consequence of their having, in all probability, but one language; so it was a circumstance which greatly contributed to that general corruption which otherwise perhaps could not so universally have prevailed. And for this reason we may suppose, that no sooner was the posterity of Noah sufficiently increased, but a plurality of tongues was miraculously introduced, in order to divide them into distinct societies, and thereby prevent any such total depravation for the future.

The enterprising genius of man began to exert itself very early in music, brass-work, iron-work, and every science, useful and entertaining, and the undertakers were not limited by a short life. They had time enough before them to carry things to perfection: but whatever their skill, learning, or industry performed, all remains and monuments of it have long since perished.

⁴ Josephus indeed gives us this account of Seth's great knowledge in astronomy, and how industrious he was to have it conveyed to the new world. "Seth, and his descendants;" says he, "were persons of happy tempers, and lived in peace, employing themselves in the study of astronomy, and in other searches after useful knowledge; but, being informed by Adam, that the world should be twice destroyed, first by water, and afterwards by fire, they made two pillars, the one of stone, and the other of brick, and inscribed their knowledge upon them, supposing that the one or other of them might remain for the use of posterity."⁵ But how strangely improbable is it, that they, who foreknew that the destruction of the world should be by a flood, should busy themselves to write astronomical observations on pillars, for the benefit of those who should live after it? Could they think, that their pillars would have some peculiar exemption, above other structures, from the violence

^a These conjectures are without all foundation. The pious family of Seth undoubtedly worshipped God in public as well as in private, from the very beginning; though it was not till the days of Enos that they began to "call themselves by the name of the Lord," or to assume the denomination of "the sons of God," to distinguish themselves from the profane race of Cain.—See Hales's Analysis, &c., vol. ii, p. 34; Bishop Gleig's Edit.

^b The commandments given to the sons of Noah are the same with these. They are an abridgment of the whole law of nature; but have one positive precept annexed to them; and are generally placed in this order. 1. "Thou shalt serve no other gods, but the Maker only of heaven and earth. 2. Thou shalt remember to serve the true God, the Lord of the world, by sanctifying his name in the midst of thee. 3. Thou shalt not shed the blood of man created after the image of God. 4. Thou shalt not defile thy body, that thou mayest be fruitful and multiply, and, with a blessing replenish the earth. 5. Thou shalt be content with that which thine is, and what thou wouldst not have done to thyself, that thou shalt not do to another. 6. Thou shalt do right judgment to every one, without respect to persons. 7. Thou shalt not eat the flesh in the blood, nor any thing that hath life, with the life thereof." This is the heptalogue of Noah, or the seven words, which, as the Jews tell us, were delivered to his sons, and were constantly observed by all the uncircumcised worshippers of the true God.—Bibliotheca Biblica, Occasional Annotations, 15. vol. 1.

"Without government, neither family, nor nation, nor mankind, nor the world, nor the universe, could last." Seneca asserts that, "it (government) is the chain by which the state is held together, it is the vital breath which these numerous thousands of citizens inhale, who would, of their own accord, immediately sink into nothing but an inert mass and easy prey, were that spirit of order withdrawn."

and outrage of the waters? If they believed that the flood prove universal, for whose instruction did they write their observations? If they did not, to what end did they write them at all, since the persons who survive, might communicate their inventions to whom they pleased? The plain truth is, ¹ Josephus, who frequently quotes heathen authors, and Manetho in particular, to this story of Seth's pillars from the pillars of Hermes mentioned in that historian: for, as the Jews had an ancient tradition concerning Seth's pillars, Josephus, in reading Manetho, might possibly think his account misapplied, and thereupon imagine, that he should probably hit on the truth, if he put the account of the one and the tradition of the other together; and this very likely might occasion his mistake.

² The eastern people have preserved several traditions of very little certainty concerning Enoch. They believe, that he received from God the gift of wisdom and knowledge to an eminent degree, and that God sent him thirty volumes from heaven, filled with all the secrets of the most mysterious science. St Jude, it is certain, seems to cite a passage from a prophecy of his; nor can it be denied, but that in the first ages of Christianity, ^a there was a book, well known to the Jews, that went a Joseph Scaliger, in his annotations upon Eusebius's Chronicle, has given us some considerable fragments of it, which Heidegger in his History of the Patriarchs, has translated into Latin, which the curious, if they think proper, may consult: but the whole seems to be nothing but a fabulous collection of some Jew or other, most unworthy the holy patriarch. Tertullian, however, has defended it with great warmth, and laments much, that all the world is not as zealous as himself, in the maintenance of its authenticity. He pretends, that it had been saved by Noah in the ark, from thence transmitted down to the church, and that the Jews, in his days, rejected it, only because they thought it was favourable to Christianity.—Miller's History of the Church; and Saurin's Dissertations. The great objections against this book are, that neither Philo, nor Josephus, (those diligent searchers into antiquity,) make any mention of it; and that it contains such fabulous stories as are monstrous and absurd. But to this some have answered, that such a book there certainly was, notwithstanding the silence of these Jewish antiquaries: and that after the apostle's time, it might be corrupted, and many things added to it by succeeding heretics, who might take occasion from the antiquity thereof, and from the passage of Michael's contending with the devil about the body of Moses, to interpolate many fables and inventions of their own.—Raleigh's History of the World.—That there is still extant a very ancient book called The Prophecies of Enoch is a fact which will admit of no controversy; but it is not from that work, but from another Jewish book called The Assumption of Moses, which, though now lost, was extant in the time of Origen, that the passage about Michael's contention with the devil appears to have been quoted by the apostle St Jude. Of The Prophecies of Enoch Mr Bruce gives us the following account:

"Amongst the articles I consigned to the library at Paris, was a very beautiful and magnificent copy of The Prophecies of Enoch in large quarto: another is amongst the books of Scripture, which I brought home, standing immediately before the book of Job, which is its proper place in the Abyssinian Canon; and a third copy I have presented to the Bodleian Library at Oxford. The more ancient history of that book is well known." The church at first looked upon it as apocryphal, and it was never admitted into any ancient canon of Scripture that I have seen or heard of.

"We may observe that Jude's appealing to the apocryphal books did by no means import, that either he believed, or warranted, the truth of them." No man ever supposed that St Paul warranted the truth of all that Aratus the poet had written, or under his name: but besides that this piece is now generally given up for spurious, there is no need for us to suppose, that St Jude ever quoted any passage out of this, or any other book of Enoch.

³ Enoch was a prophet, we are told, and as such was invested with authority, 'to cry aloud, and spare not, to reprove the wicked, and denounce God's judgments against them; and as he was a good man, it was easy for St Jude to imagine, that he would not sit still, and see the impieties of the people grow so very exorbitant, without endeavouring to repress them, by setting before them 'the terrors of the Lord.' He could not discharge the office of a good man, and a prophet, without forewarning them of the "Lord's coming, with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that were ungodly among them: and because this was his office and duty, the apostle infers, (as by the Spirit of God he might certainly know,) that he did so, though he might not make that inference from any passage in his prophecy; because it is a known observation, that ^b many things are alluded to in the New Testament, which were never perhaps in any book at all.

Of all the strange matters that occur in this period of time, there is nothing which looks so like a prodigy as the longevity of those men who at first inhabited the earth; nor is any event so apt to affect us with wonder, even that he believed that we are the offspring of God in the very sense in which that poet probably taught that we are; but he appealed to him as sufficient authority among the Athenians in support of his own doctrine, that all men have sprung from one origin. It was an argument ad hominem, such as "our Saviour himself often makes use of. You, says he to the Jews, deny certain facts, which must be from prejudice, because you have them allowed in your own books, and believe them there. And a very strong and fair way of arguing it is; but this is by no means any allowance that these books are true. In the same manner you, says St Jude, do not believe the coming of Christ and a latter judgment; yet your ancient Enoch, who, you suppose, was the seventh from Adam, tells you this plainly, and in so many words long ago. And indeed the quotation is word for word the same, in the second chapter of the book. All that is material to say farther concerning the book of Enoch is, that it is a Gnostic book, containing the age of the Emims, Anakims, and Egregores, (descendants of the sons of God, when they fell in love with the daughters of men), who were giants." The editor of Bruce's Travels says, I know not on what sufficient authority, that, "the book in question was originally written in Greek by some Alexandrian Jew;" but I suspect that he confounds with The Prophecies of Enoch, The Assumption of Moses, of which fragments may be found perhaps in different authors, and which was certainly written in Greek. The question, however, is of no importance; for it appears from the summary of its contents given by the editor, that The Prophecies of Enoch, received into the Sacred Canon by the Abyssinian church, are indeed, what he calls them—an absurd and tedious work.—Bruce's Travels, vol. 2, p. 412, ed. 3: Bishop Gleig's Edit.

^b There are many instances in the New Testament of facts alluded to, which we do not find in any ancient books. Thus the contest between Michael and the devil is mentioned, as if the Jews had, some where or other, a full account of it. The names of the Egyptians, James, and Jambres, are set down, though they are nowhere found in Moses' history. St Paul tells us, that Moses exceedingly quaked and feared on Mount Sinai; but we do not find it so recorded anywhere in the Old Testament. In all these cases, the apostles and holy writers hinted at things, commonly received as true, by tradition, among the Jews, without transcribing them from any real book.—Shuckford's Connection, b. 1.

as the disproportion between their lives and ours. We think it a great thing, if we chance to arrive at fourscore, or an hundred years; whereas they lived to the term of seven, eight, nine hundred, and upwards, as appears ^a by the joint testimony both of sacred and profane history. The only suspicion that can arise in our minds upon this occasion, is, that the computation might possibly be made, not according to solar, but lunar years; but this, instead of solving the difficulty, runs us into several gross absurdities.

The space of time, between the creation and the flood, is usually computed to be 1656 years, which, if we suppose to be lunar, and converted into common years, will amount to little more than 127; too short an interval, by much, to stock the world with a sufficient number of inhabitants. From one couple we can scarce imagine, that there could arise 500 persons in so short a time; but suppose them a thousand, they would not be so many as we sometimes have in a good country village. And were the floodgates of heaven opened, and the great abyss broken up, to destroy such an handful of people? were the waters raised fifteen cubits above the highest mountains, throughout the face of the whole earth, to drown a parish or two? This certainly is more incredible than the longest age which the Scriptures ascribe to the patriarchs; besides that, this short interval leaves no room for ten generations, which we find from Adam to the flood; nor does it allow the patriarchs age enough, (some of them, upon this supposition, must not be above five years old,) when they are said to beget children.

It is generally allowed, and may indeed be proved by the testimony of Scripture, that our first fathers lived considerably longer, than any of their posterity have done since; but, according to this hypothesis, (which depresses the lives of the antediluvians, not only below those who lived next the flood, but even below all following generations to this day,) Methuselah, who was always accounted the oldest man since the creation, did but reach to the age of seventy-five, and Abraham, who is said to have died in a good old age, was not completely fifteen.

The patrons of this opinion therefore would do well to tell us, when we are to break off this account of lunar years in the sacred history. If they will have it extended no farther than the flood, they make the postdiluvian fathers longer-lived than the antediluvian, but will be puzzled to assign a reason, why the deluge should occasion longevity. If they will extend it to the postdiluvians likewise, they will then be entangled in worse difficulties; for they will make their lives miserably short, and their age of getting children altogether incongruous and impossible.

From the whole, therefore, we may conclude, that the years whereby Moses reckons the lives of the antediluvians, were solar years, much of the same length with what we now use; and that therefore there must be a reason, either in their manner of life, their bodily constitution, the temperament of the world wherein they lived, or (what is most likely) the particular vouchsafement of God, to give them this mighty singular advantage above us.

Some have imputed this extraordinary length of life in the antediluvians to the sobriety of their living, and simplicity of their diet; that they eat no flesh, and had no provocations to gluttony, which wit and vice have since invented. ¹This indeed might have some effect, but not possibly to the degree we now speak of; since there have been many moderate and abstemious people in all ages, who have not surpassed the common period of life.

Others have ascribed it to the excellency of the fruits, and some unknown quality in the herbs and plants of those days; but the earth, we know, was cursed immediately after the fall, and its fruits, we may suppose, gradually decreased in their virtue and goodness, until the time of the flood; and yet we do not see, that the length of men's lives decreased at all during that interval.

Others therefore have thought, that the long lives of the men of the old world proceeded from the strength of their stamina, or first principles of their bodily constitution; which, if they were equally strong in us, would maintain us, as they think, in being, as long: but though it be granted, that both the strength and stature of their bodies were greater than ours, and that a race of strong men, living long in health, will have children of a proportionably strong constitution; yet, that this was not the sole and adequate cause of their longevity, we have one plain instance to convince us, namely, that Shem, who was born before the deluge, and had in his body all the virtue of an antediluvian constitution, fell 300 years short of the age of his forefathers, because the greatest part of his life was passed after the flood.

The ingenious theorist whom I have quoted, for this reason, imagines, that before the flood, the situation of the earth to the sun was direct and perpendicular, and not, as it is now, inclined and oblique. From this position he infers, that there was a perpetual equinox all the earth over, and one continued spring; and thence concludes, that the equality of the air, and stability of the seasons were the true causes of the then longevity; whereas the change, and obliquity of the earth's posture, occasioned by the deluge, altered the form of the year, and brought in an inequality of seasons, which caused a sensible decay in nature, and a gradual contraction in human life.^b

^b This is a perfectly groundless fancy warranted neither by Scripture nor by philosophy.

“At the creation, the two great lights, the sun and the moon, were ordained, among other uses, to be for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and for years, Gen. i. 11. But seasons and years are produced by this obliquity. If, then, seasons and years existed before the deluge, so must the obliquity. But that they did, is evident from the history; for the duration of time, from the creation to the deluge, is measured by the years of the generations of the patriarchs from Adam to Noah, Gen. v. And when God promised Noah, that ‘while the earth remained, seed-time and harvest, or (spring and autumn), cold and heat, or (winter and summer), and day and night should not cease,’ plainly signifying, that the world should go on after the deluge

^a Manetho, who wrote the story of the Egyptians; Berossus, who wrote the Chaldean history; those authors, who give us an account of the Phœnician antiquities; and among the Greeks, Hesiodus, Hecataeus, Hellanicus, Ephorus, &c., do unanimously agree, that in the first ages of the world, men lived 1000 years. — Burnet's Theory, b. 2. c. 4.

His reasoning, upon this point, is very elegant. "There is no question," says he, "but every thing upon earth, and especially the animate world, would be much more permanent, if the general course of nature was more steady, and more uniform. A stability in the heavens makes a stability in all things below; and that change, and contrariety of qualities which we have in these regions, is the fountain of corruption—the ether in their little pores, the air in their greater, and the vapours and atmosphere that surround them, shake, and unsettle their texture and continuity; whereas, in a fixed state of nature, where these principles have always the same constant and uniform motion, a long and lasting peace ensues, without any violence, either within, or without to discompose them. We see, by daily experience," continues he, "that bodies are kept better in the same medium, (as we call it,) than when they are sometimes in the air, and sometimes in the water, moist and dry, hot and cold, by turns; because these different states weaken the contexture of their parts. But our bodies, in the present state of nature, are put in an hundred different mediums, in the course of a year; the winds are of a different nature, and the air of a different weight and pressure, according as the weather and seasons affect them. All these things are enough to wear out our bodies soon, very soon, in comparison of what they would last, if they were always encompassed with one and the same medium, and that medium were always of one and the same temper."

This is all very pretty: but the author's grand mistake is, that it was not so in the primitive earth. He has no authority to show, that how high soever the waters might swell at the deluge, the centre of the earth gave way 'or the foundations of the round world were shaken.' The earth, no doubt, had, before, as well as after the flood, an annual as well as diurnal motion. ¹ It stood to the sun in the same oblique posture and situation, and was consequently subject to the same seasons and vicissitudes that the present earth is; and if the air was more mild, and the elements more favourable at that time, this we may account the peculiar blessing of God, and not the result of the earth's position to the sun, or any fancied stability in the weather. The truth is, whatever we may attribute to second causes, why bodies that are naturally mortal and corruptible should subsist so long in the primitive ages of the world; yet the true cause of all is to be ascribed to the will of God, who impregnated our first parents with such vigour, and gave their posterity for some time such robust constitutions, as depended not upon the nature of their diet, the stability of the seasons, or the temperature of the air. After the flood, God soon made a sensible change in the length of man's days. For, perceiving the general iniquity to increase again, and thereupon designing to make an alteration in the world's continuance, he hastened the period of human life, that the number of souls he intended to send into the world before the consummation of all things, might have a speedier probation. Man's age accordingly went on sinking by degrees, until a little before David's time, it came to be fixed at what has been the common standard ever since. ² 'The days of our age are threescore years and ten: and though some men be so strong, that they come to fourscore years, yet is their strength then but labour and sorrow, so soon passeth it away, and we are gone.' This is our stated period; and therefore for us, who live in this postdiluvian world, and have the term of our trial so much shortened, the subsequent prayer of the devout Psalmist will always be necessary, always seasonable; 'So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.'

CHAP. I.—Of the Deluge.

THE HISTORY.

God (as we said before) had given mankind a reprimand for an hundred and twenty years; but when he saw that all his lenity and forbearance tended to no purpose, except it was to make them more bold and licentious in their sins, he declared to his servant Noah, that within a short time his resolution was to destroy them, and with them all other creatures upon the face of the earth, by a flood of waters; but ^a assured him, at the same time, that since he had comforted himself better, and approved his fidelity to his Maker, he would take care to preserve him and his family, and whatever other creatures were necessary for the restoration of their species from the general calamity.

To this purpose he gave him orders to build a kind of vessel, not in the form of ships now in use, but rather

^a The words in our translation are, With thee will I establish my covenant: but 1st, by the word covenant, we are not here to understand a mutual compact or agreement, but only a simple and gracious promise, as it is likewise used, Numb. xviii. 19, xxv. 12, and in several other places; which promise, though only mentioned here, was doubtless made before, as may easily be gathered from these words, and some foregoing passages, and from the necessity that Noah should have some such support and encouragement during all the time of his ministry. 2dly. This covenant of God might relate to his sending the promised seed, and redemption of mankind by the Messiah; and in this sense will import, that as the Messiah was to come out of Noah's loins, so the divine providence would take care to preserve him alive. But, 3dly. A learned and right reverend author is of opinion, that this covenant of God relates to his reinstating the earth in its primitive fertility in Noah's lifetime. To which purpose he observes, that as soon as the flood was over, God declares, 'I will not again curse the ground for man's sake;' from which declaration it appears, (says he) 1st, That the flood was the effect of that curse which was denounced against the earth for man's sake; and 2dly, That the old curse was fully executed and accomplished in the flood; in consequence of which, a new blessing is immediately pronounced upon the earth, Gen. xiii. 22. 'While the earth remaineth, seed-time, and harvest, and cold, and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease.'—Poole's Annotations, and Bishop Sherlock's Use and Intent of Prophecy as it had done before, and that the same vicissitude of seasons should prevail as of day and night; how is it possible to represent, that God found it necessary to forewarn Noah that he must expect successive changes of seasons, and vicissitudes of heat and cold, such as he had never yet experienced!"—Hales's Analysis, 8vo, vol. 1, p. 324.—Ed.

inclining to the fashion of a a large chest or ark, and himself prescribed the plan whereby he was to proceed.—That to make the vessel firm and strong, and able to endure the pressure of the waves, the wood most proper for that purpose b should be cypress; and that to prevent the waves from penetrating, or the sun from cracking it, as well as to secure it from vorous, and make it glide more easy upon the water, his business would be, as soon as it was finished, c to pitch it, or rather smear it all over with bitumen, (whereof there was plenty in the country), both within and without; that to make its proportion regular, its length should be six times more than its breadth, and ten times more than its height; and to give it capacity enough, the first of these should be d 300 cubits, that is, in our measure, 450 feet; the second 50 cubits, or 75 feet; and the third 30 cubits, or 45 feet; that to make it commodious for the reception of everything, it was to consist of three stories or decks, of equal height each, and each divided into stalls and apartments proper for the things that were to be put into it; that for turning off the rain, the roof was to be made sloping; that for letting in of light e there were windows to be so and so disposed, or f some other conveniency answerable to them; and that, for the more easy induction of the many things it was to contain, a door or entry-port was to be made in its side.

These were the instructions which God gave Noah, who accordingly went to work, and being assisted with the hands of his family, (for g the rest of the world doubtless derided him,) in the time that was appointed him, and seven days before the rain began to fall, h he had come There are various translations of the word zohar which occurs but once in the whole Bible in this sense. It seems to be derived from a root in the Chaldee, which signifies 'to shine,' or 'give light;' and therefore our version renders it a window; but if so, it must be collective, and mean several windows, because it is not likely that there should be but one in so vast a building, and from the following words, 'in a cubit shalt thou finish it above,' some have supposed, that the window was to be a cubit square, or but a cubit high, which would have been much too small. But the relative 'it' being, in the Hebrew, of the feminine gender, and zohar of the masculine, these two words cannot agree; and therefore the proper antecedent seems to be the 'ark,' which was covered with a roof raised a cubit high in the middle. This, however, in the original, may signify no more than an injunction to build the ark by the cubit, as the common measure, by which the work was to be marked out and directed.—See Universal History; Saurin's Dissertation; and Lamy's Introduction.

f What that other conveniency was, we shall have occasion to show when we come to treat of the word zohar, (which we here render 'window,') in answer to the subsequent objection.

g The Apostle to the Hebrews (xi. 7.) mentions Noah's building the ark as an heroic act of faith: 'By faith Noah,' says he, 'being warned of God of things not seen as yet, moved with fear, prepared an ark, to the saving of his house, by which he condemned the world, and became heir of the righteousness which is by faith;' for we may well imagine, that this work of his was not only costly and laborious, but esteemed by the generality very foolish and ridiculous; especially when they saw all things continue in the same posture and safety for so many scores of years together; whereby Noah, without doubt, became all that while the song of drunkards, and the sport of the wits of the age.—Poole's Annotations. The Mahometans have a tradition, that when he began to work upon this famous vessel, all that saw him derided him, and said, "You are building a ship; if you can bring water to it, you will be a prophet, as well as a carpenter;" but he made answer to these insults, "You laugh at me now, but I shall have my turn to laugh at you; for at your own cost you will learn, that there is a God in heaven who punishes the wicked."—Calmet's Dictionary on the word Noah.

h It is somewhat strange, that the torrent of interpreters should suppose, that Noah was 120 years about this work, when he gives no intimation to that purpose, but sufficient reasons to believe, that he was not near so long as is imagined. It is plain from Scripture that 'he was 500 years old when he begat Shem, Ham, and Japheth,' (Gen. v. 32), and that when he received the command for building the ark, the same sons were married; for the text says expressly, 'Thou shalt come into the ark, thou and thy sons, and thy wife, and thy sons' wives with thee,' (Gen. vi. 18.) So that all the time between the birth and marriage of the said sons must at least be supposed to intervene before the command to build the ark was given; and between the command and the execution of it, must not be so long as is imagined, without a concurrence of miracles, to prevent that part of it which was first built from being rotten and decayed before the last part of it was finished.—Saurin's Dissertation. If the wood was of the nature described in a preceding note, no miracle would be necessary to preserve it during the period, 120 years, employed in building it; and from its immense size, and great tonnage, as shown before, it is not wonderful that so much time should be occupied in its construction. If this was the case, Noah began it in his 480th year; while he was childless; a striking proof of his

a The word thebath, which we render ark, is only read here, and in another place, where Moses, when an infant, is said to have been put into one made of bulrushes, Exod. ii. 3. It is supposed to come from a root which signifies 'to dwell or inhabit;' and may therefore here denote 'a house, or place of abode.' And indeed, if we consider the use and design, as well as the form and figure of this building, we can hardly suppose it to be like an ark or chest, wherein we usually store lumber, and put things out of the way; but rather like a farm house, such as are in several countries, where the cattle and people live all under one roof. As soon as men began to hew down timber, and to join it together, for the purpose of making houses, nothing can be supposed a more simple kind of edifice than what was made rectangular, with a bottom or floor, to prevent the dampness of the ground; a sloping cover or roof to carry off the rain that should fall; stalls and cabins for the lodging of man and beast; and to keep out wind and weather effectually, a coat of bitumen or pitch. Of this kind was this building of Noah's, and may therefore rather be termed a place of abode, than an ark or chest, properly so called.—Le Clerc's Commentary on the Passage.

b The timber whereof the ark was framed Moses calls gopher-wood; but what tree this gopher was, is not a little controverted. Some will have it to be cedar, others the pine, others the box, and others (particularly the Mahometans) the Indian plane-tree; but our learned Fuller in his Miscellanies, has observed, that it was nothing else but that which the Greeks call Kυπαρίσσος, or the cypress-tree; for taking away the termination, cupar, and gopher differ very little in the sound. This observation the great Bochart has confirmed, and shown very plainly, that no country abounds so much with this wood as that part of Assyria which lies about Babylon. And to this we may add the observation of Theophrastus, who, speaking of trees that are least subject to decay, makes the cypress-tree the most durable of all; for which Vitruvius gives us this reason, viz. that the sap, which is in every part of the wood has a peculiar bitter taste, and is so very offensive that no worm or other corroding animal will touch it; so that such works as are made of this wood will in a manner last for ever.—See Universal History; Patrick's Commentary; Bochart's Annotations, b. I. c. 4; and Belford's Scripture Chronology, b. I. c. 9.

c The Arabic translation says expressly pitch it with pitch, but the bitumen (which was plentiful in that country, and as others think intended here) was of the same nature, and served to the same use as pitch, being glutinous and tenacious, and proper to keep things together.—Patrick's Commentary.

d A cubit is the measure from the elbow to the finger's end, containing six hand-breadths, or a foot and a half: so that 300 cubits make exactly 450 feet. There are some, however, who take these for geometrical cubits, every one of which contain six of the common; but there is no need for any such computation, since, taking them for common cubits, it is demonstrable (as will appear hereafter) that there might be room enough in the ark for all sorts of beasts and birds, together with Noah's family and their necessary provision.—Ainsworth's Annotations; and Patrick's Commentary.

A. M. 1656. A. C. 2319; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 2256. A. C. 2155. GEN. CH. vi. 12. TO ix. 20.

pleted the whole. Whereupon God gave him instructions that he should take into the ark every living thing of all flesh, both cattle, and beasts of the field, birds and fowls of the air, and reptiles of all kinds; ^a of the unclean, one pair only, but of the clean seven pair; that when the general desolation was over, they might increase again, and replenish the earth; and that when every thing was thus settled and disposed of, himself and his family should likewise go into the ark, and take up their apartments.

Pursuant to these directions, Noah and his family went into the ark, leaving the rest of the world in their security and sensuality, in the 600th year of his age, much ^b about the middle of September; when in a few days after, ¹ the whole face of nature began to put on a dismal aspect, as if the earth were to suffer a final dissolution, and all implicit faith, both in the divine threatenings and promises: for his eldest son, Japheth, (Gen. x. 21.) was not born till twenty years after, in the 600th year of his age, (Gen. v. 32.); and his second, Shem, two years after, (Gen. xi. 10.) Such is the apostle Paul's description.—By faith, Noah, having been instructed by the divine oracle, concerning things not yet seen, (the ensuing deluge, &c.) moved with fear, prepared an ark, for the saving of his house, or future family, (Heb. xi. 7).—Ed. In what place Noah built and finished his ark, is no less made a matter of dispute. One supposes that he built it in Palestine, and planted the cedars whereof he made it in the plains of Sodom: another takes it to have been built near Mount Caucasus, on the confines of India: and a third in China, where he imagines Noah dwelt before the flood. But the most probable opinion is, that it was built in Chaldea, in the territories of Babylon, where there was so great a quantity of cypress in the groves and gardens, in Alexander's time, that that prince built a whole fleet out of it, for want of other timber. And this conjecture is confirmed by the Chaldean tradition, which makes Nisuthrus (another name for Noah) set sail from that country.—See Universal History, b. 1. c. 1.

^a The distinction between beasts that were clean and unclean, being made by the law, has given some a colour to imagine, that Moses wrote this book after his coming out of Egypt, and receiving the law, but to this it may be answered, that though, with respect to man's food, the distinction of clean and unclean, was not before the law, yet some were accounted fit for sacrifices, and others unfit, from the very first beginning; and then unclean beasts, in this place, must denote such as are rapacious which were not to be offered to God. In short, since the rite of sacrificing was before the flood, we may very well be allowed to suppose that this distinction was also before it; and to suppose farther, that as the rite was undoubtedly of God's institution, so the difference of clean and unclean creatures to be sacrificed, was of his appointment likewise. But there is a farther doubt arising from this passage, and that is—whether there went into the ark but seven of every clean, and two of every unclean species, or fourteen of the first, and two of the last. Some adhere to the former exposition, but others to the latter, which seems to be the natural sense of the Hebrew words, seven and seven, and two and two. Besides, if there were but seven of the clean beasts, one must have been without a mate; and if it be suggested, that the odd one was for sacrifice, it is more than Moses tells us, who, on the contrary, repeats it, that the animals all went in by pairs.—Patrick's Commentary; Poole's Annotations; and Universal History, c. 1.

^b The words in the text are, In the second month; but, for the better understanding of this, we must remember, that the year among the Hebrews, was of two kinds: the one ecclesiastical, which began in March, and chiefly regarded the observation of their fasts and festivals, of which we read Exod. xii. 2. and the other civil, for the better regulating of men's political affairs, which began in September. Accordingly the second month is thought by some to be part of April, and part of May, the most pleasant part of the year, and when the flood was least expected, and least feared: but by others part of October, and things return to their primitive chaos. ^c The cataracts of heaven were opened, the abyss of waters, in the centre of the earth poured out, and the sea, forgetting its bounds, overspread the earth with a dreadful inundation.

Too late does wretched man perceive the approach of his deserved fate: and in vain does he find out means for his preservation. The tops of the hills, the tallest trees, the strongest towers, and the loftiest mountains can give him no relief: it is but a small reprieve a most that they can yield him; for as the waters swell, and the waves come rushing on, hills, trees, towers, mountains, and every little refuge, must disappear with him. Noah himself cannot help him. Though he might now remember his predictions, and so flee to him for succour, yet God has shut the door of the ark, and it cannot be opened: ² and so it shall be to every one, at the last great day, who shall not be found in Christ, the only ark of our salvation.

For forty days and nights together, without the least intermission, did the clouds continue raining; when at length the ark began to float, and to move from place to place as the waves drove it. And though there might be some short cessations afterwards, yet at certain intervals, the rain continued falling, and the waters swelling, till in process of time, the flood began to cover the mountains, and, by a gradual increase, came at last to part of November, a little after that Noah had gathered in the fruits of the earth, and laid them up in the ark: so that the flood came in with the winter, and was by degrees dried up in the following summer. And this opinion seems to be more probable, because the most ancient, and first beginning of the year, was in September; and the other beginning of the year in March, was but a later institution among the Jews: with respect to their festivals and other sacred affairs, which are not at all concerned here.—Poole's Annotations. Dr Hales, however, is of opinion, and from the evidence he has adduced, it seems correctly, that the deluge began in spring, and that the second month was reckoned by the sacred year, which began about the vernal equinox; and as Noah was a year and ten days in the ark, himself, family, and the animals would leave it at the beginning of May, the season most suited for the enjoyment of animal life, and before winter, ample provision would be produced for their support, the heat also would have so dried the moisture from the earth as to make it a healthy and comfortable residence.—See Hales's Anal., vol. 1. 322—332.—Ed.

^c Ovid, who is supposed to have extracted most of the beginning of his Metamorphoses out of the sacred records, has described both the induction and retreat of the waters in a manner very conformable to the original, from whence he had them Their induction thus:—

The south wind quick on moistened wings darts forth,
Its fearful face in piteous darkness shaded;
And as its mighty arm the hanging clouds oppress'd,
A crash is made; dense rains rush down from heaven.
The Ocean-king his trident poised and struck the earth,
Which trembled and laid bare the waters' gulfs.
The rivers boundless rush along the plains;
And long with crops drag trees, and kine, and men,
And hallowed domes, and shrines, and sacred things.

Their retreat thus:—

The clouds he struck, and rains drove to the north,
When earth to heaven was shown and heaven to earth;
The sleepless ocean now can boast a shore,
The channel too contains its brimming streams,
The floods are lulled, the hills seem to arise,
The ground appears, and with the waves' decrease
All parts increase, when now, the long day done,
The hidden trees their naked tops present,
And on their branches bear the clammy clay.

raise its surface fifteen cubits (above twenty-two feet of our measure) higher than the tops of the highest of them.

In this elevation the flood continued until the latter end of March: when, as one friend is apt to remember another in distress, (the Scripture here speaks in the style of men, so God,) reflecting upon Noah, and the poor remains of his creation, floating in the ark, caused a drying north wind to arise, the floodgates of heaven to be stopped, and the eruption of the waters out of the womb of the earth to cease; by which means the deluge began to abate, and the waters subside, so that in a short time, the ark, which must have drawn great depth of water, stuck on a mountain, named Ararat, and there rested; and not long after the tops of other mountains began to appear.

This happened in the beginning of May, when the summer was coming on apace: but Noah, wisely considering, that although the mountains were bare, the valleys might still be overflowed, waited forty days longer before he attempted any farther discovery; and then "opening the window, he let go a raven, as supposing that the smell of dead bodies would allure him to fly a good distance from the vessel; but the experiment did not do; the raven, after several unsuccessful flights, finding nothing but water, returned to the ark again. Seven days after this, he let fly a dove, a bird of a strong pinion, and, from the remotest places always accustomed to come home, and therefore proper to make farther discoveries. But she finding nothing but water likewise, immediately returned to the ark, and was taken in. After this he waited seven days more, and then sent her forth again; and she, in the evening, brought in her mouth an olive branch, the emblem of peace, and a token to Noah that the waters were abated much. Whereupon he waited seven days more, and then let her fly the third time; but she finding the waters gone, and the earth dry, returned no more; so that he was now thinking of uncovering the roof, and going out of the ark himself; but having a pious regard to the divine providence and direction in all things, he waited 55 days longer, and then received orders from God for him and his family to quit the vessel, but to take care at the same time that every other creature should be brought forth with him.

This ended ^bNoah's long and melancholy confinement; which, by a due computation from the time of his going into the ark, to that of his coming out, was exactly the space of a solar year.

CHAP. II.—Difficulties Obviated, and Objections Answered.

How many wise ends the providence of God might have in bringing this destruction upon the earth, it is impossible for us to find out: but even supposing that he had but this one, namely, to rid himself of a generation that was become profligate, and past all hopes of amendment; yet the number of mankind, which, before the ^b Mr Basnage (in his Jewish Antiquities, vol. 2. p. 299.) has given us the calendar of this melancholy year of Noah's confinement.

The Year of the World's Creation, 1656.

- I. September. Methuselah died at the age of 969 years.
- II. October. Noah and his family entered the ark.
- III. November the 17th. 'The fountains of the great deep were broken open.'
- IV. December the 26th. The rain began, and continued forty days and forty nights.
- V. January. All the men and beasts that were upon the earth were buried under the waters.
- VI. February. The rain continued.
- VII. March. The waters remained in their elevation till the 27th, when they began to abate.
- VIII. April the 17th. The ark rested on Mount Ararat.
- IX. May. They did nothing while the waters were retreating.
- X. June the 1st. The tops of the mountains appeared.
- XI. July the 11th. Noah let go a raven, which (as Basnage thinks) returned to him no more.
 - The 18th. He let go a dove, which returned.
 - The 25th. He let go the dove again, which returned with an olive branch.
- XII. August the 2d. The dove went out the third time, and returned no more.
 - I. September the 1st. The dry land appeared.
 - II. October the 27th. Noah went out of the ark with his family. During this long continuance in the ark, the form of prayer, which some oriental writers make Noah to have offered unto God, runs in this manner: "O Lord, thou art truly great, and there is nothing so great as that it can be compared to thee, look upon us with an eye of mercy, and deliver us from the deluge of waters. I entreat this of thee for the love of Adam, thy first man; for the love of Abel, thy saint; for the righteousness of Seth, whom thou hast loved. Let us not be reckoned in the number of those, who have disobeyed thy commandments: but still extend thy merciful care to us, because thou hast hitherto been our deliverer, and all thy creatures shall declare thy praise.—Amen."—Calmel's Dictionary on the words Deluge and Noah.

^a It is very observable, that the words which we render 'window' in vi. 16., and viii. 6. of Genesis, are far from being the same: in the former place, the word is zohar, (the nature of which we shall have a proper occasion to explain) in the latter, it is hhalon, which signifies indeed 'an oval hole' or 'window' in any building, but here is a window of a peculiar denomination. That it was customary among the Jews to have a room in the upper part of their houses set apart for divine worship, in Hebrew called Beth-olijah, or simply olijah, in Greek ὀριώρον, and in Latin oratorium; and that, in this place of prayer, there was always an hhalon, an hole or window, which pointed to the kibla, or place whereunto they directed their worship, is evident from several passages in Scripture. Among the Jewish constitutions, in the code, called Beracoth, there is a certain canon grounded upon this custom, namely, 'That no man shall pray, but in a room where there is an hhalon opening towards the holy city:' and of Daniel it is particularly related, that when he knew that the decree for his destruction was signed, 'he went into the house, and his hhalon, his window being open in his chamber towards Jerusalem, he kneeled upon his knees three times a day, as he did aforetime,' Dan. vi. 10, for that this was not a common window, but one dedicated to religious worship, is plain from the people's discerning, by its being open, that he was at prayers. Nor is it improbable that this window might have some visible sign, either of the name of God, or of the holy city, or of the sanctuary, or the like, inscribed on it; because it is a constant tradition, that these oratories or rooms for prayer were always so made as to have their angles answer to such certain points of the heaven, and to have the mark of adoration so evidently distinguished, that none might mistake it, if they cast but their eye upon the wall. Now, as the practice among the Jews of worshipping in upper rooms, with their faces towards a hole or window in the wall, was never introduced by any positive law, and yet universally prevailed, it is reasonable to believe, that at first it was derived from Noah, and that the windows in their oratories were made in imitation of this hhalon, or point of adoration in the ark.—Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. 2.; Occasional Annotations in the Appendix.

flood, was vastly superior to what the present earth perhaps is capable of sustaining, caused every place to be inhabited, and that none might escape the avenging hand, caused every place to be overflowed. And indeed, if we consider the longevity of the first inhabitants of the earth, and the pretty near equality of their ages (which seem to have been providentially designed for the quick propagation of mankind) we shall soon perceive, that, in the space of 1600 years, mankind would become so numerous, that the chief difficulty would be where we should find countries to receive them. For if, in the space of about 266 years (as the sacred history acquaints us) the posterity of Jacob, by his sons only, (without the consideration of Dinah his daughter) amounted to 600,000 males above the age of twenty, all able to bear arms, what increase may not be expected from a race of patriarchs, living six, seven, eight, or nine hundred years apiece, and some to the 500th year of their lives begetting sons and daughters. For, ¹ if we suppose the increase of the children of Israel to have been gradual, and proportionate through the whole 266 years, it will appear, that they doubled themselves every fourteen years at least; and if we should continue the like proportion through the entire 114 periods (which the space from the creation to the deluge admits) the product, or number of people on the face of the earth at the deluge, would at least be the 100th in a geometric double proportion, or series of numbers, two, four, eight, sixteen, &c., where every succeeding one is double to that before it: and to how an immense sum this proportion would arise, ^a those who know any thing of the nature of geometric progressions, will soon perceive. So that had the antediluvians only multiplied as fast before, as it is certain the Israelites did since the flood, the number of mankind actually alive and existing at the deluge must have been not only more than what the present earth does contain, but prodigiously more than what the whole number of mankind can be justly supposed, ever since the deluge; nay indeed, with any degree of likelihood, ever since the first creation of the world. Upon which account, though this calculation must not at all be esteemed real, or to exhibit in any measure the just number of the posterity of Adam alive at the time of the deluge, yet it certainly shows us how vastly numerous (according to the regular method of human propagation) the offspring of one single person may be; how plentifully each quarter of the world must then have been stocked with inhabitants; and that consequently, to destroy its inhabitants, the inundation must have fallen upon every quarter, and encompassed the whole globe.

And accordingly, if we take the circuit of the globe, and inquire of the inhabitants of every climate, we shall find, ² that the fame of this deluge is gone through the earth, and that in every part of the known world there are certain records or traditions of it; that the Americans acknowledge, and speak of it in their continent; that the Chinese (who are the most distant people in Asia) have the tradition of it; ^b that the several nations of Africa tell various stories concerning it; and that, in the European parts, the flood of Deucalion is the same with that of Noah, only related with some disguise. So that we may trace the deluge quite round the globe, and (what is more remarkable still) every one of these people have a tale to tell, some one way, some another, concerning the restoration of mankind, which is a full proof that they thought all mankind were once destroyed in that deluge. ^c

^a The ingenious Dr Burnet (in his Theory of the Earth, b. 1.) has computed the multiplication of mankind in this method. "If we allow the first couple," says he, "at the end of 100 years, or of the first century, to have left ten pair of breeders (which is no hard supposition) there would arise from these, in 1500 years, a greater number than the earth was capable of containing, allowing every pair to multiply in the same decuple proportion, that the first pair did. But, because this would rise far beyond the capacity of the earth, let us suppose them to increase, in the following centuries, in a quintuple proportion only, or, if you will, only in a quadruple, and then the table of the multiplication of mankind, from the creation to the flood, would stand thus:

Century 1—10	Century 9—655360
2—40	10—2621440
3—160	11—10185760
4—640	12—41943040
5—2560	13—167772160
6—10240	14—671088640
7—40960	15—2684351560
8—163840	16—10737418240

This product is excessively too high, if compared with the present number of men upon the face of the earth, which I think is commonly estimated to between three and four hundred millions; and yet this proportion of their increase seems to be low enough, if we take one proportion for all the centuries. For though in reality the same measure cannot run equally through all the ages, yet we have taken this as moderate and reasonable between the highest and the lowest; but if we had only taken a triple proportion, it would have been sufficient (all things considered) for our purpose.—These calculations, however, are founded on the Hebrew computation, which represents the patriarchs before the flood as having children at an age by much too early. All animals whose lives are of long duration appear not to arrive at puberty till an age of proportional length; something similar or at least analogous is observable in the vegetable kingdom; and according to the computation of the Septuagint version and of the annals of Josephus, the same law regulated the generations of mankind before and after the flood. It was chiefly this consideration that influenced Eusebius to prefer the computation of the Septuagint version to that of the Hebrew text: and it is one of the many cogent reasons which induced Dr Hales to reject the Hebrew chronology as it appears in the present text of the Masorites.

"Dividing human life," says this learned author, "into three periods, it appears from observation and experience, that the generative powers continue in full vigour during the second period.—It is not probable, therefore, that the age of puberty among the antediluvians, who lived to 900 years and upwards, began sooner than at the age of 160 or 170 years, corresponding to 14 or 15 years at present." If, as is probable, there was likewise a longer period, in that age, between the births of children in the same family than is common in the present contracted span of human life, though the earth might have been fully peopled before the deluge, there would be no danger of its being overstocked with inhabitants, as it must have been, according to the calculations of our author, and Dr Burnet from the present Hebrew genealogies.—Bishop Gleig's edition.

^b The Hindoo mythology is in a great measure founded on it; and it is the commencement of their present era or caliyug. Sir William Jones says expressly that, in Hindoo mythology, "the three first avatars, or descents of Veesnho, relate to an universal deluge, in which only eight persons were saved."—See Works of Sir W. Jones, vol. 1. p. 29. 4to, 1799.

^c For the truth of all this, see Bryant's Mythology, Maurice's Indian Antiquities, and Howard's Thoughts on the Structure of the Globe. On the whole controversy concerning the deluge, nothing superior to this last work or more satisfactory is to be found in any language.

A. M. 1656. A. C. 2349; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 2256. A. C. 3155. GEN. CH. vi. 12. TO ix. 20.

Nay, instead of the surrounding globe, we need only turn aside the surface a little, and look into the bowels of the earth, and we shall find arguments enough for our conviction. For ^a the beds of shells which are often found on the tops of the highest mountains, and the petrified bones and teeth of fishes which are dug up some hundreds of miles from the sea, are the clearest evidences in the world, that the waters have, some time or other, overflowed the highest parts of the earth; nor can it, with any colour of reason, be asserted, that these subterraneous bodies are only the mimicry or mock productions of nature, for that they are real shells, the nicest examination both of the eye and microscope does evince, and that they are true bones, may be proved by burning them, which (as it does other bones) turns them first into a coal, and afterwards into a calx.

These considerations bid fair for the universality of the deluge; but then, if we take in the testimony of Scripture, this puts the matter past all doubt. For when we read, that, by reason of the deluge, ¹ "every living substance was destroyed, which was upon the face of the ground, both man and cattle, and the creeping things, and the fowl of the heaven;" that during the deluge, ² "the waters exceedingly prevailed, and all the high hills that were under the whole heavens were covered;" and that, when the deluge was over, God made a covenant with Noah, that ³ "there should be no more a flood to destroy the earth, and to cut off all flesh;" we cannot but conclude, that every creature under heaven, except what was preserved in the ark, was swept away in the general devastation.

And, indeed, unless this devastation was general, we can hardly conceive what necessity there was for any ark at all. ⁴ Noah and his family might have retired into some neighbouring country, as Lot and his family saved themselves by withdrawing from Sodom, when that city was to be destroyed. This had been a much better expedient, and might have been done with much more ease, than the great preparations he was ordered to make, of a large vessel, with stalls and apartments for the reception of beasts and birds. Beasts might have possibly saved themselves by flight; but if they did not,

^a A learned author, who has lately undertaken an examination of revelation, has enforced this argument with a good deal of life and spirit. "Whereas Moses assures us," says he, "that 'the waters prevailed fifteen cubits above the highest mountains,' let the mountains themselves be appealed to for the truth of this assertion. Examine the highest eminences of the earth, and they all, with one accord, produce the spoils of the ocean, deposited upon them on that occasion, the shells and skeletons of sea-fish and sea-monsters of all kinds. The Alps, the Apennines, the Pyrenes, the Andes, and Atlas, and Ararat, every mountain of every region under heaven, from Japan to Mexico, all conspire, in one uniform, universal proof, that they all had the sea spread over their highest summits. Search the earth, and you will find the moose-deer, natives of America, buried in Ireland; elephants, natives of Asia and Africa, buried in the midst of England; crocodiles, natives of the Nile, in the heart of Germany; shellfish never known in any but the American seas, together with entire skeletons of whales, in divers countries; and what is more, trees and plants of various kinds, which are not known to grow in any region under heaven. All which are a perfect demonstration that Moses' account of the deluge is incontestably true."—Part I. Dissertation 2.

Noah might, after the deluge, have furnished himself from other places, which this desolation had not reached; and as for the birds, they, without much difficulty, might have flown to the next dry country, perching upon trees, or the tops of mountains, by the way, to rest themselves if they were tired, because the waters did not prevail upon the earth all on a sudden, but swelled by degrees to their determinate height.

Now, if the swelling of these waters to a height, superior to that of the loftiest mountains, was only topical, we cannot but allow, that unless there was a miracle to keep them up on heaps, they would certainly flow all over the earth; because these mountains are certainly high enough to have made them fall every way, and join with the seas, which environ the earth. All liquid bodies, we know, are diffusive: their parts being in motion, have no tie or connexion one with another, but glide, and fall off any way, as gravity and the air press them; and therefore, when the waters began to arise at first, long before they could swell to the height of the hills, they would diffuse themselves every way, and thereupon all the valleys and plains, and the lower parts of the earth, would be filled all the globe over, before they could rise to the tops of the mountains in any part of it. So vain and unphilosophical is the opinion of those, who, to evade the difficulty of the question, would fain limit or restrain the deluge to a particular country, or countries. For if we admit it to be universal, say they, where shall we find a sufficient quantity of water to cover the face of the earth, to the height that Moses mentions?

Some indeed have thought it the best and most commendable way, to call in the arm of omnipotence at once, and to affirm, That God created waters on purpose to make the deluge, and then annihilated them again, when the deluge was to cease. But our business is not here to inquire what God could work by his almighty power; but to account for this event, in the best manner we can, from natural causes. ⁵ Moses, it is plain, has ascribed it to natural causes, the continued rains for forty days, and the disruption of the great abyss; and the manner of its gradual increase and decrease, wherein he has represented it, is far from agreeing with the instantaneous actions of creation and annihilation.

Others, instead of a creation, have supposed a transmutation of element, namely, either a condensation of the air, ⁶ or a rarefaction of the waters; but neither of these expedients will do: for, besides that air is a body of a different species, and (as far as we know) cannot, by any compression or condensation, be changed into water, even upon the supposition that all the air in the atmosphere were in this manner condensed, it would not produce a bed of water over all the earth, above 32 feet deep; because it appears, by undoubted experiment, that a column of air from the earth to the top of the atmosphere, does not weigh more than 32 feet of water: much less would the spirit of rarefaction answer the purpose, ⁷ because, if we suppose the waters but fifteen times rarer than they naturally are, (as we most certainly do, to make them reach the tops of the highest mountains,) it will be difficult to conceive, how they could either drown man or beast, keep alive the fish, or support the heavy bulk of the ark. The truth is, Moses, in his account of the deluge, says not one word of the transmutation of elements: the forty days' rain, and the disruption of the abyss, are the only causes which he assigns; and these, very likely, will supply us with a sufficient quantity of water when other devices fail.

¹A very sagacious naturalist, observing, that at certain times, there are extraordinary pressures on the surface of the sea, which force the waters outwards upon the shores to a great height, does very reasonably suppose, that the divine power might, at this time, by the instrumentality of some natural agent, to us at present unknown, so depress the surface of the ocean, as to force up the water of the abyss through certain channels and apertures, and so make them a partial and concurrent cause of the deluge. It cannot be denied, indeed, but that the divine providence might, at the time of the deluge, so order and dispose second causes, as to make them raise and impel the water to an height sufficient to overflow the earth; but then, because there must be another miracle required to suspend the waters upon the land, and to hinder them from running off again into the sea, our author seems to give the preference to another hypothesis, which, at the time of the deluge, supposes the centre of the earth to have been changed, and set nearer to the centre or middle of our continent, whereupon the Atlantic and Pacific oceans must needs press upon the subterraneous abyss, and so compel the water to run out at those wide mouths, and apertures, which the divine power had made in breaking up the fountains of the great deep. Thus the waters being poured out upon the face of the earth, and its declivity changed by the removal of the centre, they could not run down to the sea again, but must necessarily stagnate upon the earth, and overflow it, till upon its return to its old centre, they in like manner would retreat to their former receptacles. But the misfortune of this hypothesis is, that besides the multitude of miracles required in it, it makes the deluge topical, and confined to our continent only, whereas, according to the testimony of the Spirit of God in the Holy Scriptures, it was certainly universal.

²A very ingenious theorist seems to be of opinion himself, and labours to persuade others, that the "deluge was occasioned by the dissolution of the primeval earth; the dissolution of the earth by the fermentation of the enclosed waters; the fermentation of the waters by the continued intense heat of the sun; and the great heat of the sun, by the perpendicular position of the axis of the earth to the plane of the ecliptic. But allowing the position of the earth to be what he imagines, ³yet it seems difficult to conceive, how the heat of the sun should be so intense, as to cause great cracks in it, and so raise the waters in it into vapours; or how the waters, thus rarefied, should be of force sufficient to break through an arch of solid matter, lying upon them some hundred miles thick. It is much more probable, that if the action of the sun was so strong, the abyss (which the theorist makes the only storehouse of waters in the first earth) would have been almost quite exhausted, before the time of the deluge: nor can we believe that this account of things is any way consonant to the Mosaic history, which describes a gradual rise and abatement, a long continuance of the flood, and not such a sudden shock and convulsion of nature, as the theorist intends, in which, without the divine intervention, it was impossible for the ark to be saved.

⁴Another learned theorist endeavours to solve the whole matter, and supply a sufficiency of water from the trajectory of a comet. For he supposes, "That, in its descent towards the sun, it pressed very violently upon the earth, and by that means, both raised a great tide in the sea, and forced up a vast quantity of subterraneous waters; that, as it passed by, it involved the earth in its atmosphere for a considerable time; and, as it went off, left a vast tract of its tail behind, which (together with the waters, pressed from the sea, and from the great abyss) was enough to cover the face of the whole earth, for the perpendicular height of three miles." But (to pass by smaller objections) that which seems to destroy his whole hypothesis is this—⁵That it is far from being clear, whether the atmosphere of a comet be a watery substance or not. The observations of the most curious inquirers make it very probable, that the circle about they began to be rarefied, and raised into vapours; which rarefaction made them require more space than they needed before, and finding themselves pent in by an exterior earth, they pressed with violence against the arch to make it yield to their dilatation: and as the repeated action of the sun gave force to these enclosed vapours more and more, so, on the other hand, it weakened more and more the arch of the earth, that was to resist them, sucking out the moisture that was the cement of its parts, and parching and chapping it in sundry places; so that, there being then no winter to close up its parts, it every day grew more and more disposed to a dissolution, till at length, when God's appointed time was come, the whole fabric broke; the frame of earth was torn in pieces, as by an earthquake; and those great portions or fragments, into which it was parted, fell down into the abyss, some in one posture, some in another.

Thus the earth put on a new form, and became divided into sea, and land; the greatest part of the abyss constituting our present ocean, and the rest filling up the cavities of the earth. Mountains and hills appeared on the land, islands in the sea, and rocks upon the shore, so that, at one shock, providence dissolved the old world, and made a new one out of its ruin. See the Universal History, b. I. c. 1. where this extract out of Burnet's Theory is made.

a To have a more perfect idea of the author's scheme, we must remember, that he conceives the first earth, from the manner of its formation, to have been externally regular and uniform, of a smooth and even surface, without mountains, and without a sea; and that all the waters, belonging to it, were enclosed within an upper crust, which formed a stupendous vault around them. This vast collection of waters he takes to have been the great deep, or abyss of Moses, and that the disruption of it was the chief cause of the deluge. For he supposes, that the earth being, for some hundreds of years, exposed to the continual heat of the sun, which, by reason of the perpendicular position, which, as he imagines, the earth's axis then had to the plane of the ecliptic, was very intense, and not allayed by the diversity of seasons, which now keep our earth in an equality of temper; its exterior crust was, at length, very much dried, and when the heat had pierced the shell, and reached the waters beneath it,

A. M. 1656. A. C. 2349; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 2256. A. C. 3155. GEN. CH. vi. 12. TO ix. 20

the body of a comet is nothing but the curling or winding round of the smoke, rising at first to a determinate height, from all parts of the comet, and then making off to that part of it which is opposite to the sun; and if this opinion be true, the earth, by passing through the atmosphere of a comet, ran a greater risk of a conflagration, than a deluge.

These are the several expedients which the wit of men have devised, to furnish a sufficient quantity of water, in order to effect a deluge, but all incompetent for the work. Let us now turn to the sacred records, and see what the two general causes assigned therein, 'the opening of the windows of heaven,' and 'the breaking up of the fountains of the great deep,' are able to supply us with, upon this occasion.

1. By 'the opening of the windows of heaven,' must be understood the causing the waters which were suspended in the clouds, to fall upon the earth, not in ordinary showers, but in floods, or (as the Septuagint translate it) in cataracts,¹ which travellers may have the truest notion of, who have seen those prodigious falls of water, so frequent in the Indies, and where the clouds many times do not break into drops, but fall, with a terrible violence, in a torrent.

How far these treasures of waters in the air might contribute to the general inundation, we may, in some measure, compute from what we have observed in a thunder-cloud,² which in the space of less than two hours, has sometimes poured down such a vast quantity of water, as besides what sunk into the dry and thirsty ground and filled all the ditches and ponds, has caused a considerable flood in the rivers, and set all the meadows on float.

Now, had this cloud (which for ought we know moved forty miles forward in its falling) stood still, and emptied all its water upon the same spot of ground, what a sudden and incredible deluge would it have made in the place? What then must we suppose the event to have been, when the floodgates of heaven were all opened, and on every part of the globe, the clouds were incessantly pouring out water with such violence, and in such abundance, for forty days together?

It is impossible for us indeed to have any adequate conception of the thing,³ though the vast inundations which are made every year in Egypt, only by the rains which fall in Ethiopia, and the like annual overflowings of the great river Oroonoke in America, whereby many islands and plains, at other times inhabited, are laid twenty feet under water, between May and September, may give us a faint emblem, and be of some use to cure our infidelity in this respect.

2. The other cause which the Scripture makes mention of, is the 'breaking up of the fountains of the great deep,' whereby those waters, which were contained in vast quantities in the bowels of the earth, were forced out, and thrown upon the surface of it.⁴ That there is a mighty collection of waters inclosed in the bowels of the earth, which constitutes a large globe in the interior or central part of it; and that the waters of this globe communicate with that of the ocean, by means of certain hiatus, or apertures, passing between it and the ocean, is evident from the Caspian and other seas, which receive into themselves many great rivers, and having no visible outlets, must be supposed to discharge the water they receive, by subterraneous passages into this receptacle, and by its intervention, into the ocean again. The ⁵Mediterranean in particular, besides the many rivers that run into it, has two great currents of the sea, one at the straits of Gibraltar, and the other at the Propontis, which bring in such vast tides of water, that, many ages ago, it must have endangered the whole world, had it not emptied itself, by certain secret passages, into some great cavity underneath. And for this reason, some have imagined,⁶ that the earth altogether is one great animal, whose abyss supplies the place of the heart in the body of the earth, to furnish all its aqueducts with a sufficiency of water, and whose subterraneous passages are like the veins of the body, which receive water out of the sea, as the veins do blood out of the liver, and in a continued circulation, return it to the heart again.

However this be, it is certainly more than probable, (because a matter of divine revelation,) that there is an immense body of water inclosed in the centre of the earth, to which the Psalmist plainly alludes, when he tells us, that ⁷'God founded the earth upon the seas, and established it upon the floods;'⁸ that ⁸'he stretched out the earth above the waters;'⁹ that ⁹'he gathered up the waters as in a bag, (so the best translations have it,) 'and laid up the deep as in a storehouse.'¹⁰ Nay, there is a passage or two in the Proverbs of Solomon, (where Wisdom declares her antiquity, and pre-existence to all the works of the earth,) which sets before our eyes, as it were, the very form and figure of this abyss:¹⁰ 'When he prepared the heavens, I was there; when he set a compass upon the face of the deep, and strengthened the fountains of the abyss.'¹¹ Here is mention made of the abyss, and the fountains of the abyss; nor is there any question to be made, but that the fountains of the abyss here are the same with those which Moses mentions, and which, as he tells us, were broken up at the deluge. And what is more observable in this text, the word which we render compass, properly signifies a circle, or circumference, or an orb, or sphere: so that, according to the testimony of Wisdom, who was then present, there was in the beginning a sphere, orb, or arch, set round the abyss, by the means of which, the fountains thereof were strengthened; for we cannot conceive, how they could have been strengthened any other way, than by having a strong cover or arch made over them.

^a The Caspian sea is reckoned in length to be above 120 German leagues, and in breadth, from east to west, about 90 of the same leagues. There is no visible way for the water to run out: and yet it receives into its bosom near 100 large rivers, and particularly the great river Volga, which of itself is like a sea for largeness, and supposed to empty so much water into it in a year's time, as might suffice to cover the whole earth: and yet it is never increased nor diminished, nor is observed to ebb or flow, which makes it evident, that it must necessarily have a subterraneous communication with other parts of the world. And accordingly, Father Avril, a modern traveller, tells us, that near the coast of Nylam there is in this sea a mighty whirlpool, which sucks in every thing that comes near it, and consequently has a ravine in the earth into which it descends.—See Moll's Geography at the end of Persia in Asia, p. 67; Stillingfleet's Sacred Origins, b. 3. c. 4.; and Bedford's Scripture Chronology, c. 12.

If such then be the form of this abyss, that it seems to be a vast mass or body of water lying together in the womb of the earth, it will be no hard matter to compute what a plentiful supply might have been expected from thence, in order to effect an universal deluge. ¹ For, if the circumference of the earth (even according to the lowest computation) be 21,000 miles, the diameter of it (according to that circumference) 7000 miles; and consequently from the superficies to the centre, 3500 miles; and if (according to the best account) ² the highest mountain in the world (taking its altitude from the plain it stands upon) does not exceed four perpendicular miles in height; then we cannot but conclude, that in this abyss there would be infinitely more water than enough, when drawn out upon the surface of the earth, to drown the earth to a far greater height than Moses relates. In a word, since it is agreed on all hands, that in the time of the chaos, the waters did cover the earth, inasmuch that nothing of it could be seen, till God was pleased to make a separation: why should it be thought so strange a thing, that, upon a proper occasion, they should be able to cover the earth again; ³ especially when the waters above the firmament came down to join those below, as they did at the beginning?

³ Seneca, treating of that fatal day (as he calls it) when the deluge shall come, (for he supposed that the world was to be destroyed alternately, first by water, and after that by fire,) and questioning how it might be effected, whether by the force of the ocean overflowing the earth, by perpetual rains without intermission, by the swelling of rivers, and opening of new fountains, or (what he rather supposes) by a general concourse and combination of all these causes, concludes his inquiry at last with these remarkable words, "There are vast lakes," says he, "which we do not see, much of the sea which lies hidden and concealed, and many rivers which glide in secret; so that there may be causes of a deluge on all sides, when some waters flow under the earth, others flow round about it, and being long pent up, may overwhelm it. And as our bodies sometimes dissolve into sweat, so the earth shall melt, and, without the help of other causes, shall find in itself what shall drown it.—There being in all places, both openly and secretly, both from above and from beneath, an eruption of waters ready to overflow and destroy it."

a If we measure mountains from the plain on which they stand, as proposed by the learned author, the above will be found rather to exceed than to be below the truth; as no mountain has yet been discovered of such an height. If, however, we measure them from the level of the sea, which is the proper method, it will be found that there are many which exceed this height. When our author wrote, the Peak of Teneriffe was esteemed the highest mountain in the world, but subsequent discoveries have completely disproved that opinion. The English mile contains 5280 feet, so that the Peak of Teneriffe being 12,672 feet above the level of the sea, was little more than two miles high. In the Andes, in South America, however, there are mountains which far exceed this in height; as, the Sorata, 25,400 feet, the

But whatever solutions we may gather, either from sacred or profane authors, it seems necessary, after all, to call in the divine power to our assistance. ⁴ For though the waters which covered the earth at the creation might be sufficient to cover it again; yet how this could be effected by mere natural means, cannot be conceived. Though the waters, suspended in the clouds, might fall in great torrents for some time, yet, when once their store was exhausted, (as at this rate it could not last long,) nothing but an almighty voice could have commanded a fresh supply of forty days' continuance from those other planetary spaces where he had settled their abode; and though the subterraneous stores did certainly contain a fund sufficient to complete the deluge, yet there wanted on this occasion an almighty hand, either to break down the arch which enclosed the abyss, or by some secret passages to force the waters out of it upon the surface of the earth; and so stopping the reflux, suspend them for such a determinate time, at such an elevation. There needed some almighty hand, I say, to do this: and accordingly we may observe, that though Moses makes mention of two natural causes that might be conducive to the work, yet he introduces God as superintending their causes, and assuming indeed the whole performance to himself: for 'behold I, even I, do bring a flood of waters upon the earth, to destroy all flesh wherein is the breath of life, from under heaven, and every thing that is on the earth shall die.'

Thus, with the help and concurrence of God, we have found a sufficient quantity of water for the destruction of the old world: let us now consider the make and capacity of the vessel wherein the several animals that were to replenish the new were to be preserved.

⁵ Could we but imagine, that by some strange revolution the whole art of shipping should come to be lost in this part of the world, and that there happened to remain such a short account of one of our largest ships (the Royal Anne, for instance) as that it was so many feet long, broad, and deep; could contain in it some hundreds of men, with other living creatures, and provisions for them all during several months; and that the strength of it was such, that it was not broken in pieces all the time that the great storm endured; would it not be very pleasant for any one to conclude from hence, that this ship, according to the description of it, was nothing but an oblong square, without any more contrivance than a common chest made by the most ignorant joiner? And yet such are some men's inferences when they talk of this noble structure.

Moses indeed makes mention of little else but the dimensions of the ark, its stories, and capacity to hold the things to be placed in it; but it does not therefore follow, but that it might have the convexity of a keel, (as many large flat-bottomed vessels have,) as well as a prow, to make it cut the waters more easily. The design of the vessel however was not to make way, (as they call it at sea,) but to preserve its inhabitants; and this it was more capable of doing (as ^a may be proved to a demonstration) than if it had been built according to the most modern model, even supposing the waters, from the first to the last, to have been never so boisterous. But this they were not: whatever storms and convulsions there might be in particular places, when the floodgates of heaven were at first opened, and the fountains of the great deep broken up, (and then the ark was not afloat,) the sacred text takes no notice of any rough weather till after the 150 days of the flood's gradual increase, when, upon the ceasing of the rains from above, and the waters from beneath, God sent forth a strong driving wind, but then the ark was at rest. So that all the time that the ark was afloat, or (as the Scripture expresses it) while it 'went on the face of the waters,' the winds were asleep, and the weather, though rainy, was free from all storms and angry commotions. Upon the whole, therefore, we may conclude, that, be the structure of the ark what it will, it was certainly suited both to the burden it was to carry, and the weather it was to live in; and on this, and sundry other accounts, ^b upon experiment, perhaps it may be found to be the most complete and perfect model that ever was devised.

Himmani, 24,250, or between four and five miles above the level of the sea. The highest mountains in the world yet discovered, are in the Himalayan range, between Hindostan and Thibet, in Asia; the highest peak of which is 29,000 feet, or between five and six miles above the level of the sea. In the same range there are the Dhawalaghiri, 28,104 feet, Swetachar, 25,261 feet, and various others above 20,000 feet.—Ed.

Had we never seen a ship, and should be told what a number of men, and what a quantity of provision and merchandise one of the largest rates will carry, it would seem no less incredible to us than what Moses tells us of the things which were contained in the ark. The ark, according to his account, was 300 cubits in length, 50 in breadth, and 30 in height; and if we suppose the cubit, here mentioned, at the lowest computation, to be but a foot and a half long, yet was the length of it (according to that proportion) 450 feet, the breadth 75, and the height 45; and consequently the whole capacity 1,580,750 cubical feet, which was space enough, in all conscience, to receive every thing, and much more than every thing that was to be contained in it. For it appears from the sacred text, that the form of the ark was rectangular; ¹ and being intended only for a kind of float to swim above the water, the flatness of its bottom did render it much more capacious. It appears from the same text, that this ark consisted of three stories, and the whole height of it being 45 feet, it may well be supposed that this height was equally divided among the three stories, and so each story was 15 feet high, only deducting a foot and a half, or one cubit, for the slope of the roof, or the cover of the upper story. ² It is likewise pretty well agreed by interpreters, that the lowest story was appointed for four-footed animals, as most commodious for them; the middle story for their provender, and what they were to live upon; and the upper story partly for the birds, and what they were to eat, and partly for Noah and his family, together with their utensils: and that each of these stories was spacious enough to receive what was to be put therein, will appear to any one who will give himself the trouble ^c of making a geometrical calculation.

He who looks upon the stars, as they are confusedly scattered up and down in the firmament, will think them to be (what they are sometimes called) innumerable, and above the power of all arithmetic to count; and yet, when they are distinctly reduced to their particular constellations, and described by their several places, magnitudes, and names, it appears, that of those which are visible to the naked eye, there are not many more than 1000 in the whole firmament, and few more than half so many (even taking in the minuter kinds of them) to be seen at once in any hemisphere. And in like manner, he who should put the question, How many kinds of beasts or birds there are in the world? would be answered, even by such as in other respects are knowing and learned enough, that there are so many hundreds of them as cannot be enumerated; whereas, upon a distinct

^c Buteo has plainly demonstrated, that all the animals contained in the ark could not be equal to 500 horses; (the learned Heidegger, from Temporarius, makes them 400 oxen;) and yet it is not to be questioned, but that a building very near as long as St Paul's church, and as broad as the middle isle of that church is high within, is capable of affording stabling for such a number of horses.—See Dr Bundy's translation of Lamy's Introduction. Kircher (in his Ark of Noah, c. 8.) has given us large calculations of the dimensions of the ark, and from thence concludes, that this vessel was capacious enough to receive, not only Noah and his family, all other creatures and their food, but even an entire province likewise. Wilkins, (in his Essay towards a Real Character), and from him Wells (in his Geography of the Old Testament) have both entered into a large detail of things, and given us an exact and complete idea of the capacity of the ark, and of its proportion, together with what it might contain. Le Peletier (in his Essay on the Ark of Noah) follows another English author, Bishop Cumberland, who, in his Discovery of the weights and measures of the Jews, has proved, that the ancient cubit of the Jews was the old derah of Memphis; whereupon Peletier allows 1,781,377 cubical feet of Paris for the whole contents of the ark, so that it might hold (as he pretends) 42,413 tons of lading. But a certain anonymous author has published a dissertation upon the same principles, wherein he compares the ark to our modern ships, and computes its measure according to the tons it might contain, and thereupon makes it larger than forty ships of 1000 tons each.—See Dissertation, Historical, Chronological, Geographical, &c. d. 2; Journal of Paris for January, 1712, vol. 51. p. 9.

^a For let us suppose, that without any addition of art, it was nothing more than an oblong square, whose length was sextuple to the breadth, and decuple to the height; it is demonstrable, that a piece of wood of that proportion being lighter than the water, will be always supported by it. For instance, take a plank of oak exactly square, let it be one foot broad, six feet long, and seven or eight inches thick, answering the proportion of the ark; there is nobody, I believe, will say, that any waves or winds will be strong enough to break this piece of timber, notwithstanding its right angles. Now, let any solid of this fashion be multiplied in a decuple, centuple, or milleuple proportion, and let the force of the waves, and the invasive power of the wind, be multiplied also with it in the same proportion, the resistance of a rectangular solid (which is perfectly impenetrable, and exactly the case of the ark) will be proof against any given force whatever.—Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. 1.; Occasional Annotations, 13.

^b About the beginning of the last century, Peter Janson, a Dutch merchant, caused a ship to be built for him, answering in its respective proportions, to those of Noah's ark, the length of it being 120 feet, the breadth of it 20, and the depth of it 12. At first this ark was looked upon no better than as a fanatical vision of this Janson, (who was by profession a Menonist,) and, whilst it was building, he and his ship were made the sport of the seamen, as much as Noah and his ark could be. But afterwards it was found that ships built in this fashion were, in the time of peace, beyond all others most commodious for commerce; because they would hold a third part more, without requiring any more hands, and were found far better runners than any made before.—Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. 1.

inquiry into all such as are yet known, or have been described by credible authors, it will appear, that they are much fewer than is commonly imagined, ¹not an 100 sorts of beasts, and not 200 of birds.

And yet, out of this number, as small as it is, we must except all animals that are of equivocal generation, as insects; all that are accustomed to live in water, as fish and water-fowl; all that proceed from a mixture of different species, as mules; and all that, by changing their climate, change their colour and size, and so pass for different creatures, when in reality they are the same. We must observe farther, that all creatures of the serpentine kind, the viper, snake, slow-worm, lizard, frog, toad, &c., might have sufficient space for their reception, and for their nourishment in the hold or bottom of the ark, which was probably three or four feet under the floor, whereon the beasts are supposed to stand: and that the smaller creatures, such as the mouse, rat, mole, &c., might find sufficient room in several parts of the ark, without having any particular places or cells appointed for them: so that the number of the several species of animals to be placed in the first, or lowest story, upon the foot of this deduction, stands thus :

Beasts which live on Hay.		On Fruits and Roots.	On Flesh.
Horse	Stone-buck	Hog	Lion	Stout
Ass	Shamois	Baboon	Bear	Weasel
Camel	Antelope	Ape	Tiger	Castor
Elephant	Elk	Monkey	Pard	Otter
Bull	Hart	Sieth	Ounce	Dog

Now, concerning these creatures God gives Noah this injunction; ²“Of every clean beast thou shalt take to thee by sevens, the male and the female; and of beasts that are not clean, by two, the male and the female. Taking the words then in their highest acceptation, namely, that Noah was to receive into the ark one pair of every species of unclean animals, and seven pair of every species of clean; yet, considering that the species of unclean animals, which were admitted by pairs only, are many in comparison of the clean, and the species of large animals few in comparison of the smaller; we cannot but perceive (as by a short calculation it will appear) that this lower story, which was ten cubits high, three hundred long, and fifty broad, that is, 225,000 solid feet in the whole, would be capable of receiving with all manner of conveniency, not only all the sorts of beasts that we are acquainted with, but probably all those other kinds which are any where to be found under the copes of heaven.

It is a pretty general opinion, and what seems to be founded on Scripture, that before the flood, both men, beasts, and birds fed only upon fruits and vegetables. ³“Behold I have given you every herb,” says God, “bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree in which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed, to you it shall be for meat; and to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is life; I have given every green herb for meat:” ⁴ Nor do there want instances in history of some very ravenous creatures that have been brought to live upon other kind of food than flesh. So that there was no necessity for Noah’s providing so many supernumerary sheep (as some would have it) to feed the carnivorous animals for a whole year. ⁵ The same divine providence which directed all the animals, of whatever country, to make towards the ark, which took from them their fierceness, and made them tame and gentle upon this occasion, might likewise beget in them a loathing of flesh, (supposing they eat it before,) and an appetite for hay, corn, fruits, or any other eatables that were most obvious in this time of distress. And as they were shut up, and could not spend themselves by motion, but might have their stomachs palled with the continued agitation of the vessel, they may well be supposed to stand in need of less provision than at other times.

If then (to make our computation) we should say, that ⁵ all the beasts in the lower story of the ark were equal, in their consumption of food, to 300 oxen (which is more by a great deal than some calculations have allowed,) that 30 or 40 pounds of hay are ordinarily sufficient for an ox for one day; and that a solid cubit of hay, well compressed, will weigh about 40 pounds; then will this second story, being of the same dimensions with the other, that is, 225,000 solid feet, not only allow a space for a sufficient quantity of hay, but for other repositories of such fruits, roots, and grain, as might be proper for the nourishment of those animals that live not upon hay; and for such passages and apertures in the floor as might be necessary for the putting down hay and other provender to the beasts in the lower story.

Upon the whole therefore it appears, that the middle

a It is not to be denied, but that several learned men have taken great pains to provide flesh for the carnivorous animals shut up in the ark, when it is beyond all controversy that the stomachs of such animals are fitted for the digestion of fruits and vegetables: that such food would be more salutary both for them and their keepers, and would create a less demand of drink throughout the course of so long a confinement; and yet there is not the least foundation from the text to suppose, that any such provision was made for creatures of such an appetite, but several instances in history do show, that even the most rapacious of them all may be brought to live upon other diet than flesh. Thus Philostratus, in his Apollonius, b. 5, tells us of a lion in Egypt, which, though it went into the temple constantly, would neither lick the blood of sacrifices, nor eat any of the flesh when it was cut in pieces, but fed altogether on bread and sweet-meats; and Sulpitius Severus [Dial. 1. c. 7.] gives us this account of a monk of Thebas. “When we came to the tree, whither our courteous host led us, we there perceived a lion, at the sight of which I and my guide began to tremble; but as the holy man went directly up to it, we, though in no small fright, followed after. The beast at our approach modestly retired, and stood very quiet and still, while the good man gathered it some branches of apples, and as he held them out, the lion came up and eat them, and so went off.” The like story is told by Placcas in his Description of the Holy Land, c. 13, of some lions beyond the river Jordan, whom an Anchorite, named Iberus, fed with pulse and crusts of bread; and to the animals in the ark, feeding in this manner, the prophet Isaiah, speaking of the times of the Messiah, (ch. xi. 6, 7.) is supposed by our author to allude. “The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard lie down with the kid, and the calf, and the young lion, and the fating together, and a little child shall lead them; and the cow and the bear shall feed, their young ones shall lie down together, and the lion shall eat straw with the ox.”—Heidegger’s History of the Patriarchs, Essay 17.

story of the ark was likewise large enough to hold all that was requisite to be put therein: and as for the third and upper story, there can no manner of doubt be made, but that it was sufficient to hold all the species of birds, even though they were many more than they are generally computed. The accurate Bishop Wilkins^a has divided them into nine sorts, and reckons them to be 195 in the whole, but then the greatest part of them are so very small that they might well enough be kept in partitions or cages piled one upon another. The food necessary for their sustenance would not take up any great proportion of room, and the remainder of the story would make a commodious enough habitation for Noah and his family, together with little closets and offices, wherein to dispose of their several domestic matters and utensils.

Upon the whole inquiry then, says the same learned prelate, it does, of the two, appear more difficult to assign a sufficient number and bulk of necessary things to answer the capacity of the ark, than to find sufficient room in it for the convenient reception of them; and thereupon he truly, as well as piously, concludes,¹ "That had the most skilful mathematicians and philosophers been set to consult what proportions a vessel designed for such an use as the ark was, should have in the several parts of it, they could not have pitched upon any other more suitable to the purpose than these mentioned by Moses are; insomuch, that the proportion of the ark (from which some weak and atheistical persons have made some poor efforts to overthrow the authority of the sacred Scriptures) does very much tend to confirm and establish the truth and divine authority of them. Especially, if we only consider, that in these days men were less versed in arts and sciences; at least, that the ark was, in all probability, the first vessel of any bulk that was made to go upon the water: whence the justness of the proportion observed in its several parts, and the exactness of its capacity to the use it was designed for, are reasonably to be ascribed, not to bare human invention and contrivance, but to the divine direction, expressly given to Noah by God himself, as the sacred historian acquaints us."

Thus we have placed the several kinds of creatures in the ark, and furnished them with a competent stock of provision.

And now, if it should be asked, How came they all thither? the reply in that case will be this—² That the country of Eden is very reasonably supposed by learned men to be next adjacent to the garden of that name, from whence Adam was expelled; and that, as all early accounts of that country point it out to us, as one of the most fruitful and delicious regions in the earth, (though now greatly changed,) there is no reason to imagine that Adam sought for any habitation beyond it. There, according to many concurring circumstances, was this famous ark built; there is gopher-wood (very reasonably supposed to be cypress) found in great abundance; there is asphaltus, wherewith the ark, to defend it from the impression of the waters, was daubed and smeared both within and without; and not far from thence is mount Ararat, where the ark as the waters began to abate, is known to have rested; and in this situation, there is not any reason to imagine, that any one species of animals could be out of Noah's reach.³ There they were all natives of the same country, and he perhaps, some time before the flood, might have tamed some of every kind, so that, when the deluge came on, they might easily be brought to the ark, and every one ranged in its proper place, before that Noah shut it up.

To these perhaps may be added some exotic birds; but as the number of these is but small, so we may observe the carnivorous, which is the largest species, that they were reputed unclean, and consequently but two of each sort admitted into the ark.—Bedford's Scripture Chronology, 2, 12.

But now that they are all shut up, what shall we do for air to keep them alive, or for light to direct them in what they are to do? Mention indeed is made of a window, left in the upper part of the ark; but this is said to be no more than a cubit square, and what is this in proportion to so vast a fabric? Either, therefore, we must devise some relief for them in this exigence, or we shall soon find the poor remains of the creation in utter darkness, and in the shadow of death.

⁴ As the word Zohar, which we render window, is never mentioned in the singular number through the whole compass of the Bible, but only this once, it perhaps may be no very easy thing to find out its true signification. Whether the LXX. interpreters understood the meaning of it; whether they knew, in the Greek language, any word capable of expressing it; or whether they might think it of so sacred a nature, as not proper to be published at all; but so it is, that they prudently have omitted it in their translation, and will have the precept or direction, which God gives Noah, to mean no more than that he should finish the ark, by closing it on the top, and compacting it well together.

The word has its original from a verb which signifies to burn, or shine like oil; and indeed wherever it occurs (as it sometimes occurs in the dual number,) it always signifies some bright and luminous body: and accordingly some of the Jewish doctors were of opinion, that this must have been a kind of precious stone or carbuncle, which was hung up in the midst of the ark, to give light all around: and to this purpose R. Levi tells us, that "during the whole 12 months that Noah was shut up in the ark, he needed neither the light of the sun by day, nor the light of the moon by night; for there was a jewel belonging to him which he hung up in the ark; and as it waxed dim, he knew that it was day, but as its lustre was more intense he knew that it was night." But this opinion is not well founded: because such authors as have written best upon the qualities of precious stones, do all agree, that (whatever the ancients may say,) there is no such thing as a night-shining carbuncle to be found in nature.

That it is possible to make a self-shining substance, either liquid or solid, the hermetical phosphor of Baldwinus, the aerial and glacial noctilucas of Mr Boyle, and several other preparations of the like sort, together with the observations of the most accurate philosophers upon the production and propagation of light, and the prodigious ejaculation of insensible effluvioms, are sufficient demonstration. The most surprising substance of this kind was the pantarba of Jarclus, "which shone in the day as fire, or as the sun, and at night, did discover a flame or light, as bright as day, though not altogether so strong; which was, in short, of that fiery and radiant nature, that if any one looked on it in the daytime, it would dazzle the eyes with innumerable gleams and coruscations;" nor can we well doubt but that Noah, who (as oriental traditions say) was a profound philosopher; who was certainly a person of much longer experience than any later liver can pretend to; (and what is more) was under the peculiar favour and direction of God, perceiving the necessity of the thing, should be equally able to prepare some perpetual light, which should centrally send forth its rays to all parts of the ark, and by its kind effluvioms, cherish every thing that had life in it. Now, if this be allowed, (and this is more consonant to the letter of the text ^a than any other interpretation that has hitherto been advanced,) then will all the difficulties, which either are, or can be raised about the manner of subsistence, in a close vessel, by creatures of so many different species, vanish immediately. But, if it is not allowed, then it is impossible without admitting a whole train of miracles, to give the least account, how respiration, nutrition, motion, or any other animal function whatever, could be performed in a vessel so closely shut up; and therefore it is the safest to conclude that, according to the divine direction, there must have been something placed in the ark, which by its continual emanation, might both purify and invigorate the included air) might correct and sweeten all noxious vapours, and exhalations; and, like the sun, send such a vivifying light, that nothing should die that was within the ark, that is, so far as the beams thereof did reach.

Thus we have rescued Noah and his family from the danger of suffocation in their confinement, by the supply of a vicarious light to purify the air and dispel all vapours, as well as enable them to go about their work: but now that the waves swell, and the vessel mounts on high, even above the top of the highest hills under heaven, they run into another quite different danger, namely, that of being starved to death, amidst the colds, and extreme subtilty of the air, in the middle region, wherein no creature can live. ¹ But the middle region of the air, we ought to remember, is not to be looked upon as a fixed point, which never either rises or falls. It is, with respect to us, more or less elevated, according to the greater or less heat of the sun. In the cold of winter it is much nearer to the earth, than in the warmth of summer; or, (to speak more properly) the cold which reigns in the middle region of the air during the summer, reigns likewise in the lower region during the winter. Supposing the deluge then to out-top the highest mountains, it is evident, that the middle region of the air must have risen higher, and removed to a greater distance from the earth and waters; and, on the contrary, that the lower region must have approached nearer to both, in proportion as the waters of the deluge increased or decreased; so that upon the whole, the ark was all alone in the lower region of the air, even when it was carried fifteen cubits above the highest mountains; and the men and beasts which were enclosed in it, breathed the same air, as they would have done on earth, a thousand or twelve hundred paces lower, had not the deluge happened.

But during this whole course of the ark, since Noah was shut up in so close a place, where he was not capable of making any observations, where indeed he could see neither sun, moon, nor stars, for many months, it may very well be wondered, how he could possibly have any just mensuration of time, had we not reason to suppose, that he certainly had within the ark a chronometer of one kind or other, which did exactly answer to the motion of the heavens without. The invention of our present horological machines indeed, and particularly of the pendulum watch, (which is the most exact corrector of time,) is but of modern date; but it does not therefore follow, but that the same or other equivalent pieces of art might, in former ages, have been perfectly known to some great men. Suppose that Mr Huygens, or some other, was the inventor of pendulums in these parts of the world, yet it is more than probable, that there was a pendulum clock made many years before at Florence, by the direction of the great Galileo; and that, long before that, there was another at Prague, which the famous Tycho Brahe made use of, in his astronomical observations. And therefore, unless we fondly imagine, that we postdiluvians have all the wit and ingenuity that ever was, we cannot but think, that Noah, who not only had long experience himself, but succeeded to the inventions of above 1600 years, which, considering the longevity of people then, were much better preserved than they can be now,) was provided with horological pieces of various kinds, before he entered the ark. Or, if we can suppose him destitute of these, yet what we have said of the zohar, is enough to evince, that by the observation of that alone, there could be no difficulty in distinguishing the nights from the days, and keeping a journal accordingly.

^a P. Lamy, to evade some difficulties that he could not so well solve, tells us, that the form of the ark, is so little ascertained by Moses, that every one is left to his own conjectures concerning it; and therefore he supposes, that as the ark was divided into three stories, or floors, and the word Zohar, which we translate window, signifies, splendour, light, noon, &c., the whole second story (in which he places the animals) was quite open all round except some parts, which were grated to hinder the birds from flying in and out; otherwise, he cannot conceive how they could have had sufficient light, and air, and a free passage for it, to prevent stagnations, and many other inconveniences which, upon this supposition, would have been removed. The lower story indeed was included within wooden walls, and well guarded with pitch, as being all under water; but the two upper stories, being above water, were either entirely open, or secured with lattices and grates; and the top or open parts, covered with goat skins, or sheep skins, sewed together, as the tabernacle afterwards was, which Noah could easily let down, or roll up, according as rain, or storm, or a want of air, made it necessary. And then, as for keeping the beasts clean, he supposes, that the stalls were so open and shelving at the bottom, that water might have been let in high enough to have washed the feet of the cattle, and to have cleansed the stalls of itself.—See his Introduction to the Holy Scriptures, b. 1. c. 3; and Bedford's Scripture Chronology, c. xi. But all this is pure imagination, and inconsistent with the notion which the sacred history gives us of it.

But now, that the flood subsides, and the ark is landed, and all its inhabitants are to disembark, how can we suppose, that several of the animals shall be able to find their way from the mountains of Armenia, into the distant parts of the West Indies, which (as far as we can find) are joined to no other part of the known world, and yet have creatures peculiar, and such as cannot live in any other climate? This is a question that we must own ourselves ignorant of, ¹ in the same manner, as we pretend not to say, by what means that vast continent was at first peopled. But by what method soever it was that its first inhabitants came thither, whether by stress of weather, or designed adventure, by long voyages by sea, or (supposing a passage between one continent and another) by long journeyings by land, it is plain, that by the same means, some creatures at first might have been conveyed thither: and as their number at that time could be but small, we may suppose that, by a promiscuous copulation with one another, they might beget a second sort, which in process of time, the nature and temperature of the climate might so far alter, as to make them pass for a quite different species, and so affect their constitution as to make them live not so commodiously in any other climate. To convey either men or beasts, all on a sudden, from the warmest parts of Africa, to the coldest places in the north, would be a probable means to make them both perish; but the case would not be so, if they were to be removed by insensible degrees, nearer to these places; nor can we say, that there never were such creatures in those parts of Asia, where Noah is thought to have lived, as are now to be found in America; because it is very well known, that formerly there have been many beasts of a particular species in some countries, such as the hippopotami in Egypt, wolves in England, and beavers in France, where at present there are few or none of them to be found.

If, after all, it should be asked, why God made use of this, rather than any other method, to destroy the wicked, and preserve the righteous? the proper answer is, that whatever pleaseth him, that hath he done, both in heaven and in earth; for as his will is not to be controlled, so neither is it to be disputed. For argument's sake, however, let us suppose, for once, that instead of drowning the world, God had been pleased to destroy by plague, famine, or some other sore judgment, all mankind, except Noah and his sons, who were to be eye-witnesses of this terrible execution, to live to see the earth covered with dead bodies, and none left to bury them, the fields uncultivated, and the cities lie waste and desolate without inhabitants, who can conceive what the horror of such a sight would have been? And who would have been content to live in such a world, to converse only with the images of death, and with noisome carcasses? But God, in mercy, shut up Noah in the ark, that he should not see the terrors and consternations of sinners when the flood came; and he washed away all the dead bodies into the caverns of the earth, with all the remains of their old habitations. So that when Noah came out of the ark, he saw nothing to disturb his imagination, nor any tokens of that terrible vengeance which had over run the world, to offend his sight: only, when he looked about him, and saw every thing gone, he could not but fall into this contemplation, that God, 'when he enters into judgment with the wicked, ² will not pity, nor spare, nor have mercy, but destroy. He will dash them one against another, even father and son together, and ³ cause his fury to rest upon them, until his anger be accomplished.'

(SUPPLEMENTAL BY THE EDITOR.)

"I CONCLUDE," says the illustrious Cuvier, "that if there be a fact well established in geology, it is this, that the surface of our globe has suffered a great and sudden revolution, the period of which cannot be dated farther back, than five or six thousand years. This revolution has, on the one hand, engulfed and caused to disappear, the countries formerly inhabited by men, and the animal species at present best known; and on the other, has laid bare the bottom of the last ocean, thus converting its channel into the now habitable earth."

I. Of the reality of this mighty deluge, we have universal evidence. Nearly the whole table lands, and gentle acclivities of the mountains, are covered with deposits of gravel and loam, to the production of which no cause now seen in action is adequate, and which can therefore be referred only to the waters of a sudden and transient deluge. It is from this circumstance that the deposit alluded to is termed diluvium by geologists. In it, the pebbles and loam are always promiscuously blended, whereas among the regular secondary and tertiary strata, they occur separate in alternate beds. On the contrary, the marl, sand, and gravel deposited by existing rivers and lakes, or plains exposed to occasional inundation, is called alluvium.

"In the whole course of my geological travels," says Dr Buckland, "from Cornwall to Caithness, from Calais to the Carpathians, in Ireland or in Italy, I have scarcely ever gone a mile, without finding a perpetual succession of deposits of gravel, sand, or loam, in situations that cannot be referred to the action of modern torrents, rivers, or lakes, or any other existing causes; and with respect to the still more striking diluvial phenomenon of drifted masses of rocks, the greater part of the northern hemisphere, from Moscow to the Mississippi, is described by various geological travellers, as strewed on its hills, as well as valleys, with blocks of granite and other rocks of enormous magnitude, which have been drifted, mostly in a direction from north to south, a distance, sometimes, of many hundred miles from their native beds, across mountains and valleys, lakes and seas, by a force of water, which must have possessed a velocity to which nothing that occurs in the actual state of the globe affords the slightest parallel."

According to the theory of Hutton, the mountains of a former earth, were worn down and diffused over the bottom of a former ocean. There they were exposed to the power of subjacent internal fire; and after due induration were heaved up by the explosive violence of the same force, into the inclined or nearly vertical positions, in which the great mountain strata now stand. "How often," says Mr Playfair, in his eloquent illustrations of this theory, "these vicissitudes of decay and renovation have been repeated, is not for us to determine; they constitute a series, which, as the author of this theory has remarked, we neither see the beginning nor the end."

This theory is now demonstrated to be a mere phantom. The circumstance that gneiss and mica slate, allowed to be primitive rocks, and to have been formed, as the Huttonians suppose, at the bottom of the sea, by the same process as the calcareous and other secondary strata that are full of shells; the circumstance that gneiss and mica slate are barren of animal exuviae, proves the falsehood of this theory. Whence do these organic ruins come, and why are they absent in the former class of rocks, both of them formed in the same sea, and under similar circumstances?

The Huttonians ascribe the excavation of every great valley on the globe, to the disintegrating power of the stream or river by which they have been traversed. But this is often a mere thread compared to the sloping width of the valley, and should, at the utmost, have produced merely a narrow and precipitous glen. The observed action of streamlets is rather to fill up the dell through which it glides, than to enlarge its dimensions. An example will hardly be found of a valley, which can be legitimately ascribed to the action of the stream that is seen passing through it. This is not the place to enlarge on this subject. Suffice it to remark, that even though the lands adjoining the valleys were composed of loose matter; the waters now running along the bottom, could not have scooped out the valleys, supposing them to have a tenfold force, above what they actually possess; the slope of the existing surface not being sufficiently great to give these masses of water the rapidity requisite to produce that effect, and to carry off the loose soil which filled either the valley or the gorge. Finally, the actual waters, so far from having contributed to form the long and numerous depressions which furrow the surface of the earth, continually tend to fill up these hollows. In short, to the production of the great valleys of the globe no cause now seen in action is adequate, and they can be referred only to the waters of a sudden and mighty deluge.

The reality of this universal catastrophe is attested by the fact, that rocks replete with marine remains are spread over two-thirds of the surface of every part of our continents which have been explored. They abound at great elevations, rising to the loftiest summits of the Pyrenees, nearly 11,000 feet above the level of our present ocean, and to still loftier points in the Andes. It is remarkable that the true geographical summits of the Pyrenees ridge are composed of secondary shell-limestones, which surpass the granite, gneiss, and mica slates, in elevation, and may have been deposited over the primitive rocks while they stood under the primeval ocean.

In addition to this, it may be remarked, that on the secondary mountains of the Jura, particularly the slopes facing the Alps, a great many loose fragments of primitive rocks are strewed over the surface, at heights of 2,500 feet above the Lake of Geneva. They have undoubtedly travelled across the line of these valleys, their composition proving clearly the mountain ridges from which they came. We may hence infer, that at the period of their transfer from the Savoy Alps, the Lake of Geneva did not exist, otherwise they must have remained at its bottom, instead of being found on its opposite bounding mountain at a great elevation. This, and similar facts indicate the scooping out of the valleys between the mountains, by the pressure of the diluvial deflux. Analogous phenomena abound in England. There are found among the diluvial strata of England large blocks and pebbles, the fragments of various primitive and transition rocks, which Dr Buckland supposes to have been drifted from the nearest continental strata of Norway.

"The Alps and Carpathians, and all the other mountain regions I ever visited in Europe," says this respectable writer, "bear in the form of their component hills the same evidence of having been modified by the force of water, as do the hills of the lower regions of the earth; and in their valleys also, where there was space to afford it a lodgment, I have always found diluvial gravel of the same nature and origin with that of the plains below, and which can be clearly distinguished from the postdiluvian detritus of mountain torrents or rivers. The bones of the Mastodon are found in diluvial gravel in the Camp de Geans in South America, 7,800 feet above the level of the sea; and in the Cordilleras at an elevation of 7,200 feet, near the volcano of Imbaburra, in the kingdom of Quito. M. Humboldt found a tooth of an extinct species of fossil elephant at Huehuetoca, on the plain of Mexico. Our high mountains in Europe are so peaked that animal remains, though drifted round their summits, could hardly be expected to lie upon them, but would be washed down their steep slopes. In central Asia, bones of horses and deer which were found at a height of 16,000 feet above the sea, in the Himmala mountains, are now deposited at the Royal College of Surgeons in London. These facts attest, that all the high hills that were under the whole heavens were covered by the waters of the deluge."

It is now maintained by geologists of the highest eminence, that the rounded blocks of granite to which I have alluded as spread over the Jura and neighbouring countries, were rolled into their present situations at the time of the rising from below of Mont Blanc and the Alpine mountains, to which they belong in composition—mountains considered by Von Buch as the latest of all mineral formations, and newer than even the tertiary strata. Hence they are contemporaneous with the deluge, indicating at once its transcendent causes and effects. In support of this conclusion, M. Deluc, of Geneva, published in the memoirs of the Physical Society of that city for May, 1827, a similar opinion;—

that the Alpine ridges have been formed after the tertiary rocks; and that the blocks of granite have been dispersed by that mighty upheaving of the land. The great masses remain nearest the parent mountains, and being least travelled, are more angular; the smaller and lighter ones, having been proportionally more violently agitated, and rolled to greater distances, have become rounded by the attrition.

In the stratum of mingled sand and gravel, which forms the detritus of the deluge, and to which the name diluvium has been given, are usually found the fossil bones of ancient animals. Skeletons, or their parts, have been also discovered in great numbers in the limestone caves of this and many other countries, which are supposed with much probability, to have been the dens of antediluvian animals, the last tenants of which were drowned in the universal deluge. The species so common in the diluvial detritus, namely, the elephants, the rhinoceroses, the horses, are very rare in the bone caves of Germany. In this respect, the Kirkdale cave in Yorkshire differs widely from the others, since it abounds as much in the bones of the great and little herbivorous animals as those of the carnivorous. The elephant, rhinoceros, and hippopotamus, are found at Kirkdale; as well as bones of oxen, deer, down to rats and birds. No marine animals of any species have left their bones either in the Kirkdale or German caves.

There are only three general causes which can be possibly imagined to have introduced the bones in such quantities into these vast subterranean vaults; first, they are either the remains of animals which dwelt and died peaceably in these chambers; or, second, of animals which inundations and other violent causes carried in; or, third, of the animals which had been enveloped in the stony strata, whose watery solution produced the caverns themselves, but the soft parts were dissolved away by the agent that scooped out the mineral substance of the caves. This last hypothesis is refuted by the circumstance, that the strata themselves in which the grottoes are excavated contains no bones; and the second, by the entire state of preservation of the smallest prominences of the bones, which precludes the idea of their having been rolled. Even if some bones are worn smooth, as Dr Buckland has remarked, they are so only on one side; which at the utmost merely proves that something has polished their surface in the bed where they lay. We are therefore compelled to resume the first supposition, and to regard these caverns as the dens of antediluvian carnivora, which dragged in thither and devoured the animals, or parts of animals, that fell in their way. Professor Buckland's writings furnish numerous proofs and illustrations of the truth of this position.

These few observations may suffice to illustrate the nature and extent of that evidence which is furnished by science in proof of the reality of the mighty deluge mentioned in the Mosaic record. The works of Cuvier, Buckland, and Dr Ure's New System of Geology, will put the student in possession of the means of enlarging his knowledge of this highly interesting subject. I shall now advert

II. To what may have been supposed to have been the physical cause of this catastrophe. This, I conceive, to be a proper and useful subject of inquiry, since we know that God usually accomplishes his purposes by means or second causes; and especially since such inquiry may enable us to answer objections and remove difficulties. At the same time, it should be remembered that even though we were incapable of assigning any secondary causes for the production of the deluge, the evidence for the reality of this event would not be thereby affected. All power is God's; and whatsoever he wills,—the will itself omnipotent fulfils.

The theory which appears to me to come nearest the truth on this subject is that which ascribes the phenomena of the deluge to the operation of forces acting under the bottom of the primeval ocean by which its waters were rolled over the ancient continents, many of which were broken down and sunk in the sea, whilst new territories were upheaved and laid bare. Sir H. Davy's discovery of the metallic bases of the earths and alkalis proves that such latent forces do exist in the bosom of the earth; and from the phenomena of volcanoes we may form some conjecture of their tremendous power. The metals of the alkalis and earths, from their affinity for oxygen, could not possibly exist on the surface of the earth; on this principle, volcanic fires would be occasioned whenever these metals were extensively exposed to the action of air and water.

The upheaving of the bed of the ocean, and the depression of the dry land, would occasion the deluge. When the barriers of the ocean began to give way before the explosive forces, the water would invade the shores, and spread over the sunken land, augmenting greatly the evaporating surface, and thus bringing the atmosphere to the dew-point, a state of saturation to which, previously, it could seldom, and in few places, attain, on account of the area of the dry land being great, relative to that of the sea. From this cause, as well as from the immense quantity of vapours which are known to rise from water, into the higher and cooler regions of the air, at the period of eruptions, a great formation of cloud and deposition of rain would ensue.

At each successive upheaving of the submarine strata, the inundation would advance farther on the land, drowning in their places the animals which had been driven for shelter into their dens; and washing away by its reflux, the tenants of the plains, into the slimy channel of the deep. By such a retiring billow in the dreadful earthquake of 1755, three thousand inhabitants of Lisbon were suddenly swept off its quay, and swamped in the bed of the Tagus. In the progress of the elevation of submarine strata, and submersion of what previously had been dry land, the stage of equilibrium would arrive, when the circumfluent waves would roll over the loftiest pinnacles of the globe. The destruction of the human race, with the exception of the eight individuals enclosed in the ark, would thus be completed.

According to the principles of Mr Penn, the ratio of land to water was inverted by the deluge, for he assumes that our actual seas correspond in surface to the antediluvian lands; and our actual lands to the antediluvian seas. But the researches of Professor Buckland on the Kirkdale and Franconia caves; as well as those of Baron Cuvier on the grotto of Oiselles, concur to prove that these were dens inhabited by antediluvian quadruped, and therefore must have formed a portion of its dry land.

I am disposed then to consider volcanic agency as a main cause of the phenomena of the deluge. This power has now a limited range in comparison of its ancient extent. There are at present two hundred and five burning volcanoes on the globe. One hundred and seven of these are in islands, and ninety-eight on continents, but ranged mostly along their shores. The American volcanoes are among those most distant from the sea. In Peru, they are about seventy miles from it. The position of all our active volcanoes in the neighbourhood of the ocean, is a very striking fact. It becomes much more so when we observe submarine volcanoes burning in the very bosom of the sea.

The most remarkable volcano ever described is in the island of Hawaii. It is near the base of Mouna Roa, a mountain 15,000 feet high. An interesting account of it is given by Mr Ellis in his Polynesian Researches. "A whole lake of fire was seen to open suddenly up, in a part at a little distance. This lake could not have been less than two miles in circumference, and its action was more horribly sublime, than any thing I ever imagined to exist, even in the idler visions of unearthly things. Its surface had all the agitation of an ocean. Billow after billow tossed its monstrous bosom into the air, and occasionally the waves from opposite directions met with such violence, as to dash the fiery spray in the concussion forty or fifty feet high."

In order to produce the deluge it was only necessary that the Creator should remove restraints from those forces which actually exist in the earth. These forces under the direction of infinite wisdom, operating in the manner already described, seem to be sufficient to verify the account of this mighty catastrophe recorded by Moses. 'The same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened. And the waters prevailed, and were increased greatly upon the earth; and the ark went upon the face of the waters.' I shall now consider

III. The alleged objections to the truth of the Mosaic account of the deluge. I shall only here advert to those which relate to natural phenomena.

1. While the bones of the lower animals have been found abundantly in the diluvium and caves of the earth, in no instance have the remains of man been discovered. Human bones moulder as slowly in the earth as those of the inferior tribes; yet not one of them has been found of a truly fossil character. This circumstance is felt by many as a difficulty; and is regarded by some as furnishing an objection to the reality of the deluge.

The two following considerations furnish a satisfactory solution of this difficulty. First, that the greater part, if not the whole of the portion of the earth which was inhabited by the human race prior to the deluge, is now at the bottom of the ocean. It is admitted by all, that part of the antediluvian earth is now submersed. It is equally certain that mankind had occupied but a comparatively small part of the globe. From the prodigious herds of wild beasts which prowled through these northern regions, it is confidently inferred that human society was not established there. Indeed the only authentic data from which we can form any conclusion on the subject lead to the belief that primeval population had not rapidly advanced. The average period which each of the primeval patriarchs lived before his eldest son was born, was $117\frac{1}{3}$ years. Judging from these data, the only ones we have, the increase of population must have been slow; divine mercy limiting the victims of guilt and perdition. Multiplying in this ratio, the race of man could not spread widely over the world, thinned as the members must also have been by mutual violence.

It is highly probable that the portion of the earth inhabited by the family of man is now at the bottom of the sea; especially as we know from the physical constitution of the globe, as well as from principles already alluded to, that at least a great part of the bed of the antediluvian ocean is now dry land, and that, consequently, the dry land of the primeval world is, to a considerable extent, at the bottom of the sea.

A second consideration is, that mankind was confined to Asia and the east prior to the deluge; and that the interior of the earth in those parts of the world, have not yet been explored. It is only of course in those portions of the earth which were inhabited by the antediluvians that we are to look for traces of their former existence; and on the supposition that the sea does not now cover all the early dwelling places of the race, we are certain that they have not yet undergone a particular examination.

2. The change in regard to the longevity of man said to be introduced at the deluge is calculated, it is alleged, to awaken suspicion in regard to the truth of the Mosaic account of that catastrophe. Prior to that era men lived to the age of seven, eight, or nine hundred years; but immediately after, the period of human life was greatly shortened. How are we to account for so great a change?

It is a sufficient solution of this difficulty to say, that the Great Author and Lord of life can limit its duration as it pleaseth him. Without presuming to say, whether the changes which the deluge produced on the globe were sufficient, as natural causes, to shorten the mortal existence of man, it is certain that such a revolution was effected in the constitution of our globe, as rendered its surface much colder and moister than it had previously been. From the circumstances which fully establish this position we may select the two following.

First, the almost incredible number of bones of fossil elephants found in northern Siberia, which indicate no marks of having been rolled or transported from a distance, attest the existence formerly on its plains, of huge herbivorous animals. These demonstrate that a vigorous vegetation clothed countries now covered with frost a great part of the year, when even in summer sterilizing cold and humidity perpetually reign, and where at present the rein-deer can hardly pick up from beneath the snow its scanty mouthful of moss. Pallas informs us that in those northern regions there is scarcely a river, on the banks of which, bones of the ancient elephant may not be found. They are imbedded in, or loosely covered with diluvial matter, intermixed with a few marine productions. The immense supply of food requisite to the sustenance of the elephant, the rhinoceros, the hippopotamus, the mastodon, and the tapir, could only be produced in a warm climate.

A. M. 1656. A. C. 2349; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 2256. A. C. 3155. GEN. CII, vi. 12. TO IX. 20.

Secondly, the ruins of vegetable life buried in our frozen circumpolar strata, clearly attest the genial climate which prevailed, and cherished their growth on the primeval earth. The numerous examples of this kind which occur furnish proofs that the hyperborean region where they occur, at one time displayed the noble scene of a luxuriant and stately vegetation.

3. It is objected to the Mosaic history that it represents the rainbow as formed after the flood, and as the sign of a covenant then made; whereas, as a natural phenomenon, the rainbow must have been occasionally exhibited from the beginning of the world. In answer to this it may be remarked, in the first place, that there is nothing absurd in fixing on a natural phenomenon as a sign and memorial of peace and reconciliation. The very best purpose was served by the rainbow, expressed by the sacred historian, when he represents God as saying, 'This is the token of the covenant, which I will make between me and you, and every living creature that is with you for perpetual generations:' for natural and inanimate objects, such as pillars and heaps of stones, were considered as tokens, and even a kind of witnesses, in the contracts of all the civilized nations of remote antiquity. Of this we have several instances in the books of the Old Testament, but surely not one so apposite as that of the rainbow. Noah and his sons undoubtedly knew,—either by the science of the antediluvian world, or by the immediate teaching of God,—that the rainbow is a physical proof, as long as it is seen, that a general deluge is not to be dreaded: and therefore, if their minds, filled with terror and astonishment at what they had escaped, should ever have become fearfully apprehensive of a future deluge, the sight of the bow would immediately dissipate their fears.

But, in the second place, philosophers are now of opinion that the rainbow, from the constitution of the primeval atmosphere, could not have been formed till after the deluge. Immediately after the flood, the sea-soaked lands would send up universal exhalations round the chilly globe; whence showers and rainbows would become, for some time at least, almost daily appearances. This conclusion of physical research, coincides well with our ancient history of the new drained earth. 'And God said, This is the token of the covenant which I make between me and you, and every living creature that is with you for perpetual generations: I do set my bow in the cloud, and it shall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth. And it shall come to pass when I bring a cloud over the earth, that the bow shall be seen in the cloud. And the waters shall no more become a flood to destroy all flesh.' The ark preserved eight intelligent witnesses, come to mature age, of antediluvian skies and seasons. It is inferred, both from the emphatic words in which the sign of Heaven's favour is announced, as well as from the purpose which it was ordained to serve, that it must have been equally strange as it was glorious in their sight. In such clouds as might often be stretched in the cooler upper regions of their skies, no bow could be set. Heavy dews, deposited during the night and early dawn, from the well known influence of ground chilled by calorific radiation, would supply the place of rain for vegetable sustenance; as now happens in Lima and many other regions of our present globe. It is alleged that this theory receives support from the following declaration of the sacred historian. 'For the Lord God had not caused it to rain upon the earth, and there was not a man to till the ground. But there went up a mist from the whole earth, and watered the whole face of the ground.'

The rainbow thus becomes a most significant emblem of God's providential regard to man. It is a phenomenon which results from, and declares the remodelled constitution of the terraqueous sphere. It is a type of sin and suffering; of reconciliation and of peace; a memorial of the sublimest truths of revelation and science. 'While the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease.'

IV. It is alleged that Hindoo chronology, founded on astronomical observation, is irreconcilable with the era of the deluge according to the sacred historian; and the inference deduced from this allegation by those who advance it is, that the Mosaic record is false.

In a commentary on Baillie's Treatise on the Hindoo Chronology, by Professor Playfair, read before the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and published in their Transactions, he announced the following conclusions:—"The observations on which the astronomy of India is founded were made more than 3900 years before the Christian era, (consequently more than 650 years before the deluge by the Hebrew chronology), and in particular, the places of the sun and moon, at the beginning of the Calyougham, (the age of misfortune 3102 A. C.) were determined by actual observation."—"It is through the medium of astronomy," continues Professor Playfair, "alone, that a few rays from those distant objects (the ancient inhabitants of the globe) can be conveyed in safety to the eye of a modern observer, so as to afford him a light, which, though it be scanty, is pure and unbroken, and free from the false colouring of vanity and superstition."

In this opinion, so confidently announced, Professor Playfair was singularly unfortunate, since its falsity has been fully proved by La Place and Delambre. "Every thing," says the former, "leads us to conclude that they (the Indian tables) are not of high antiquity. They have two principal epochs which go back, one to the year 3102, and the other to 1491 years before the Christian era. These are linked together by the mean movements of the sun, moon, and planets, so that one of the epochs is necessarily fictitious. The celebrated author (M. Baillie) to whom I refer, has tried to establish in his Treatise on Indian Astronomy, that the first of these epochs is founded on observation. Notwithstanding his proofs, expounded with all the interest which he could bestow on the most complex subjects, I consider it very probable, that this epocha has been invented for the purpose of giving a common origin upon the zodiac to the movements of the celestial bodies. In fact, if we assume for our point of departure, the epocha of 1491, and go back by means of the Indian tables, to the year 3102 before the Christian era, we obtain a general conjunction of the sun, moon, and planets, as these tables suppose; but this conjunction differs too much from the result of our best tables, to have taken place, demonstrating that the epocha to which it refers, is not grounded on observation. The tables altogether, and particularly the impossibility of the conjunction which they suppose at the same epocha, prove on the contrary that they have been constructed in modern times.

“The whole system of the Indian tables,” says Cuvier, “so elaborately conceived, falls to pieces of itself, now that it has been proved that this epocha was adopted at an after period from calculations retrospectively made, the result of which is false. Mr Bentley has discovered that the tables of Tirvalour, on which the assertions of Bailly were principally founded, must have been computed towards the year 1281 of the Christian era, (only 547 years ago,) and that the Sourya-Siddhanta, which the Brahmims esteem their most ancient scientific treatise on astronomy, pretending that it was given by revelation, more than twenty millions of years since, could have been composed only 767 years before our own time.”

Delambre speaks with equal decision, and to the same effect, in his History of Astronomy, Ancient and Modern. “The extensive treatise on Indian astronomy,” says he, “by Bailly, has been laboured with more care than any of his other works. We regret only to remark too frequently in it, that spirit of system which predominates in all his productions. Instead of giving a simple exposition of facts, which may enable us afterwards to consider them in every point of view, he espouses an opinion to which he makes every thing conform. If we be allowed to hazard a conjecture, we would say, that Bailly never writes but to prop a system formed beforehand; that he glances slightly over the writings of the ancients, reading them in bad translations; and, that he runs over all the calculations in order to pick out obscure passages, which may lend some countenance to his ideas.

When we inquire why the Indians chose the remote and fictitious epoch of Cole-young, or misfortune, we perceive, in the first place, that it was from national vanity; and in the next, that they might make all the planets start from one point, a conjunction which their method of calculation required. If we further ask, why they adopted a complicated method, which employs divisions and multiplications of enormous numbers, with so many additions, subtractions, reductions, and different precepts, the answer is, that they did not wish for written tables; they wanted numbers which could be put into technical verses, even into songs, so that the calculations might be performed without opening a book. These facts, now well known through the labours of the Asiatic Society, are alone sufficient to subvert the whole system.

“Mr Playfair acknowledges that the Indians have not actually demonstrated either of the two processes which they point out for these calculations. I would be tempted to believe that they were ignorant of these demonstrations; if they had known the principle, their table would have been probably a little better. Mr Playfair has not calculated it anew; he has not even had the discernment to perceive the error of the divisor 225, substituted, probably by an error of the copy, for the true divisor 235.5 !”

“The idea of the Hindoo system, given by Mr Bentley,” says M. Delambre, “is so natural, that I am astonished it did not occur to Mr Bailly, and make the pen fall from his hand. It occurred to myself on the first perusal of Mr Bailly's book, before the publication of the first volume of the Asiatic Researches; and it made such an impression on my mind, that I could never place the least reliance on the pretended proofs that he adduced, nor would I have ever seriously entered into the discussion could I have avoided it in this history of astronomy.

“Finally, it appears that there does not exist at present a single Hindoo book, which can possess an antiquity higher than 1300 years; and that none of the romances called pouranas date farther back, from the present time, than 604 years, while some of them are more modern still. Their great geographical treatises are merely a tissue of the most incredible absurdities.”¹

With respect to the knowledge which prevailed among heathen nations of the general deluge, it may be observed, that the destruction of mankind which was effected by this catastrophe, was so signal and so extensive a judgment, that the remembrance of it was every where retained, and traditions of it every where preserved. Express mention of this memorable infliction of divine wrath, is to be found in the earliest writings, and the accounts of its general or partial operation appear in various relations. Berosus and Abydenus speak of it in histories of the Medes and Assyrians; and records of the event extended through the east, and thence were circulated through every country, exciting a peculiar interest in those lands in which some memorial and vestige of it were to be found.

The Egyptians had a sacred ship, called Baris, which represented the ark; and the story of the Argos is supposed, somewhat fancifully, by Bryant, to have been derived from Egypt, and to have a relation to the ark, represented by the sacred ship of Osiris. An allusion to the ark is to be found also in many sacred rites of antiquity. Nonnus, who was born at Persepolis in Egypt, in the fifth century, and who collected in his Dionysica, scattered remnants of knowledge, from the hieroglyphical descriptions and ancient hymns of the country, alludes to the circumstances of the deluge. Relations respecting this event were to be found in various parts of Greece. Aristotle speaks of its effects in Epirus. The Thessalonians believed it to have prevailed in their country.

The people of Phocis supposed the ark to have rested on Parnassus. Lucian, a native of Samosata, gives also an account of the flood. Not only did a general belief prevail, that a deluge had taken place, but the history of the world among the heathens seems to take its origin from that period, inasmuch that many blended the idea of a creation with that of the universal flood; and supposed the system of the world to arise from a chaos of elements, of which water was the primary principle.”²

CHAP. IV.—Of Mount Ararat.

BEFORE we conclude this chapter, and this book together, it may not be improper to give the reader some account of the mountains of Ararat in general: in what part of the world that particular one which is here intended is said to be situate; and, according to the relations both of ancient geographers and modern travellers, of what form and magnitude this mountain is. But in this inquiry some difficulties will arise, by reason of the different traditions concerning it.

The author of the verses ^a which go under the name of the Sibylline Oracles, places the mountains of Ararat in the borders of Phrygia, not far from Celæna, at the head of the two rivers Marsyas and Meander: but it appears from good authorities, that there is in reality no mountain at all in that place, or at most, but a small hill, an eminence made by art, and not by nature; and therefore the learned Bochart has happily found out the ground of this mistake, when he tells us, that not far from this city, Celæna, there is another town called Apamea, and surnamed Κιβωτός; or the ark; not from any tradition that Noah's ark ever rested there, but purely on account of its situation; because it is encompassed with three rivers, Marsyas, Obrimas, and Orgas, which give it the resemblance of a chest or ark, in the same manner that the port of Alexandria was so called, by reason of the bay which enclosed the ships.

Sir Walter Raleigh,¹ and from him some later writers² are of opinion, that the mountains of Ararat were those of Caucasus, towards Bactria and Sogdiana. This, as they imagine, agrees with the general notion, that the Scythians might contend for the antiquity of their original with any other nation: with the Chaldean tradition, concerning the actions of their great man Nisuthrus, who is commonly supposed to be the same with Noah; with the language, learning, and history of the Chinese, who are thought to be Noah's immediate descendants; and with the journey which some of his other descendants are said to have taken, namely,³ 'from the east to the land of Shinar.' A modern chronologer has endeavoured to prove, that the place where Noah built the ark was called Cyparissus, not far from the river Tigris, and on the north-east side of the city of Babylon; that while the flood continued, it sailed from thence to the north-east, as far as the Caspian sea, and when the flood abated, the north wind brought it back by a southern course, and landed it upon Mount Caucasus, east of Babylon, and about nine degrees distant from it in longitude; and that this opinion, as he imagines, is more agreeable to the course which the ark, by meeting with contrary currents, would be forced to make: to the sense of Scripture, in bringing the sons of Noah from the east, and in settling the children of Shem (who went not to Shinar) in this place, and to the great conveniency of Noah's landing not too far from the country, where he lived before the flood.

^a The verses, as they are set down by Gallanis, de Sibyllis, p. 580, are these:—

There is upon the Phrygian borders black,
A steep, far-stretching mount, called Ararat,
Where rise the fountains of Marsyas's mighty stream,
'Twas on its lofty ridge where stood the ark.

But that which shows the spuriousness of these verses, is this:—That the Sibyl, speaking of herself as contemporary with Noah, takes notice of the river Marsyas, which, whatever name it had at first, was certainly, after the death of Midas, called the fontain of Midas, and retained that name until the time of Maryas, by whom it was altered; and this must be long after the death of this Sibyl.—Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 2. c. 2.

that thereby he might be capable of giving better directions to his family now to disperse themselves, and to replenish the new world as occasion did require. But besides that there appears little or no authority for all this; the observation of travellers into those countries may make it be questioned, whether such a vessel as the ark is represented, drawing much water, and very unfit for sailing, could be able to reach Mount Caucasus from the province of Eden (where it is generally thought to have been built) in the space of the flood's increase, which was no more than 150 days. The most probable opinion therefore is, that by the word Ararat, the Holy Scriptures denote that country which the Greeks, and from them other western nations, do call Armenia. In this sense it is taken by the Septuagint, by the Chaldee paraphrase, by the Vulgate, by Theodoret and by divers others. The learned Bochart has brought together a multitude of arguments, all tending to the same conclusion; but then the question is, on what particular mountain it was that the ark landed?

1. The most prevailing opinion for some time was, that one of the mountains which divide Armenia on the south from Mesopotamia, and that part of Assyria, which is inhabited by the Curds, (from whence the mountains took the name Curdu) which the Greeks changed into Cordini,^b and several other names, was the place where the ark landed: and what makes for this opinion is, that whereas the deluge was in a great measure occasioned by the overflowing of the ocean, as the Scriptures tell us, that flux of waters which came from the Persian sea, running from the south, and meeting the ark, would of course carry it northward upon the Cordian mountains, which seems to be voyage enough for a vessel of its bulk and structure to make in the stated time of the flood's increase.

The tradition which affirms the ark to have rested on these mountains must have been very ancient, since it is the tradition of the Chaldeans themselves, and in former ages was very little questioned, till men came to inquire into the particular part of these mountains whereon it settled, and then the authors seemed to place it out of Armenia: Epiphanius on the mount Lubar, between the country of the Armenians and Cordians; and all the eastern authors, both Christian and Mahometan, on mount Themanin, or Al-Judi, which overlooks the country of Diarrhabia, or Moussal, in Mesopotamia.

To confirm this tradition, however, we are told that the remainders of the ark were to be seen upon these mountains. Berosus and Abyd nus both declare, that there was such a report in their time; the former observes farther, that several of the inhabitants thereabouts scraped the pitch off the planks as a rarity, and carried it about them for an amulet; and the latter says, that they used the wood of the vessel against several diseases with wonderful success: as the relics of this ark were likewise to be seen in the time of Epiphanius, if we may believe him. The town of Themanin, which signifies eight, situated at the foot of the mountain Al-Judi, was built, we are told, in memory of the eight persons who came out of the ark; and formerly there was a monastery, called the monastery of the ark, upon the Curdu mountains, where the Nestorians used to celebrate a festival, on the very spot where they supposed the ark stopped; but in the year of Christ 776, that monastery was destroyed by lightning, together with the church, and a numerous congregation in it; and since that time, the credit of this tradition has in some measure declined, and given place to another, which at present prevails.

2. This opinion places mount Ararat towards the middle of Armenia, near the river Araxes, or Aras, above 280 miles distant from Al-Judi, to the north-east. ¹ St Jerome seems to have been the first who hath given us an account of this tradition. "Ararat, says he, is a champaign country, incredibly fertile, through which the Araxes flows at the foot of mount Taurus, which extends so far; so, that by the mountains of Ararat, whereon the ark rested, we are not to understand the mountains of Armenia in general, but the highest mountains of Taurus, which overlook the plains of Ararat." Since his time, its situation in this place has been remarked by several other writers; and all the travellers into these places now make mention of no other mount Ararat than what the Armenians call Masis, (from Amasia, the third successor of Haikh, the founder of their nation,) and what the Mahometans do sometimes name Agri-dagh, that is, the heavy or great mountain, and sometimes Parmak-dagh, the Finger-mountain, alluding to its appearance; for as it is straight, very steep, and stands by itself, it seems to resemble a finger, when held up.

The mount Ararat, which the Armenians, as we said, call Masis, and sometimes Mesesoussar, (because the ark was stopped there when the waters of the flood began to abate,) stands about twelve leagues to the east (or rather south-east) of Erivan, (a small city seated in the upper Armenia, four leagues from Aras, or Araxes, and ten to the north-west of Nakschivan; which, because nak, in Armenian, signifies a ship, and schivan, stopped or settled, is supposed to have its name from the same occasion. This mountain is encompassed by several little hills, and on the top of them are found many ruins, which are thought to have been the buildings of the first men, who might fear, for some time, to go down into the plains. It stands by itself in the form of a sugar-loaf, in the midst of one of the greatest plains that is to be seen, and separated from the other mountains of Armenia, which make a long chain. It consists of two hills, whereof the less is more sharp and pointed; but the larger (which is that of the ark) lies north-east of it, and rears its head far above the neighbouring mountains. It seems so high and big indeed, that when the air is clear, it does not appear to be above two leagues from Erivan, and yet may be seen some four or five days' journey off; but from the middle to the top, it is always covered with snow, and for the space of three or four months in the year, has its upper part commonly hid in the clouds.

The Armenians have a tradition, that on the summit of this mountain there is still a considerable part of the ark remaining, but that it is impossible to get up to the top of it. ² For they tell us of one traveller, a person of singular piety, who endeavoured to do it, and had advanced as far as the middle of the mountain; when, being thirsty and wanting water, he put up a prayer to God, who caused a fountain to spring out of the ground for him, and so saved his life; but at the same time, he heard a voice, saying, 'Let none be so bold as to go up to the top of this mountain.'

How difficult the ascent of this mountain is (without any particular revelation) we may inform ourselves from the following account which Mr Tournefort gives of it.

"About two o'clock in the afternoon," ³ says he, "we began to ascend the mountain Ararat, but not without difficulty. We were forced to climb up in loose sand, where we saw nothing but juniper and goats-thorn. The mountain, which lies south and south-south-east from Eimiazim, or the three churches, is one of the most sad and disagreeable sights upon earth; for there are neither trees nor shrubs upon it, nor any convents of religious, either Armenians or Franks. All the monasteries are in the plain, nor can I think the place inhabitable, in any part, because the soil of the mountain is loose, and most of it covered with snow

"From the top of a great abyss, (as dreadful an hole as ever was seen,) opposite to the village of Akurlu, (from whence we came), there continually fall down rocks of a blackish hard stone, which make a terrible resound. This, and the noise of the crows that are continually flying from one side to the other, has something in it very frightful; and to form any notion of the place, you must imagine one of the highest mountains in the world opening its bosom, only to show one of the most horrid spectacles that can be thought of. No living animals are to be seen but at the bottom, and towards the middle of the mountain. They who occupy the lowest region, are poor shepherds and scabby flocks. The second region is possessed by crows and tigers, which passed by, not without giving us some dread and uneasiness. All the rest of it, that is, half of it, has been covered with snow ever since the ark rested there, and these snows are covered half the year with very thick clouds.

"Notwithstanding the amazement which this frightful solitude cast us into, we endeavoured to find out the monastery we were told of, and inquired whether there were any religious in caverns. The notion they have in the country, that the ark rested here, and the veneration which all the Armenians have for this mountain, (for they kiss the earth as soon as they see it, and repeat certain prayers after they have made the sign of the cross), have made many imagine, that it must be filled with religious. However, they assured us that there was only one forsaken convent at the foot of the gulf: that there was no fountain throughout the whole mount; and that we could not go in a whole day to the snow, and down again to the bottom of the abyss; that the shepherds often lost their way; and that we might judge what a miserable place it was, from the necessity they were under to dig the earth from time to time, to find a spring of water for themselves and their flocks; and in short, that it would be folly to proceed on our way, because they were satisfied our legs would fail us; nor would they be obliged to accompany us for all the treasures of the king of Persia.

“When we considered what the shepherds had told us, we advised with our guides; and they, good men, unwilling to expose themselves to the danger of dying for thirst, and having no curiosity, at the expense of their legs, to measure the height of the mountain, were at first of the same sentiments with the shepherds; but afterwards concluded, that we might go to certain rocks, which were more prominent and visible than the rest, and so return by night to the place where we were; and with that resolution we went to rest. In the morning, after that we had ate and drunk very plentifully, we began to travel towards the first ridge of rocks, with one bottle of water, which, to ease ourselves, we carried by turns; but notwithstanding we had made pitchers of our bellies, in two hours’ time they were quite dried up; and as water shook in a bottle is no very pleasant liquor, our hopes were, that when we came to the snow, we should eat some of it to quench our thirst.

“It must be acknowledged, that the sight is very much deceived when we stand at the bottom, and guess at the height of a mountain; and especially, when it must be ascended through sands as troublesome as the Syrtes of Africa. It is impossible to take one firm step upon the sands of mount Ararat; in many places, instead of ascending, we were obliged to go back again to the middle of the mountain; and, in order to continue our course, to wind sometimes to the right, and sometimes to the left.

“To avoid these sands, which fatigued us most intolerably, we made our way to the great rocks, which were heaped upon one another. We passed under them, as through caverns, and were sheltered from all the injuries of the weather, except cold, which was here so keen and intense, that we were forced to leave the place, and come into a very troublesome way, full of large stones, such as masons make use of in building, and were forced to leap from stone to stone, till I, for my part, was heartily weary, and began to sit down, and repose myself a little, as the rest of the company did.

“After we had rested ourselves, we came about noon to a place which afforded us a more pleasing prospect. We imagined ourselves so near, that we could have even touched the snow (we thought) with our teeth; but our joy lasted not long; for what we had taken for snow, proved only a chalk-rock, which hid from our sight a tract of land above two hours’ journey distant from the snow, and which seemed to have a new kind of pavement, made of small pieces of stones broken off by the frost, and whose edges were as sharp as flints. Our guides told us, that their feet were quite bare, and that ours in a short time would be so too; that it grew late, and we should certainly lose ourselves in the night, or break our necks in the dark, unless we would choose to sit down, and so become a prey to the tigers. All this seemed very feasible; and therefore we assured them, that we would go no farther than the heap of snow, which we showed them, and which, at that distance, appeared hardly bigger than a cake; but when we came to it, we found it more than we had occasion for; the heap was above thirty paces in diameter. We every one eat as much as we had a mind for, and so, by consent, resolved to advance no farther. It cannot be imagined how much the eating of snow revives and invigorates: we therefore began to descend the mountain with a great deal of alacrity; but we had not gone far, before we came to sands, which lay behind the abyss, and were full as troublesome as the former; so that about six in the afternoon we found ourselves quite tired out and spent. At length, observing a place covered with mouse-ear, whose declivity seemed to favour our descent, we made to it with all speed, and (what pleased us mightily well) from hence it was that our guides showed us (though at a considerable distance) the monastery, whither we were to go to quench our thirst. I leave it to be guessed, what method Noah made use of to descend from this place, who might have rid upon so many sorts of animals, which were all at his command; but as for us, we laid ourselves upon our backs, and slid down for an hour together upon this green plat, and so passed on very agreeably, and much faster than we could have gone upon our legs. The night and our thirst were a kind of spurs to us, and made us make the greater speed. We continued therefore sliding in this manner, as long as the way would permit; and when we met with small flints which hurt our shoulders, we turned and slid on our bellies, or went backwards on all-four. Thus by degrees we gained the monastery; but so disordered and fatigued by our manner of travelling, that we were not able to move hand or foot.”

I have made my quotation from this learned botanist and most accurate traveller the longer, not only because it gives us a full idea of the mountain, so far as he ascended, but some distrust likewise of the veracity of a certain Dutch voyager, who seems to assure us, that he went five days’ journey up mount Ararat to see a Romish hermit; that he passed through three regions of the clouds, the first dark and thick, the next cold and full of snow, and the third colder still; that he advanced five miles every day, and when he came to the place where the hermit had his cell, he breathed a very serene and temperate air; that the hermit told him, he had perceived neither wind nor rain all the five and twenty years that he had dwelt there; and that on the top of the mountain there still reigned a greater tranquillity, which was a means to preserve the ark without decay or putrefaction.

There is one objection which may be made to all that we have said concerning the situation of this famous mountain, and that is,—Whereas the sons of Noah, when they quitted the country where the ark rested, are said to ²‘journey from the east into the land of Shinar.’ it is plain, that if they removed from any part of Armenia, they must have gone from the north or north-west: but this we shall take occasion to examine when we come to treat of their migration. In the mean time, it is worthy of our observation, and some argument of our being in the right, ³that the situation of Ararat, as we have supposed it, whether it be mount Masis, or the mountain of Curdu, was very convenient for the journey of the sons of Noah, because the distance is not very great, and the descent easy, especially from the latter, into the plains of Mesopotamia, whereof Shinar is a part. Nor should we forget, that the neighbourhood, which the sacred history, by this means, preserves between the land of Eden, where man was created; that of Ararat, where the remains of mankind were saved; and that of Shinar, where they fixed the centre of their plantations, is much more natural, and seems to have a better face and appearance of truth, than to place these scenes at so vast a distance, as some commentators have done.

One inquiry more, not concerning mount Ararat only, but every other mountain that is dispersed over the whole earth, is this,—Whether they were in being before the induction of the flood? The ingenious author of the Theory, so often quoted, is clearly of opinion, that ¹the face of the earth, before the deluge, was smooth, regular, and uniform, without mountains, and without a sea; and that the rocks and mountains which every where now appear, were made by the violent concussions which then happened, and are indeed nothing else but the ruins and fragments of the old world. But all this is confuted by the testimony of Divine Wisdom, who declaring her own pre-existence, ²‘I was set up from everlasting,’ says she, ‘from the beginning, or ever the earth was; when there were no depths, I was brought forth; when there were no fountains abounding with water, before the mountains were settled, before the hills was I brought forth; while as yet God had not made the earth, nor the fields, nor the highest part of the dust of the world.’ So that, according to this declaration, not only the fountains of waters which we see upon the face of the earth, but even mountains (which some have accounted its greatest deformities) and all hills, were part of the original creation, and contemporary with the first foundations of the earth; and though a deluge can scarce be supposed to overspread the globe, without making some transmutation in it, yet that it could not shock the pillars of the round world, or cause a total dissolution in nature, we have the same divine testimony assuring us, that at the time of the first creation, ³‘God laid the foundation of the earth so sure, that it should not be removed for ever.’

It is a groundless imagination, then, to ascribe the origin of mountains and other lofty eminences to a certain disruption of the earth in the time of the deluge; when God, from the very first beginning, designed them for such excellent purposes. For, besides that several of these rocks and mountains (as well as the broad sea) are really an awful sight, and fill the mind with just notions of God’s tremendous majesty, which a small river or a smooth surface does not do so well; and besides, that they yield food for several animals formed by nature to live upon them, and supply us from without with many wholesome plants, and from within with many useful metals; by condensing the vapours, and so producing rain, fountains, and rivers, they give the very plains and valleys themselves the fertility which they boast of. For this seems to be the design of hills, (says ⁴a learned inquirer into the original of springs and fountains,) ‘That their ridges, being placed through the midst of the continent, might serve, as it were, for alembics, to distil fresh water for the use of man and beast; and their heights to give a descent to those streams which run gently, like so many veins of the microcosm, to be more beneficial to the creation.’

⁵Nay, we may appeal to the sense of mankind, whether a land of hills and dales has not more pleasure and beauty both, than any uniform flat, which then only affords delight when it is viewed from the top of an hill. For what were the Tempe of Thessaly, so celebrated in ancient story for their unparalleled pleasantness, but a vale divided by a river, and terminated with hills? are not all the descriptions of poets embellished with such ideas, when they would represent any places of superlative delight, any blissful seats of the muses and nymphs, any sacred habitations of gods and goddesses? They will never admit that a wild flat can be pleasant, no not in the Ælysian fields: they too must be diversified. Swelling descents and declining valleys are their chief beauties; nor can they imagine ⁶even paradise a place of pleasure, or heaven itself ^cto be heaven without them. So that such a place as our present earth is, distinguished into mountains, rivers, vales, and hills, must, even in point of pleasure, claim a pre-eminence before any other, that, presenting us with no more than a single scene, and, in one continued plain superficies, must of necessity pall the prospect. But then, if we consider farther the riches that are repositied in these mountains, the gold and precious stones, the coal, the lead, the tin, and other valuable minerals that are dug out of their bowels, all useful in their kinds, and fitted for the accommodation of human life, we shall be apt to overlook the fantastical pleasantness of a smooth outside, and to think with Moses, the man of God, that ⁶‘Blessed of the Lord is any land for the chief things of the ancient mountains, and for the precious things of the lasting hills.’

CHAP. V.—Of Mount Ararat.

THE following interesting account of Mount Ararat is taken from the description of the recent journey of Professor Parrot to that mountain.

‘Ararat has borne this name for 3300 years: we find it mentioned in the most ancient of books, the History of the Creation, by Moses, who says, ‘the ark rested in the seventh month, on the seventeenth day of the month, upon the mountains of Ararat.’ In other passages of the Old Testament, written several centuries later, in Isaiah xxxvii. 38., 2 Kings xix. 37., we find mention of a land of Ararat, but in Jeremiah li. 27., of a kingdom of Ararat; and the very credible Armenian writer, Moses of Chorene, states that this name was borne by a whole country, and that it was so called after an old Armenian king, Arai the Fair, who lived about 1750 years before Christ, and fell in a bloody battle against the Babylonians on a plain of Armenia, which is hence called Arai-Arat, that is, the ruin of Arai. It was formerly called Amasia, after the ruler Amassis, the sixth descendant from Japhet, and from him Mount Massis also derives its name. This is the only name by which it is now called among the Armenians, for though the Armenian translation of the Old Testament always calls it Mount Ararat, yet the people (to whom the Bible can be no authority, since they do not read it) have retained the name of Massis, and do not know it by the other; so that if we were to ask an Armenian, even if he came from the Holy Mountain itself, respecting Mount Ararat, he would be as ignorant as if we were to ask a European respecting Mount Massis as a place of note. To the Turks and Persians, the name of Ararat is of course unknown. By the first it is called by the Arabic name Agridagh, that is, Steep Mountain, and as the Arabic is almost a universal language in those parts, it is known to the Koords, Persians, and even the Armenians, by this name. It is said that some of the Persians call it Kuhl-Nuh, that is, Noah's Mountain, but on this I am not competent to decide, as I spoke to only a few Persians, and these invariably called it Agridagh.

"The mountains of Ararat rise at the southern extremity of a plain, which the Araxes traverses in a considerable bend, and which is about 50 wersts in breadth, and more than 100 in length. Ararat consists of two mountains, namely, the Great Ararat, and its immediate neighbour, the Little Ararat, the former lying to the north-west, the latter to the south-east, their summits ten wersts and a half apart from each other in a right line, and the base of both mountains united by a broad level valley. This is occupied by the herdsmen for the pasturage of their flocks, and was formerly used as a safe retreat by the predatory Koords, by which they were enabled to keep up an easy and safe communication between the northern and southern provinces.

"The summit of the Great Ararat is situated in 39° 42' north latitude, and 61° 55' east longitude from Ferro; its perpendicular height is 16,254 Paris feet, or nearly five wersts above the level of the sea, and 13,530 Paris feet, or rather more than four wersts, above the plain of the Araxes. The north-eastern declivity of the mountain may be estimated at twenty, its north-western at thirty wersts in length. In the former we recognise, at some distance, the deep black chasm, which many have compared to an extinct crater, but which has always appeared to me to resemble a cleft, as if the mountains had once been split from above. From the summit, for about one werst in a perpendicular, or four wersts in an oblique direction, it is covered with a mantle of eternal snow and ice, the lower edge of which is indented according to the elevation or depression of the ground. This is the hoary head of Ararat. The Little Ararat lies in 39° 19' north latitude, 62° 2' east longitude from Ferro. Its summit is elevated 12,284 Paris feet, above the level of the sea.

"The impression which the sight of Ararat makes on every one whose mind is capable of comprehending the stupendous works of the Creator, is awful and mysterious, and many a sensitive and intelligent traveller has endeavoured, with glowing pen and skillful pencil, to describe this impression; and in the feeling, that no description, no delineation, can come up to the sublime object before him, every one who has made such an attempt, must certainly have experienced how difficult it is to avoid, both in language and in sketching, everything that is poetical in expression or exaggerated in form, and to keep strictly within the bounds of the truth.

"All the Armenians are firmly persuaded that Noah's ark exists to the present day on the summit of Mount Ararat, and that in order to preserve it, no person is permitted to approach it. We learn the grounds of this tradition from the Armenian chronicles in the legend of a monk of the name of James, who was afterwards patriarch of Nisibis, and a contemporary and relative of St Gregory. It is said that this monk, in order to settle the disputes which had arisen respecting the credibility of the sacred books, especially with reference to their account of Noah, resolved to ascend to the top of Ararat to convince himself of the existence of the ark. At the declivity of the mountain, however, he had several times fallen asleep from exhaustion, and found on awaking that he had been unconsciously carried down to the point from which he first set out. God at length had compassion on his unwearied though fruitless exertions, and during his sleep sent an angel with the message, that his exertions were unavailing, as the summit was inaccessible, but as a reward for his indefatigable zeal, he sent him a piece of the ark, the very same which is now preserved as the most valuable relic in the cathedral of Etschmidasin. The belief in the impossibility of ascending Mount Ararat has, in consequence of this tradition, which is sanctioned by the church, almost become an article of faith, which an Armenian would not renounce even if he were placed in his own proper person upon the summit of the mountain."

On the 27th of September, O. S., 1829, this intrepid traveller stood on the summit of Mount Ararat.

We have lately received an account of an ascent of Mount Ararat, in the middle of August, 1834, accomplished by a Mr Antonomoff, a young man holding an office in Armenia, who was induced to make the attempt partly to satisfy his own curiosity, and partly out of regard for the reputation of professor Parrot; whose having actually reached the summit of the mountain is still obstinately denied, particularly by the inmates of the convent, who fancy that the truth would lower the opinion of the people with regard to the sanctity of their mountain. Mr Antonomoff succeeded in reaching the summit; the large cross set up by Mr Parrot was nearly covered with snow; the smaller cross planted on the summit was not to be found, and was probably buried in the snow. One of his guides, who had also accompanied Mr Parrot, showed him the spot where it had been set up. He asked some persons to look while he was at the top, and try if they could see him. On his coming down, however, nobody would admit having seen him there: they all affirmed that to reach the summit was impossible; and though he and his guides agreed, the magistrates of the village refused not only to give him a certificate of his having ascended the mountain, but even of his guides having declared that he had done so.

PRELIMINARY OBSERVATIONS.

THE great object of the Sacred Historian, is to furnish a brief historical survey of the gradual discovery of the plan of redeeming mercy. We must bear this in mind in order to account for his brevity in regard to many things, and his silence in respect to others. He notices those facts and events which bear on his design; and for this reason he hastens forward from Noah to Abraham, the great progenitor of the Messiah.

By many successive works and dispensations of God, all tending to one great end and effect, all united as the several parts of a scheme, and altogether making up one great work,—was the most High unfolding the plan of redemption, and preparing the way for its full accomplishment by the atoning sacrifice of the Redeemer. Like a house or temple that is building; first the workmen are sent forth, then the materials are gathered, then the ground fitted, then the foundation is laid, then the superstructure is erected, one part after another, till at length the top stone is laid, and all is finished. The great works of God in the world during the whole space of time from the fall to the coming of Christ, were all preparatory to this. There were many great changes and revolutions in the world, and they were all, only the turning of the wheels of Providence in order to this, to make way for the coming of Christ, and what he was to do in the world. They all pointed hither, and all issued here. Hither tended especially all God's great works towards his church. The various dispensations under which the church was placed, were to prepare the way for his coming. God wrought many lesser salutations and deliverances for his people before the coming of the Great Deliverer. These salvations were all but so many images and forerunners of the great salvation which Christ was to work out for his people. All anterior revelations were only so many forerunners and comets of the great light that he should bring, who came to be the light of the world. That whole space of time, was, as it were, the time of night, wherein the church of God was not indeed wholly without light; but it was like the light of the moon and stars, a dim light in comparison of the light of the sun: 'It had no glory by reason of the glory that excelleth.'

With these views, we proceed to the interesting details recorded in the following book.

CHAP. I.—The Remainder of what is recorded of Noah to his death.

A. M. 1657, A. C. 2347; or, according to Hales, A. M. 2257. A. C. 3154.
Gen. viii. 20. to the end of ch. ix.

It may perhaps be thought a little strange, that Noah, who lived so long in this period of time, and was himself the principal person after the flood, should bear so small a share, and have his name so seldom mentioned in the subsequent actions related by Moses. He was certainly alive a great while after the confusion of Babel, for the Scriptures make mention of his death, not till three hundred and fifty years after the flood; and yet surely, if either he had been present at Babel, or lived in any of the countries, whereinto mankind was dispersed after that confusion, a person of such eminence could not, at once, have sunk to nothing, and been no more mentioned in the history and settlement of these nations, than if he had been quite extinct. To account for this difficulty (which is chiefly occasioned by the silence of Scripture) ¹ some learned authors of late have attempted to find out mount Ararat in another place. They suppose, that it was Caucasus, not far from China, where the Ark rested, and near which Noah settled, when he came out of it; that only part of his descendants travelled into Shinar, the remainder continued with him; and that the reason, why Moses mentions neither him, nor them, is, because they lived at so great a distance, and had no share in the transactions of the nations round about Shinar, to whom alone (after the dispersion of mankind) he is known to confine his history. This opinion, which seems to solve the difficulty at once, is supported by some such arguments as these: that the Mosaic history is altogether silent, as to the peopling of China at the dispersion, and confines itself within the bounds of the then known world; that the Chinese language and writing are so entirely different from those among us, introduced by the confusion at Babel, that it cannot well be supposed they were ever derived from them; that the learned sciences seem anciently to have been better known in China, than in these parts of the world, their government and constitution much firmer, and better settled, and their histories more certain and authentic than ours; that (taking the first king Fohi and Noah to be the same person) Fohi is said to have had no father, which agrees well enough with Noah, because the memory of his father might be lost in the deluge? that Fohi's mother conceived him as she was encompassed with a rainbow, which seems to be an imperfect tradition of the rainbow's first appearance to Noah after the flood; and that the reign of Fohi is coincident with the times of Noah, and the lives of his successors correspondent with the lives of the men of the same ages, recorded in Scripture.

But as this opinion is conjectural only, the histories and records of China of a very uncertain and precarious authority, and such as are reputed genuine, of no older date than some few centuries before the birth of Christ, the major part of interpreters have thought fit to reject this account of things as fabulous, and have thereupon supposed either that Noah, settling in the plains of Armenia, did not remove from thence, and had, consequently, no hand in the building of Babel; or that, if he did remove with the rest into the plains of Shinar, being now superannuated and unfit for action, the administration of things was committed to other hands, which made his name and authority the less taken notice of.

It must be acknowledged however, that the design of the sacred historian is to be very succinct in his account of the affairs of this period, because he is hastening to the history of Abraham, the great founder of the Jewish nation, whose life and adventures, upon that account, he thinks himself concerned to relate more at large: for what he has farther told us of the patriarch Noah, amounts to no more than this.

CHAP. II.—The History.

As soon as Noah and his family were landed, and all the creatures committed to his charge were come safe out of the ark, he selected some of every kind, both beasts and birds, but such only as were clean, and, by God's appointment, proper for sacrifice; and having built the first altar that we read of, restored the ancient rite of Divine worship, and ^a offered burnt-sacrifices

^a Josephus tells us, that Noah, in a persuasion, that God had doomed mankind to destruction, lay under a mortal dread for fear of the same judgment over again, and that it would end in an anniversary inundation; so that he presented himself before the Lord with sacrifices and prayers, "humbly beseeching him, thereon. And this he did with so grateful a sense of the Divine goodness, and so reverential a fear of the Divine Majesty, as procured him a gracious acceptance, and, in testimony of that acceptance, several grants and promises.

God's promises were, that, ^b though mankind were naturally wicked and apt to go astray from the very womb, yet, be their iniquities ever so great, he would not any more destroy the earth ^c by a general deluge, or disturb the order of nature, and ^d the several seasons of the year, and their regular vicissitudes: and in confirmation of this, he appointed the rainbow for a token, which, (whether it used to appear before the flood or no) was now to be the ratification of the truth of his promise and his faithful witness in heaven.

The grants which God gave Noah and his sons were, in mercy, to preserve the order of the world in its frame; to punish the guilty, and spare the lives of the innocent; and not to proceed with rigour, for the wickedness of some particulars, to the destruction of the whole; otherwise, the survivors of this calamity would be more wretched, than those that were washed away in the common rain. If, after having suffered horror of thought, and the terror of so dismal a spectacle, they should only be delivered from one calamity to be consumed by another." Antiq. b. l. c. 4. But that this should be the purport of his prayer, is not very likely, because we find no such indications of terror in Noah, who knew the great and criminal causes of the deluge to be such as could not happen every year, and who, having found favour in the eyes of God, and a miraculous preservation from a general destruction, can hardly be supposed to have cast away his confidence in him so soon, and, instead thereof, to be possessed with an abject and servile fear; and therefore we may conclude, that the nature of his prayer and sacrifice was eucharistical, and not deprecatory.—Heidegger's History of the Patriarchs, Essay 19.

^b The words, in our translation are, 'I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake,' for 'the imagination of man's heart is evil;' which is certainly very injuriously rendered, because it makes the sacred author speak quite contrary to what he designed, and is an affront to the justice, goodness, and wisdom of God, who, by this translation of 'for,' instead of 'though,' might seem to bless man for his evil imaginations.—Essay for a New Translation.

^c For particular inundations there have been at several times, in divers places, whereby towns and countries have been overwhelmed with all their inhabitants.—Poole's Annotations.

^d All the versions do manifestly, in this place, confound the four seasons of the year, which Moses exactly distinguishes. For the Hebrew word kor, which they render cold, signifies the winter, because of the cold that then reigns. The word chom, which they render heat, signifies the spring, because of the heat which abounds in Judea about the end of the spring, in the months of May and June, which is the harvest time in that country. The word kajts, which they render summer, does indeed signify so; but when the word coroph, which they term the winter, should be rendered autumn, which is the time of ploughing, and cultivating the ground, as may be seen, Prov. xx. 4. So that the whole sentence, which contains the promise of God, Gen. viii. 22. if rendered justly, should run thus—

'While the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest, winter and spring, summer and autumn, day and night, shall not cease.'—An Essay for a New Translation. We cannot but observe how ever, that this vicissitude of times and seasons, which is here promised as a blessing to mankind, is a full confutation of the dreams of such writers as are apt to fancy, "That in the primordial earth there was every where a perpetual spring and equinox; that all the parts of the year had one and the same temper, face, and temper; and that there was no winter or summer, seed-time or harvest, but a continual temperature of the air, and verdure of the earth;" which, if it were true, would make this promise of God a punishment, rather than a blessing to mankind.—See Burnet's Theory, b. 2. c. 3. and Heidegger's History of the Patriarchs, Essay 19.

A. M. 1657. A. C. 2317; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 2257. A. C. 3154. GEN. CH. viii. 20. TO THE END OF CH. ix.

not only ^a the same dominion which our first parents, before the fall, had over the animal creation, and a full power to keep them in submission and subjection, but a privilege likewise to kill any of these creatures for food; only with this restriction, that they were not to ^b put them to unnecessary torture, or to eat any part of their blood, which might be a means to introduce the shedding of human blood. The human kind, notwithstanding their apostasy, did still retain some lineaments of the Divine similitude; and, therefore, whosoever murdered any of them did thereby deface the image of God; and whether it were man ^c or beast, stranger or near relation, was appointed by the magistrate to be put to death; and, with these grants and promises, he gave them encouragement (as he did our first progenitors) to "be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth." which was now left almost destitute of inhabitants.

But how much soever the deluge might deprive the earth of its inhabitants, it had not so totally destroyed the trees, and plants, and other vegetables, but that in a short time they began to appear again; and being encouraged by the kindly warmth of the sun, discovered their several species by the several fruits they bore. Noah before the flood ^d had applied himself to husbandry, and now, upon the recovery of the earth again, betook himself to the same occupation. Among his other improvements of the ground he had planted a vineyard, and perhaps was the first man who invented a press to squeeze the juice out of the grape, and so make wine. Natural curiosity might tempt him to taste the fruit of his own labour; but, being either unacquainted with the strength of this liquor, or through age and infirmity unable to bear it, so it was, that, drinking a little too freely, he became quite intoxicated with it; and so falling asleep in his tent, lay with his body uncovered, and, in a very indecent posture, was exposed to the eyes of his children.

Ham, who espied his father in this condition, instead of concealing his weakness proclaimed it aloud; and to his other two brothers, Shem and Japhet, made him the subject of his scorn and derision. But so far were they from being pleased with his behaviour in this respect, that taking a garment, and laying it upon both their shoulders, they went backward till, coming to their father, they dropt the garment upon him, and so covered the nakedness which their pious modesty would not permit them to behold. Nor is it improbable that, to prevent the like indecency, they watched him during the remaining time of his sleep, and might possibly, upon his awaking, acquaint him with what had happened: whereupon, perceiving how unworthily his son Ham had served him, ^e he cursed his race in the person of Canaan his grandson; and reflecting how respectfully his other two sons had behaved, he rewarded their pious care

^a A learned, and right reverend author, to show the renovation of the earth after the deluge, and its deliverance from the curse inflicted upon it by reason of Adam's transgression, runs the parallel between the blessings and privileges, granted to Adam, soon after his creation, and those restored to Noah and his posterity, soon after the flood. To our first parents it is said, 'Have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth on the earth,' Gen. i. 28. To Noah and his sons it is said, 'The fear of you, and the dread of you, shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowl of the air, and upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon all the fishes of the sea, into your hand are they delivered,' Gen. ix. 2. To Adam and Eve are granted for food 'every herb bearing seed; and every tree, in the which is the fruit of the tree, yielding seed,' Gen. i. 29. But Noah and his sons have a large charter, 'Every moving thing that liveth, shall be meat to you, even, as the green herb, have I given you all things,' Gen. ix. 3. The blessing upon the earth, at the creation, was, 'Let the earth bring forth grass, and herb yielding seed, and the fruit-tree yielding fruit after his kind,' Gen. i. 11. The blessing after the flood is, 'While the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest shall not cease,' Gen. viii. 22. In the beginning, 'the lights in the firmament were appointed to divide the day from the night, and to be for seasons, and for days, and years,' Gen. i. 14. After the flood, the new blessing is, 'That spring and autumn, summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease,' Gen. viii. 22. Whereupon our author asks, what is bestowed in the first blessings, that is wanted in the second? What more did Adam enjoy in his happiest days? What more did he forfeit in his worst, with respect to this life, than that which is contained in these blessings? If he neither had more, nor lost more, all these blessings you see expressly restored to Noah and his posterity: and, from all this, laid together, he concludes, that the old curse upon the ground was, after the deluge, finished and completed.—Sherlock's Use and Intent of Prophecy.

^b The words in the text are,—"But flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall you not eat." This the Hebrew doctors generally understand to be a prohibition to cut off any limb of a living creature, and to eat it while the life, that is, the blood was in it; whilst yet it lives and palpitates, or trembles, as a modern interpreter has truly explained their sense; and in this they are followed by several Christians, who think (as Maimonides did) that there were some people in the old world, so savage and barbarous, that they did eat raw flesh, while it was yet warm from the beast, out of whose body it was cut piecemeal. Plutarch tells us, that it was customary, in his time, to run red hot spits through the bellies of live swine, to make their flesh more delicious; and I believe some among us have heard of whipping pigs, and torturing other creatures to death, for the same purpose. Now these things could not be committed, if such men thought themselves bound in conscience, to abstain from all unnecessary cruelties to the creatures, and to bleed them to death, with all the dispatch they could, before they touched them for food.—See Patrick's Commentary, and Revelation Examined, vol. ii. p. 20.

^c If it here should be asked, how any beast that is neither capable of virtue nor vice, can be deemed culpable, in case it should chance to kill any man? the answer is,—That this law was ordained for the benefit of men, for whose use all beasts were created. For, 1st, such owners, as were not careful to prevent such mischiefs, were hereby punished. 2dly, Others were admonished by their example to be cautious. 3dly, God thereby instructed them, that murder was a most grievous crime, whose punishment extended even to beasts: and 4thly, the lives of men were hereby much secured, when such beasts, as might do the like mischief another time, were immediately dispatched, and taken out of the way.—Patrick's Commentary.

^d Anciently the greatest men esteemed nothing more honourable, and worthy their study, than the art of agriculture. Nihil homine libero dignius, nothing more becoming a gentleman, was the saying of the Roman orator; and for the truth of this the Fabii, the Catos, the Varros, the Virgils, the Plinys, and other great names are sufficient witnesses.—Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. i. p. 251.

^e It is a tradition among the eastern writers, that Noah, having cursed Ham and Canaan, the effect of his curse, was, that not only their posterity were made subject to their brethren, and born, as we may say, in slavery; but that likewise, all on a sudden, the colour of their skin became black: for they maintain, that all the blacks descended from Ham and Canaan; that Noah seeing so surprising a change, was deeply affected with it, and begged of God, that he would be pleased to inspire Canaan's masters with a tender and compassionate love for him; and that his prayer was heard. For, notwithstanding we may still, at this day, observe the effect of Noah's curse, in the servitude of Ham's posterity; yet we may remark likewise the effect of his prayer, in that this sort of black slaves is sought for, and made much of in most places.—Coburn's Dictionary on the word Ham.

A. M. 1657. A. C. 2347; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 2257. A. C. 3154. GEN. CH. viii. 20. TO THE END OF CH. ix.

with each one a blessing, which, in process of time, was fulfilled in their posterity.

This is all that the Scripture informs us of concerning Noah, only we are given to understand, that he lived 350 years after the deluge, in all 950; and, if we will believe the tradition of the orientals, he was buried in Mesopotamia, where, not far from a monastery, called Dair-Abunah, that is, the monastery of our father, they show us in a castle a large sepulchre, which they say belonged to him; but as for the common opinion of his dividing the world among his three sons before his death, giving to Shem, Asia,—to Ham, Africa,—and to Japhet, Europe, there is no manner of foundation for it either in Scripture or tradition.

CHAP. III.—Difficulties Obviated, and Objections Answered.

It is a sad perversion of the use of human understanding, and no small token of a secret inclination to infidelity, when men make the condescensions of Scripture an argument against its Divine authority, and from the figures and allusions which it employs in accommodation to their capacities, draw conclusions unworthy of its sacred penmen, and unbecoming the nature of God.

In relation to sacrifices, we find God declaring himself very fully in these words: 'Hear, O my people, and I will speak; I will testify against thee, O Israel, for I am God, even thy God. I will not reprove thee, because of thy sacrifices, or for thy burnt-offerings, because they were not always before me. I will take no bullock out of thine house, or he-goats out of thy fold:—for thinkest thou that I will eat bull's flesh, or drink the blood of goats? Offer unto God thanksgiving, and pay thy vows unto the most High, and call upon me in the time of trouble, so will I hear thee, and thou shalt praise me.' So that it is not the oblation itself, but the grateful sense and affections of the offerer, that are acceptable to God, and which, by an easy metaphor, may be said to be as grateful to him² as perfumes or sweet odours are to us.

And indeed, if either the sense of gratitude or fear, if either the apprehension of God's peculiar kindness, or of his wrathful indignation against sin, did ever produce a sincere homage,³ it must have been upon this occasion when the patriarch called to remembrance the many vows he had made to God in the bitterness of his soul, and in the midst of his distress; when, coming out of the ark, he had before his eyes the ruins of the old world, so many dreadful objects of the divine vengeance; and at the same time saw himself safe amidst his little family, which must have all likewise perished, had they not been preserved by a miraculous interposition. And with such affections of mind as this scene could not but excite, it would be injurious not to think that his prayers and oblations were answerably fervent, and his joy and thanksgiving such as became so signal a deliverance.

But it was not upon account of these only that his service found so favourable a reception. Sacrifices,⁴ (as we showed before) were of Divine institution, and prefigurative of that great propitiation, which God, in due time, would exhibit in the death of his Son. Whatever merit they have, they derive from Christ,⁵ 'who gave himself for us, as an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet smelling savour.' It was in the sense of this, therefore, that Noah approached the altar which he had erected, and while he was offering his appointed sacrifices, failed not to commemorate 'this Lamb of God which was slain from the foundation of the world,' and so found his acceptance in the Beloved; for he is the⁶ 'Angel which comes and stands at the altar, having a golden censor, and to whom is given much incense, that he may offer it with the prayers of the saints upon the golden altar which is before the throne.'⁶

a At the command of God, Noah, and all who were with him in the ark came out of it, when the earth again became habitable. He first employed himself in an act of worship, expressive of his thankfulness to God for his preservation, and of his dependence for life and acceptance, on the atonement of the promised Deliverer. 'He built an altar unto the Lord; and took of every clean beast, and of every clean fowl, and offered burnt-offerings on the altar. And the Lord smelled a sweet savour; and the Lord said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake; for the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth.' It is evident from these words,

First, that Noah had received the institution of sacrifice from his ancestors, and not from immediate revelation. This was an ordinance in use in the worship of God with which he appears to have been familiar: and though its observance is not expressly mentioned in the period that intervened between the time of Abel and the flood, we cannot doubt that it was used by the faithful as the expression of their belief in the truth of the great promise. Noah erected an altar, on which he presented to God the divinely appointed typical sacrifice of propitiation.

Secondly, the typical sacrifice was acceptable to God. 'The Lord smelled a sweet savour.' But how could the slaughter of animals in honour of the Deity be pleasing in his sight? Has he not said, 'every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills? I know all the fowls of the mountains: and the wild beasts of the field are mine. If I were hungry, I would not tell thee: for the world is mine and the fulness thereof. Will I eat the flesh of bulls, or drink the blood of goats?' We must therefore consider the burnt-offerings of Noah as acceptable to God only as they were designed to testify and show forth the offering and sacrifice which Christ presented unto God for a sweet-smelling savour; and because they were so regarded by Noah when he practised them in the worship of his Maker, as the expression of his faith and hope, and confidence. This view is fully established,

Thirdly, by a consideration of the nature of the covenant which was founded upon, and connected with, the sacrifice of Noah. The covenant established with this patriarch, on occasion of presenting his sacrifice, was a positive engagement without any re-stipulation, the absolute promise of good to himself and to his posterity. He gave to Noah a new grant of the earth and of the inferior animals, different from that which had been originally conveyed to Adam, inasmuch as this was founded upon the covenant of grace, or upon the great atonement by which the provisions of that covenant are secured. To this grant was annexed a promise, that the earth should no more be visited with such an overwhelming calamity, but should be preserved till the consummation of all things.

There was included in the covenant made with Noah, an express grant of animal food to man. While to Adam was given for meat, every herb upon the face of all the earth, and every tree in the which is the fruit of a tree, to Noah it was said, 'Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you: even as the green herb have I given you all things.' But while animal food was permitted, the eating of blood was prohibited, chiefly, I apprehend, on account of its being used by divine appointment to make atonement.

Fourthly, the distinction of animals into clean and unclean,

We mistake the matter however very much, if we imagine that the merit of Noah's sacrifice, (even when purified with the blood of Christ) was the procuring cause of the covenant here mentioned. The covenant was in the divine counsel from everlasting, and God only here takes an occasion to acquaint Noah with it: but then we may observe, that he expresses himself in such terms as lay no restraint upon him from sending a judgment of waters, or from bringing a general conflagration upon the world at the last day. He binds himself only "never to smite any more every living thing in the manner he had done," that is, with an universal deluge; but if any nation deserves such a punishment, and the situation of their country well admits of it, he may, if he pleases, without breach of this covenant, bring a local inundation upon them; though it must be acknowledged, that whenever we find him threatening any people with his "sore judgments," he never makes mention of this.

It was a general tradition among the heathens, that the world was to undergo a double destruction, one by water and the other by fire. The destruction by fire St Peter has given us a very lively description of. "The heavens and the earth which are now," says he, "are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment; for then shall the heavens pass away with a great noise, and the elements melt with fervent heat, and the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burnt up." But all this is no infraction upon the covenant made with Noah, which relates to the judgment of a flood: and, though this catastrophe will certainly be more terrible than the other, yet it has this great difference in it, "that it is not sent as a curse, but as a blessing upon the earth, not as a means to deface and destroy, but to renew and refine it; and therefore the same apostle adds," "Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

Thus the covenant of God standeth sure: but then, in relation to the sign or sacrament of it, whether it was previous or subsequent to the deluge, this has been a matter much debated among the learned. It cannot be denied indeed, but that "this curious mixture of light and shade discernible in the rainbow, arises naturally from the superficialities of those parts, which constitute a cloud, when the rays of the sun from the adverse part of the hemisphere are darted upon it; and for this reason,⁵ whenever there is the like disposition of the sun to the cloud, it may be imagined that the same phenomenon may be seen, and consequently at certain times has been seen, not from the deluge only, but from the first foundation of the world.⁶ But as this opinion has nothing in Scripture to enforce it, so are there no grounds in nature to give it any sanction, unless we will assert this manifest untruth,—That every disposition of the air, and every density of a cloud, is fitly qualified to produce a rainbow.

This meteor (as the Scripture informs us)^b was appoint-reflects it back on the retina of the eye;—so that in a rainbow there is partly anaklasis, or the refraction of a ray of light in the massy depth of the vapour, and partly diaklasis, or the reflection of that ray on the eye,—which circumstances cannot be found united unless in a cloud that is dewy and just about to dissolve itself into rain,—for it must be only so rare as that a solar ray can somewhat penetrate it, and at the same time so dense, that when the ray hath sunk in it a little, the cloud may repel it.—Its form is circular and bent, by reason of the sun's form; for a rainbow always appears in the quarter of the heavens right opposite to that luminary, formed by some cloud reflecting back its rays.—The colours of the rainbow arising from the various mixture of light and shade, are three in number, phoinikeos, or purple and red—prasinos, leek-green or green, and alourgos, blue, sea-coloured;—for when the solar rays first enter the cloud, because less of the opaque is passed through, the colour shown is red or purple; when it hath entered somewhat farther, the glow of the colour is diminished, and thus arises green; but having sunk into the mass of the vapour as far as the lowest bend of the arch, the colour from want of transparency is blue.—Essay 19th. This description is pretty lively, and gives us some idea of this strange phenomenon; and yet we must own, that the nature of refraction, on which the colours of the rainbow do depend, is one of the abstrusest things that we meet with in the philosophy of nature. Our renowned Boyle, who wrote a treatise on the subject of colours, after a long and indefatigable search into their natures and properties, was not able so much as to satisfy himself what light is, or (if it be a body) what kind of corpuscles, for size and shape, it consists of, or how these insensible corpuscles could be so differently, and yet withal so regularly refracted; and he freely acknowledges, that however some colours might be plausibly enough explained, in the general, from experiments he had made, yet whensoever he would descend to the minute and accurate explication of particulars, he found himself very sensible of the great obscurity of things. Dr Halley, the great ornament of his profession, makes the same acknowledgment; and, after having, from the given proportion of refraction, accounted both for the colours and diameter of the rainbow, with its several appearances, he could hence discern (as he tells us) farther difficulties lying before him: particularly, from whence arose the refractive force of fluids, which is a problem of no small moment, and yet deservedly to be placed among the mysteries of nature, nor yet subject to our senses or reasoning. And the noble theorist of light himself, after his many surprising discoveries, built even upon vulgar experiments, found it too hard for him to resolve himself in some particulars about it; and, notwithstanding all his prodigious skill in mathematics, and his dexterous management of the most obvious experiments, he concludes it at last to be a work too arduous for human understanding, absolutely to determine what light is, after what manner refracted, and by what modes and actions it produceth in our minds the phantasies of colours.—Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. 2. Occasional Annotations 2, in the Appendix.

^b That this rainbow was thought to be of somewhat more than mere natural extraction, the physical mythology of the ancient heathens seems to testify, and it is not improbable, that, from the tenor of God's covenant, here made with Noah, which might be communicated to them by tradition, Homer, the great recognised by Noah, tends to prove the divine institution of sacrifice. For, since animal food was not in use, at least by divine permission, before the deluge, such distinction can be conceived only in reference to sacrifice. Accordingly, we find the first use to which this distinction is applied in Scripture, is that of sacrifice: Noah having taken of every clean beast, and of every clean fowl, and offered burnt-offerings. The question is, how was this difference first made? Was it by the common reason of mankind which led them to determine that ravenous creatures were unfit for sacrifice? Are we not rather warranted to believe that it was introduced by God at the same time that he instituted sacrifice. "Whoever considers carefully," says Dr Kennicott, "will find, that the law is part a republication of antecedent revelations and commands, long before given to mankind."—Dewar on the Atonement, pp. 40—45.

^a The learned Heidegger has given an account of the nature and colours of the rainbow, and by what different causes they are produced, in these very expressive words, "The chief cause of the rainbow is the sun, or the solar ray received into a vapoury cloud, and in it refracted by the various mediums composing the mass—one of which, the more rare, is the air itself; another, more dense, is the vapour which both receives the solar ray and ed by God to be a witness of his covenant with the new world, and a messenger to secure mankind from destruction by deluges; so that, had it appeared before the flood, the sight of it afterwards would have been but a poor comfort to Noah and his posterity, whose fear of an inundation was too violent ever to be taken away by a common and ordinary sign.

For, suppose that God Almighty had said to Noah,¹ "I make a promise to you, and to all living creatures, that the world shall never be destroyed by water again; and for confirmation of this, behold I set the sun in the firmament;" would this have been any strengthening of Noah's faith, or any satisfaction to his mind? "Why," says Noah, "the sun was in the firmament when the deluge came, and was a spectator of that sad tragedy; and as it may be so again, what sign or assurance is this against a second deluge?" But now, if we suppose, on the other hand, that the rainbow first appeared to the inhabitants of the earth after the deluge, nothing could be a more proper and apposite sign for Providence to pitch upon, in order to confirm the promise made to Noah and his posterity, that the world should no more be destroyed by water. The rainbow had a secret connexion with the effect itself, and so far was ^b a natural father of Epic poetry, does by an easy and lively fiction, bring in Jupiter, the king of heaven, sending Iris, his messenger, with a peremptory command to Neptune, the prince of waters, to desist from any farther assisting the Grecians, and annoying the Trojans: and, at the same time, that Iris is sent with this message to the watery deity, the poet has so contrived the matter, that Apollo, or the sun, which is the parent and efficient cause of the rainbow, be sent with another message to Hector, and the Trojans, in order to encourage them to take the field again, and renew their attack. The meaning of all which fine machinery, is no more than this,—that, after a great deal of rain, which had caused an inundation, and thereby made the Trojan horse useless, the sun began to appear again, and the rainbow in a cloud opposite to the sun, which was a sure prognostic of fair weather.—Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. 1.; Occasional Annotations, 2. in the Appendix.

a When God gives a sign in the heavens, or on the earth, of any prophecy or promise to be fulfilled, it must be by something new, or by some change wrought in nature, whereby he testifies to us that he is able and willing to stand to his promise. Thus God puts the matter to Ahaz, 'Ask a sign of the Lord, ask it either in the depth, or in the height above;' and when Ahaz would ask no sign, God gives him one masked; 'Behold a virgin shall conceive and bear a son.' Thus when Abraham asked a sign, whereby he might be assured of God's promise, that his seed should inherit the land of Canaan, it is said, that 'when the sun went down, and it was dark, behold a smoking furnace and a burning lamp passed between the pieces' of the beasts, which he had cut asunder, Gen. xv. 17. And, in like manner, in the sign given to Hezekiah for his recovery, and to Gideon for his victory, in the former case, 'the shadow went back ten degrees in Ahaz's dial, Isa. xxxviii. 8, and, in the latter, 'the dew was wet, and all the ground about it dry;' and then, to change the trial, 'it was dry, and all the ground about it wet,' Judges vi. 38, 39. These were all signs, proper, significant, and satisfactory, having something new, surprising, and extraordinary in them, denoting the hand and interposition of God; but where every thing continues to be as it was before, and the face of nature, in all its parts, the very same, it cannot signify anything new, nor any new intention of the author of nature; and, consequently, cannot be a sign or pledge, a token or assurance of the accomplishment of any new covenant, or promise made by him.—Burnet's Theory, b. 2. c. 5.

b Common philosophy teaches us, that the rainbow is a natural sign, that there will not be much rain after it appears, but that the clouds begin to disperse: for, as it never appears in a thick cloud, but only in a thin, whenever it appears after showers which sign; and as it appeared first after the deluge, and was formed in a thin watery cloud, there is, methinks, a great easiness and propriety of its application for such a purpose. For if we suppose, that while God Almighty was declaring his promise to Noah, and what he intended for the sign of it, there appeared at the same time in the clouds ^c a fair rainbow, that marvellous and beautiful meteor which Noah had never seen before, it could not but make a most lively impression upon him, quickening his faith, and giving him comfort and assurance that God would be steadfast to his purpose.

For God did not "set this bow in the clouds for his own sake," to engage his attention and revive his memory, whenever he looked on it (though that be the expression which the Holy Spirit, speaking after the manner of men, has thought fit to make use of), but for our sakes was it placed there, as an illustrious symbol of the Divine mercy and goodness, and to confirm our belief and confidence in God: and therefore, whenever ² 'we look upon the rainbow, we should do well to praise him who made it; for very beautiful is it in the brightness thereof. It compasseth the heavens with a glorious circle, and the hands of the Most High have bended it.'

And as the goodness of God was very conspicuous to Noah and his posterity, in giving them a new sign for the confirmation of his promises; so it was no less remarkable in the new charter which he granted them, for the enlargement of their diet. That our first parents, ^a in their state of integrity, had not the liberty of eating flesh is very evident, because they were limited by that injunction which appoints herbs and fruits for their food: ³ 'Behold I have given you every herb, bearing seed, come from thick clouds, it is a token that they now grow thin; and therefore the God of nature made choice of this sign, rather than any other, to satisfy us, that he would never suffer the clouds to thicken again to such a degree as to bring another deluge upon the earth.—Patrick's Comment. A rainbow is formed from the opposite sun darting its rays on a cloud that is not thick; it therefore naturally signifies, that by the command of God the rain will no more overwhelm the world; for how can it take place, since neither is the heaven totally overspread with clouds, nor are those clouds which exist exceedingly dense.—Falesius on Sacred Philosophy, c. 9.

c The ingenious Marcus Marci is of opinion, that the rainbow which first appeared to Noah after the flood, and was so particularly dignified by God, as to be consecrated for a divine sign, was not the common one, but a great and universal iris, imitable by art, which he has defined by a segment of a circle, dissected into several gyrations (or rounds) by the diversity of the colours, differing one from another, begotten by the subbeams refracted in the atmosphere, and terminated with an opaque superficies. But whether this serves to explain the matter any better, or whether the common rainbow be not an appearance illustrious enough to answer the purposes for which it was intended, we leave the curious to inquire; and shall only observe farther, that, whether it was an ordinary or extraordinary bow which appeared to Noah, it is the opinion of some, that the time of its first appearing, was not immediately after he had sacrificed, (as is generally supposed,) but on the 15th day of the flood, when God remembered Noah, upon which very day of the year they likewise calculate the birth of Christ (as pretypified thereby) to have exactly fallen out, and that even the glory of the Lord, which shone round about the shepherds, was a gracious phenomenon, corresponding with this sign of the covenant.—Bibliotheca Biblica, ibid.

d This notion the Pagan poets and philosophers had received, For Ovid in his description of these times, gives us to understand that they fed on no flesh, but lived altogether on herbs and which is upon the face of the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree, yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat.' Nay, so far was mankind from being indulged the liberty of eating flesh at that time, that we find 'the beasts of the field,' creatures that in their nature are voracious, 'and the fowl of the air, and every thing that crept upon the earth,' under the same restraint, as having nothing allowed them for their food but the herbage of the ground; because it was the Almighty's will that, in the state of innocence, no violence should be committed, nor any life maintained at the loss and forfeiture of another's.

This was the original order and appointment, and so it continued after the fall; for we can hardly suppose that God would allow a greater privilege to man, after his transgression, than he did before. On the contrary, we find him ¹ cursing the ground for man's sake, and telling him expressly, that 'in sorrow he should eat of it all the days of his life;' and though it should bring forth thorns and thistles to him, yet here the restriction is still continued, 'Of the herbs of the field thou shalt eat,' which is far from implying a permission to make use of living creatures for that purpose.

Nay, farther, we may observe, that such a permission had been inconsistent with God's intention of punishing him by impoverishing the earth; since, had God indulged him the liberty of making use of what creatures he pleased for his food, he might easily have made himself an amends for the unfruitfulness of the earth, by the many good things which nature had provided for him. The dominion, therefore, which God at first gave mankind over brute animals could not extend to their slaying them for food, since another kind of diet was enjoined them; nor could the distinction of clean and unclean respect them as things to be eaten, but as things to be sacrificed. The first permission to eat them was given to Noah and his sons, and is plainly a distinct branch of power, from what God grants when he tells them, ² 'The fear of you, and the dread of you, shall be upon every beast of the earth,' &c.

If it be asked, For what reason God should indulge Noah and his posterity in the eating of flesh after the flood, which he had never permitted before it? the most probable answer is—That he therefore did it, because fruits, when he introduces Pythagoras, a great inquirer into the ancient and primitive practices of the world, expressing himself in this manner:—

But that old time which we the golden call,
Was blessed with every useful fruit, and all Those flowery herbs which beautify the ground,
By Nature's hand were thickly strewn around.
No land was then defiled with human gore,
The birds unhurt through airy space might soar;
The timorous hare might widely, dauntless, roam,
Gambol its fill, make every field its home;
No wily fisher snared the funny tribe,
Lured from their homes by his deceitful bribe;
Fraud and deceit were wholly yet unknown,
On every land peace raised her golden throne.

Met. 50, 15.

Porphyry, in his book on Abstinence, asserts the same thing, namely, that in the golden age no flesh of beasts was eaten, and he is to be pardoned in what he adds afterwards, namely, that war and famine introduced this practice. He was not acquainted with Genesis; he knew not that God's order to Noah after the flood was, 'that every living creature should be meat for him.'—Edwards' Survey of Religion, vol. 1, p. 117.

the earth was corrupted by the deluge, and the virtue of its herbs, and plants, and other vegetables, sadly impaired by the saltness and long continuance of the waters, so that they could not yield that wholesome and solid nutriment which they did before: Though others rather think, that God indulged them in this, ³ 'because of the hardness of their hearts;' and that, perceiving the eagerness of their appetites towards carnal food, and designing withal to abbreviate the term of human life, he gave them a free license to eat it; but knowing at the same time that it was less salutary than the natural products of the earth, he thence took occasion to accomplish his will and determination of having the period of human life made much shorter. Nor is the reason which ⁴ Theodoret assigns for God's changing the diet of men from the fruits of the earth to the flesh of animals much amiss, viz., 'That foreknowing, in future ages, they would idolize his creatures, he might aggravate the absurdity, and make it more ridiculous so to do, by their consuming at their tables that to which they sacrificed at their altars; since nothing is more absurd than to worship what we eat.'

It cannot be denied, indeed, but that the grant of dominion which God gave Adam in his state of innocence is now much impaired; and that the creatures, which to him were submissive through love, by us must be used with severity, and subjected by fear. But still it is no small happiness to us that we know how to subdue them; that the horse and the ox patiently submit to the bridle and the yoke; and such creatures as are less governable, we have found out expedients to reclaim. For though man's strength be comparatively small, yet is there no creature in the earth, sea, or air, but what, ^a by some stratagem or other, he can put in subjection under him.

But ⁵ 'canst thou draw out leviathan with an hook? or his tongue with a cord which thou lettest down? Canst thou put an hook into his nose? or bore his jaw through with a spear? Will he make many supplications unto thee? Will he speak soft words unto thee? Wilt thou take him for a servant for ever?' All these questions, how expressive soever of the several qualities of this portentous creature, may nevertheless be answered in the affirmative, viz. That how large soever in bulk, and how tremendous soever in strength this animal may be, yet the Greenland fishermen, who every year return with

^a This superiority of man over all other creatures, his holding them in subjection, and making them subservient to his uses, we find elegantly described by Oppianus, in the following verses:—

There is not in the universe a nobler thing than man,
The deathless sons of heaven alone before him take the van;
The potentate of all below, he holds his regal rod,
And earth with all its habitants bend to his lofty nod.
How many a fury-breathing brute, that roams the mountain brow,
Has fallen a prey to ravenous birds, struck by his deadly blow;
How many of these winged tribes that sweep the clouds and sky,
Are victims to the shaft of death, aimed by his piercing eye.
Though pigmy be his form, indeed, yet the lion's lordly might,
Can't free it from his well-wrought snares, nor th' eagle's airy flight Ensure it freedom from his grasp; the strongest feel his chain,

Must yield to him its boundless strength—a slave for evermore
The patient labour-bearing mule, must still its fate deplore.

its spoils, do literally perform what our author seems to account impossible; they ¹ 'fill his skin with barbed irons, and his head with fish-spears, and so they play with him as with a bird; they bind him for their maidens, and part him among their merchants.'

In short, God has implanted in all creatures a fear and dread of man. ² This is the thing which keeps wolves out of our towns and lions out of our streets; and though the sharpness of hunger, or violence of rage, may at certain times make them forget their natural instinct (as the like causes have sometimes divested man of his reason), yet no sooner are these causes removed, but they return to their ordinary temper again, without pursuing their advantage, or combining with their fellow-brutes to rise up in rebellion against man, their lord and master.

^a Some modern writers of no small note are clearly of opinion, that the Ararat where the ark rested was mount Caucasus, not far from China, where Noah and some part of his family settled, without travelling to Shinar, or having any hand in the building of Babel; and the arguments they alleged for the support of this opinion are such as these:—That the Mosaic history is altogether silent as to the peopling of China at the dispersion, and wholly confines itself within the bounds of the then known world; that the Chinese language and writing are so entirely different from those among us (introduced by the confusion at Babel), that it cannot well be supposed they were ever derived from them; and that (taking their first king Fohi and Noah to be the same person) there are several ^b traditions relating to them, wherein they seem to agree, that the reign of Fohi coincides with the times of Noah, and the lives of his successors correspond with the men of the same ages recorded in Scripture; and from hence they infer, that the true reason why Moses makes so little mention of Noah, in the times subsequent to the flood, is this, That he lived at too great a distance, and had no share in the transactions of the nations round about Shinar, to whom alone, after the dispersion of mankind, he is known to confine his history. This indeed is solving the difficulty at once: but then, as this opinion is only conjectural, the histories and records of China are of a very uncertain and precarious authority, and such as are reputed genuine of no older date than some few centuries before the birth of Christ, ^c the major part of the learned world has supposed, either that Noah, settled in the country of Armenia, did not remove from thence, nor had any concern in the work of Babel, and so falls not under the historian's consideration; or that, if he did remove with the rest into the plains of Shinar, being now superannuated and unfit for action, the administration of things was committed to other hands, which made his name and authority the less taken notice of.

It must be acknowledged, however, that the design of the sacred penman is to be very succinct in his account of the affairs of this period, because he is hastening to the history of Abraham, the great founder of the Jewish nation, and whose life and adventures he thinks himself concerned, upon that account, to relate more at large. However this be, it is certain, from the tenor of his writing, that he is far from leading us into any suspicion of his having a private malignity to Noah's character. He informs us, that, amidst the corruption of the antediluvian world, he preserved himself immaculate, and did therefore 'find favour in the sight of God,' and was admitted to the honour of his immediate converse: that, to preserve him from the general destruction, God instructed him how to build a vessel of security, undertook the care and conduct of it himself, and, amidst the ruins of a sinking world, landed it safe on one of the mountains of Armenia; that, as soon as the deluge was over, God accepted of his homage and sacrifice, and not only renewed to him the same charter which he had originally granted to our first progenitor, but over and above that, gave him an enlargement of his diet which he had not granted to any before; and with him made an everlasting covenant, never to destroy the world by water any more, whereof he constituted his bow in the clouds to be a glorious symbol. In this point of light it is that Moses has all along placed the patriarch's character; and therefore, if in the conclusion of it he was forced to shade it with one act of intemperance, this, we may reasonably conclude, proceeded from no other passion but his love of truth; and to every impartial reader must be ^d a strong argument of his veracity, in that he has

Jones has shown it to be in the highest degree probable that the Chinese empire was not founded at an earlier period than the 12th century before the Christian era; and that the people themselves, far from being aborigines, are a mixed race descended from Hindoos and Tartars. During the life of Noah, he and his family, are supposed to have lived agricultural lives, in the fertile plain of Armenia, at the foot of mount Ararat, which according to Tournefort, is a most delightful region—still famous for its vines; and there the venerable patriarch died 350 years after the deluge, but long before the impious rebellion of part of his descendants in the plain Shinar, which introduced into the world the confusion of tongues. Where Dr Shuckford met with the Chinese history which he quotes I know not; but Sir William Jones has proved, by the testimony of Confucius himself, that no historical monument then existed in China of events of an earlier date than 1100 years before our era. The stories of Fohi's conception by the rainbow, and his having reared seven sorts of animals for sacrifice, certainly do not appear to have been derived by tradition from Noah's preservation in the ark; but that tradition passed into China from Hindostan, where, in the most ancient writings, many accounts of the deluge are still preserved.—See Asiatic Researches, vol. ii. mem. 25, and Hales's Analysis, &c. vol. 1.—ED.

^d To confirm in some measure, the truth of this account of Moses, we have an heathen story, which seems to have sprang from some tradition concerning it; for it tells us, that on a certain day, Myrrha, wife, or (as others say) nurse to Hammon, and mother of Adonis, having her son in her company, found Cygnists sleeping in the tent, all uncovered, and in an

^b Thus, in the Chinese history, Fohi is said to have had no father, which agrees well enough with Noah, because the memory of his father might be lost in the deluge; that Fohi's mother conceived him as she was encompassed with a rainbow, which seems to allude to the rainbow's first appearing to Noah after the flood; and that Fohi carefully bred up seven sorts of creatures which he used to sacrifice to the supreme Spirit of heaven and earth, which is an imperfect tradition of Noah's taking into the ark of every clean beast by sevens, and of his making use of none but these in all his burnt-offerings.—Shuckford's Connect. b. 2.

^c There seems to be no foundation whatever for the hypothesis that Noah was the founder of the Chinese monarchy, or indeed that he ever saw the country known by that name. Sir William interspersed the faults with the commendations of his worthies, and, through his whole history, drawn no one character so very fair, as not to leave some blemishes, some instances of human frailty still abiding on it. And indeed, if we consider the thing rightly, we shall find it an act of singular kindness, and benefit to us, that God has ordered the faults and miscarriages of his saints so constantly to be recorded in Scripture; since 'they are written for our instruction,' to remind us of our frailty, and to alarm our caution and fear.

Noah, we read, had escaped the pollutions of the old world, and approved his fidelity to God in every trying juncture; and yet we see him here falling of his own accord, and shamefully overcome in a time of security and peace, when he had no temptations to beset him, nor any boon companions to allure him to excess: and therefore his example calls perpetually upon ¹ 'him that thinketh he standeth, to take heed lest he fall.' More especially it informs us, that ² 'wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging, and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise;' and therefore it exhorts, in the words of the wise man, ³ 'Look not thou upon wine when it is red, when it giveth its colour in the cup, when it moveth itself aright. At the last it will bite like a serpent, and sting like an adder. Thine eyes shall behold strange women, and thine heart shall utter perverse things: yea, thou shalt be as he that lieth down in the midst of the sea, and as he that lieth upon the top of a mast.'

There is not however all the reason that is imagined to suppose that Noah was drunk to any such excessive degree. The same word which is here used occurs ⁴ in another place in this book of Genesis; where we read, that Joseph's brethren drank and were merry with him; ⁵ and yet the circumstances of the entertainment will not suffer us to think that they indulged themselves in any excess, in the presence of him whom, as yet, they knew to be no other than the governor of Egypt. And, in like manner, if we may be allowed to take the word here in an innocent sense, its import will only be, that Noah drank of the wine plentifully perhaps, but not to a debauch, and so fell asleep. For we must observe, that Moses's design is, not to accuse Noah of intemperance, but only to show upon what occasion it was that the Canaanites, whom the people under his command were now going to engage, were accused, and reprobated by God, even from the days of Noah, and consequently in more likelihood to fall into their hands.

Without perplexing ourselves therefore to find out such excuses as several interpreters have devised; as, that Noah was unacquainted with the nature of the vine in general, ⁶ or with the effects of this in particular, or that the age and infirmity of his body, or the deep concern and melancholy of his mind, made him liable to be overcome with a very little; we may adventure to say, that he drank plentifully without impeaching his sobriety; and that, while he was asleep, he chanced to be uncovered, without any stain upon his modesty. There is a great deal of difference between satiety and intemperance, between refreshing nature and debauching it; and considering withal that the fashion of men's habits was at that time loose, (as they were likewise in subsequent ages before the use of breeches was found out) such an accident might have easily happened without the imputation of any harm.

⁵ The Jewish doctors are generally of opinion, that Canaan, ⁶ having first discovered his grandfather's nakedness, made himself merry therewith, and afterwards exposed it to the scorn of his father. Whoever the person was, it is certain that he is called the younger, ⁶ or little son of Noah, which cannot well agree with Ham, because he was neither little, nor his younger son, but the second, or middlemost, as he is always placed: ⁷ nor does it seem so pertinent to the matter in hand, to mention the order of his birth, but very fit (if he speaks of his grandson) to distinguish him from the rest. So that, if it was Canaan who treated his grandsire in this unworthy manner, the application of the curse to him, who was first in the offence, is far from being a mistake in Noah. It is no random anathema, which he let fly at all adventures, but a cool, deliberate denunciation, which proceeded not from a spirit of indignation, but of prophecy. The history indeed takes notice of this malediction, immediately upon Noah's awaking out of his sleep, and being informed of what had happened; but this is occasioned by its known brevity, which (as we have often remarked) relates things as instantly successive, when a considerable space of time ought to interfere. In all by him; and, as some have imagined, that the tree of knowledge of good and evil was a vine; so by the description given thereof, and the fatal consequences attending it, there seems to be a plain allusion to it, and some reason to believe, that it was one and the same tree, by which the nakedness both of Adam and Noah was exposed to derision.—Targ. Jonah.

indecent posture. She ran immediately, and informed Hammon of it; he gave notice of it to his brothers, who, to prevent the confusion which Cynistas might be in to find himself naked, covered him with something. Cynistas, understanding what had passed, cursed Adonis, and pursued Myrrha into Arabia; where, after having wandered nine months, she was changed into a tree, which bears myrrh. Hammon and Ham are the same person, and so are Adonis and Canaan.—Calmet's Dictionary on the word Ham.

^a It is a Jewish tradition or allegory, that the vine which Noah planted was not of ordinary terrestrial growth, but was carried down the river out of Paradise, or at least out of Eden, and found probability these predictions of Noah, which point out the different fates of his posterity, were such as¹ we find "Jacob pronouncing over his sons a little before his death; and it is not unlikely that the common opinion, of Noah's dividing the earth among his, might take its original from these last words that we read of him, which were certainly accomplished in their event.

The curse upon Canaan² is, that he should be a servant to Shem; and,³ about 800 (or, according to Dr Hales, 1546) years after this, did not the Israelites, descendants of Shem, take possession of the land of Canaan, subdue thirty of its kings, destroy most of its inhabitants, lay heavy tributes upon the remainder, and, by oppressions of one kind or other, oblige some to flee into Egypt,⁴ others into Africa, and others into Greece? He was doomed likewise to be a servant to Japhet; and did not the Greeks and Romans, descended from Japhet, utterly destroy the relics of Canaan, who fled to Tyre, built by the Sidonians; to Thebes, built by Cadmus; and to Carthage, built by Dido? For who has not heard of the conquests of the Romans over the Africans?

The blessing upon Japhet is, that his territories should be enlarged;⁵ and can we think otherwise, when (as we shall show anon) not only all Europe, and the Lesser Asia, but Media likewise, and part of Armenia, Iberia, Albania, and the vast regions towards the north, which anciently the Scythians, but now the Tartars, inhabit, fell to the share of his posterity? It was likewise declared, that he should dwell in the tents of Shem; and is it not notorious that the Greeks and Romans invaded and conquered that part of Asia where the posterity of Shem had planted themselves; that both Alexander and Cæsar were masters of Jerusalem, and made all the countries thereabout tributary? "You," says⁶ Justin Martyr, (speaking to Trypho the Jew concerning his nation,) "who are descended from Shem, concerning as God had appointed, came into the land of the children of Canaan and made it your own; and, in like manner, according to the Divine decree, the sons of Japhet (the Romans) have broken in upon you, seized upon your whole country, and still keep possession of it. Thus the sons of Shem," says he, "have overpowered and reduced the Canaanite; and the sons of Japhet have subdued the sons of Shem, and made them their vassals; so that the posterity of Canaan are become, in a literal sense, servants of servants."

But, in the blessing bestowed upon Shem, why the God of Shem, you will say, and not the God of Japhet?⁷ They were both of them equally observant of their father, and joined in the pious office that they did him. The preference, if any, was due to the first-born; and therefore we may presume, that if the blessing here, peculiar to Shem, had been any part of a temporal covenant, or any thing in the power of his father to bestow, he would have conferred it on Japhet. But as the apostle to the Hebrews tells us,⁸ "that he was heir of righteousness which is by faith," he foresaw that in Seth's family God would settle his church; that of his seed Christ should be born according to the flesh; and that the covenant which should restore man to himself and to his Maker, should be conveyed through his posterity. And this accounts for the preference given to Shem; for Noah spake not of his own choice, but declared the counsel of God, who had now, as he frequently did afterwards, "chosen the younger before the elder."

Thus it appears upon inquiry, that these prophecies of Noah were not the fumes of indigested liquor, but⁹ the words of truth and soberness: and though their sense was not so apparent at the time of their being pronounced, yet their accomplishment has now explained their meaning, and verified that observation of the apostle (which very probably alludes to the very predictions now before us). "No prophecy is of any private interpretation, for the prophecy came not of old time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."

CHAP. IV.—Of the Prohibition of Blood.

THE grant which God was pleased to give Noah and his posterity, to eat the flesh of all living creatures, has this remarkable restriction in it,¹⁰ "But the flesh, with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall you not eat."¹¹ Whether this prohibition related to the eating of things

⁶ Mr Bruce has given a very satisfactory account of the practice of eating blood in Abyssinia. This custom, so prevalent in several places, is forbidden in the Scriptures. A recital of the narrative will probably suggest to the reader the reasons of the prohibition. Mr Bruce tells us, that not long after our losing

^a That which may confirm us in this opinion is,—That Jacob, when he calleth his children together, acquaints them, that his purpose is 'to tell them that which shall befall them in the last days;' and that he does not always presage blessings, but sometimes ill luck to their posterity, and (in the same manner that Noah does) now and then drops a note of his displeasure, according as their behaviour has been; for thus he says of Simon and Levi, in regard to the slaughter of the Shechemites, 'Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce, and their wrath, for it was cruel,' Gen. xlix. 7.

^b Dr Hales, who perfectly agrees with our author, that the curse was pronounced on Canaan only, and not on Ham and his descendants generally, and who has a long dissertation on the subject, second edition, pp. 344—318, justly remarks, that the curse denounced against Canaan's posterity, to be 'servant of servants,' the lowest of servants, even slaves, to their brethren in general, did not affect individuals, nor even nations, so long as they continued righteous. In Abraham's days Melchisedek, whose name was expressive of his character, signifying 'king of righteousness,' was a worthy and revered 'priest of the most high God.' And Abimelech, whose name denotes 'parental king,' pleaded the integrity of his heart, and righteousness of his nation before God; and his plea was accepted. Yet they appear to have been Canaanites. (See Gen. xiv. 18—20; xv. 16; xx. 4—9.) At the same time the impieties and abominations of their neighbours, in the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, &c., drew down the signal vengeance of Heaven in their overthrow.—Eh.

^c Procopius (on the Vandal war, b. ii. c. 10) tells us, that, in the province of Tingitana, and in the very ancient city of Tingis, which was founded by them, there are two great pillars to be seen, of white stone, erected near a large fountain, with an inscription in Phœnician characters, to this purpose, "We are people preserved by flight, from that rover Jesus, the son of Nave, who pursued us." And what makes it very probable that they bent their flight this way, is the great agreement, and almost identity, of the Punic with the Canaanitish, or Hebrew language.—Calmet's Dictionary on the word Canaan.

strangled, and such as died of themselves, in which the blood was settled,¹ as some will have it, or to the eating of the flesh of creatures reeking in blood, and their limbs cut off, while they themselves were yet alive,² as others imagine, is not so material here to inquire, since the former was prohibited by subsequent laws, both³ in the Jewish and Christian church, and the latter was a practice too abhorrent to human nature, one would think, to need any prohibition at all. Whether, therefore, it be blood congealed, or blood mingled in the flesh, that is here primarily intended, the injunction must at least equally extend to blood simple and unmixed; nor can any interpretation imaginable be more natural and obvious than this: 'Though I give you the flesh of every creature, that you shall think proper to make use of for food, yet I do not, at the same time, give you the blood with it. The blood is the life, or vehicle, or chief instrument of life in every creature; it must therefore be reserved for another use, and not be eaten.'

This is the true sense of the prohibition, compared with those parts of the Levitical law, wherein we find it re-enjoined: but then the question is, whether this injunction be obligatory upon us now, under the dispensation of the gospel? or whether the gospel, which is the law of liberty, has set us free from any such observance? and a question it is, that ought the rather to be determined, because some have made it a matter of no small scruple to themselves, whilst others have passed it by with neglect, as a law of temporary duration only, and now quite abrogated.

That therefore the reader may, in this matter, chiefly judge for himself, I shall fairly state the arguments on both sides; and, when I have done this, by a short examination into the merits of each evidence, endeavour to convince myself and others, on which side of the question it is that truth preponderates, and consequently, what ought to be the practice of every good Christian in relation to this law.

Those who maintain the lawfulness of eating blood, do not deny, but that this prohibition obliged Noah and his posterity, that is, all mankind, to the time of the promulgation of the law; do not deny, but that, at the giving of the law, this prohibition was renewed, and more explicit reasons were given for the observation of it; nay, do not deny,

"sight of the ruins of this ancient capital of Abyssinia, we overtook three travellers driving a cow before them; they had black goat skins upon their shoulders, and lances and shields in their hands; in other respects they were but thinly clothed; they appeared to be soldiers. The cow did not seem to be fatted for killing, and it occurred to us all, that it had been stolen. This, however, was not our business, nor was such an occurrence at all remarkable in a country so long engaged in war. We saw that our attendants attached themselves in a particular manner to the three soldiers that were driving the cow, and held a short conversation with them. Soon after, we arrived at the highest bank of the river, where I thought we were to pitch our tent: the drivers suddenly tript up the cow, and gave the poor animal a very rude fall upon the ground, which was but the beginning of her sufferings. One of them sat across her neck, holding down her head by the horns, the other twisted the halter about her fore feet, while the third, who had a knife in his hand, to my great surprise, in place of taking her by the throat, got astride upon her belly, before her hind legs, and gave her a very deep wound in the upper part of the buttock. From the time I had seen them throw the beast upon the ground I had rejoiced, thinking that when three people were killing a cow, they must have agreed to sell part of her to us; and I was much disappointed upon hearing the Abyssinians say, that we were to pass the river to the other side, and not encamp where I intended. Upon my proposing they should bargain for part of the cow, my men answered, what they had already learned in conversation, that they were not then to kill her; that she was not wholly theirs, and they could not sell her. This awakened my curiosity; I let my people go forward, and staid myself, till I saw, with the utmost astonishment, two pieces, thicker and longer than our ordinary beef steaks, cut out of the higher part of the buttock of the beast: how it was done, I cannot positively say."—Travels, vol. iii., p. 112.

"We have an instance in the life of Saul, that shows the propensity of the Israelites to this crime. Saul's army, after a battle, few, that is, fell voraciously upon the cattle they had taken, and threw them upon the ground to cut off their flesh, and eat them raw; so that the army was defiled by eating blood, or living animals, 1 Sam. xiv. 33. To prevent this, Saul caused to be rolled to him a great stone, and ordered those that killed their oxen, to cut their throats upon that stone. This was the only lawful way of killing animals for food; the tying of the ox, and throwing it upon the ground, was not permitted as equivalent. The Israelites did probably in that case, as the Abyssinians do at this day; they cut a part of its throat, so that blood might be seen on the ground, but nothing mortal to the animal followed from that wound; but after laying his head upon a large stone, and cutting his throat, the blood fell from on high, or was poured on the ground like water, and sufficient evidence appeared that the creature was dead, before it was attempted to eat it. We have seen that the Abyssinians came from Palestine a very few years after this, and we are not to doubt, that they then carried with them this, with many other Jewish customs, which they have continued to this day."—Bruce's Travels, vol. iii., p. 299.

To corroborate the account given by Mr Bruce, in these extracts, it may be satisfactory to affix what Mr Antes has said upon the subject, in his observations on the manners and customs of the Egyptians, p. 17. "When Mr Bruce returned from Abyssinia, I was at Grand Cairo. I had the pleasure of his company for three months almost every day; and having, at that time, myself an idea of penetrating into Abyssinia, I was very inquisitive about that country, on hearing many things from him which seemed almost incredible to me; I heard many eye-witnesses often speak of the Abyssinians eating raw meat. I shall proceed to relate one of those occurrences which Mr Pearce himself witnessed.

"On the 7th of February, he went out with a party of Lasta soldiers on one of their marauding expeditions, and in the course of the day they got possession of several head of cattle, with which, towards evening, they made the best of their way back to the camp. They had then fasted for many hours, and still a considerable distance remained for them to travel. Under these circumstances, a soldier attached to the party, proposed cutting out the "ghulada" from one of the cows they were driving before them, to satisfy the cravings of their hunger. This term Mr Pearce did not at first understand, but he was not long left in doubt upon the subject; for, the others having assented, they laid hold of the animal by the horns, threw it down, and proceeded without farther ceremony to the operation. This consisted in cutting out two pieces of flesh from the buttock, near the tail, which, together, Mr Pearce supposed, might weigh about a pound. As soon as they had taken these way, they sewed up the wounds, plastered them over with cow dung, and drove the animal forwards, while they divided among their party the still reeking steaks.

They wanted Mr Pearce to partake of this meat, raw as it came from the cow, but he was too much disgusted with the scene to comply with their offer; though he declared he was so hungry at the time, that he could without remorse have eaten raw flesh, had the animal been killed in the ordinary way; a practice which I may here observe, he never could before be induced to adopt, notwithstanding its being general throughout the country. The animal, after this barbarous operation, walked somewhat lame, but nevertheless managed to reach the camp without any apparent injury, and immediately after their arrival it was killed by the Woorari, and consumed for their supper."—Salt's Voyage to Abyssinia, p. 295.

but that under the gospel it was enjoined by a very competent authority, to some particular Christians at least, for some determinate time. But then they contend, that, during these several periods, there could be no moral obligation in the injunction, but that, (setting aside the divine authority,) 'neither if they did eat, were they the worse, neither if they did not eat, were they the better.'

For, if there was any moral turpitude in the act of eating blood, or things commixed with blood, how comes it to pass, say they, that, though God prohibited his own people the Jews, yet he suffered other nations to eat² any thing that died of itself, and consequently had the blood settled in it? If³ meat commendeth us to God, the same Providence, which took care to restrain the Jews⁴ (for is he the God of the Jews only, is he not also of the Gentiles?) from what was detestable to him, as well as abhorrent to human nature, would have laid the same inhibition upon all mankind; at least he would not have enjoined his own people to give to a proselyte of the gate, or to sell to an alien, or heathen, such meat as would necessarily ensnare them in sin.

The law, therefore, which enjoined Noah and his children to abstain from blood, must necessarily have been a law peculiar to that time only. ⁵Cain, in the first age of the world, had slain Abel, while there were but few persons in it: God had now destroyed all mankind except eight persons; and, to prevent the fate of Abel from befalling any of them, he forbids murder under a capital punishment; and to this purpose, forbids the use of blood, as a proper guard upon human life in the infancy of the world. Under the Mosaic covenant he renews this law, indeed, but then he establishes it upon another foundation, and makes blood therefore prohibited, because he had appointed it⁶ 'to be offered upon the altar, and to make an atonement for men's souls; for it is the blood,' saith he, 'that maketh an atonement for the soul;' and what was reserved for religious purposes, was not at that time convenient to be ate. But now that these purposes are answered, and these sacrifices are at an end, the reason of our abstinence has ceased, and consequently our abstinence itself is no longer a duty.

Blood, we allow, had still something more sacred in it; it was a type of the sacrifice of Christ, who was to be offered upon the altar of his cross; but that oblation being now made, the reason of its appropriation, and being withheld from common use, is now no more. And though the council at Jerusalem made a decree, even subsequent to the sacrifice of Christ, that the brethren, who were of the Gentiles, should abstain from things strangled, and from blood; yet before we can determine any thing from this injunction, the occasion, place, time, and other circumstances of it, must be carefully looked into.

The occasion of the decree was this—while Paul and Barnabas were preaching the gospel at Antioch, certain persons, converted from Judaism, came down from Jerusalem, and very probably pretending a commission from the apostles, declared it their opinion, that whoever embraced the Christian religion, was obliged, at the same time, to be circumcised, and observe the whole law.

The place, where the question arose, was Antioch, where (as Josephus tells us) there was a famous Jewish university, full of proselytes of the gate, as they were called, and who, in all probability, were converted by the men of Cyprus and Cyrene, who were among those that were dispersed at the first persecution,⁷ which immediately ensued the martyrdom of Stephen.

The persons who moved this question, were⁸ some of the sect of the Pharisees, converted to Christianity, but still so prejudiced in favour of their old religion, or at least of the divine rite of circumcision, that they thought there was no coming to Christ without entering in at that gate.

The persons to whom the question related, were proselytes of the gate, that is, Gentiles by birth, but who had renounced the heathen religion, as to all idolatry, and were thereupon permitted to live in Palestine, or wherever the Jews inhabited; and had several privileges allowed them, upon condition that they would observe the laws of society, and conform to certain injunctions, that⁹ Moses had prescribed them.

The time when this question arose, was not long after the conversion of Cornelius; so that this body of proselytes was, very probably, the first large number of Gentiles that were received into the Christian church, and this the first time that the question was agitated,—whether the proselytes of the gate, who, as the zealots pretended, could not so much as live among the Jews, without circumcision, could be allowed to be a part of the Christian church without it?

Under these circumstances the council at Jerusalem convened, and accordingly made their decree, that the proselytes of the gate (for it is persons of this denomination only which their decree concerns) 'should¹⁰ abstain from the meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication;' the very things which,¹² according to the law of Moses, they engaged themselves to abstain from, when they were first admitted to the privilege of sojourning among the Jews. So that, in effect, the decree did no more than declare the opinion of those who made it, to those to whom it was sent, namely, that Christianity did not alter the condition of the proselytes in respect of their civil obligations, but that, as they were bound by these laws or Moses before their conversion, so were they still; and, consequently, that the sense of St Paul is the same with the sense of the council at that time: ¹³'let every one abide in the calling,' that is, in the civil state and condition wherein he is called. But, supposing the decree to extend farther than the proselytes of Antioch, yet there was another reason why the council at Jerusalem should determine in this manner, and that was, the strong aversion which they knew the Jewish converts would have conceived against the Gentiles, had they been indulged the liberty of eating blood; and, therefore, to compromise the matter, they laid on them this prudent restraint, from the same principle that we find St Paul declaring himself in this manner: ¹¹'Though I am free from all men, yet have I made myself a servant unto all, that I might gain the more. Unto the Jew, I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jew; to the weak, became I as weak, that I might gain the weak. I am made all things to all men, that I might, by all means, save some.'

Nay, admitting the decree was not made with this view, yet, being founded on laws which concerned the Jewish polity only, it could certainly last no longer than the government lasted; and, consequently, ever since the temple worship has expired, and the Jews have ceased to be a political body, it must have been repealed; and accordingly, if we look into the gospel, say they, we may there find a repeal of it in full form. For therein we are told,¹ that 'the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost;'² that 'meat commendeth us not unto God;'³ that 'what goeth into the mouth, defileth not the man;'⁴ that 'to the pure, all things are pure; and'⁵ 'that there is nothing unclean of itself, but only to him, that esteemeth it to be unclean, it is unclean; for every creature of God is good, and nothing is to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving, for it is sanctified with the word of God and prayer;'⁶ and therefore we are ordered,⁷ that 'whatever is sold in the shambles, even though it be a thing offered to idols, that to eat, asking no questions for conscience sake;' and are told, that⁸ 'whoever commandeth us to abstain from meats, which God has created to be received with thanksgiving of them that believe, and know the truth,' ought to be ranked in the number of seducers.

In a word, the very genius of the Christian religion, say they, is a charter of liberty, and a full exemption from the law of Moses. It debars us from nothing but what has a moral turpitude in it, or at least, what is too base and abject for a man, that has the revelation of a glorious and immortal life in the world to come: and, as there is no tendency of this kind in the eating of blood, they therefore conclude that this decree of the apostles, either concerned the⁹ Jewish proselytes only, who, in virtue of the obedience they owed to the civil laws of Palestine, were to abstain from blood; or obliged none but the Gentiles of Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia, to whom it was directed; was calculated for a certain season only, either to prevent giving offence to the Jews, who were then captious, or to reconcile Gentile and Jewish converts, who were then at some variance; but was to last no longer than till the Jews and Gentiles were formed into one communion. So that now the prohibition given by God to Noah, the laws given by Moses to the Israelites, and the decree sent by the apostles to the Christians at Antioch, are all repealed and gone, and a full license given to us to eat blood with the same indifference as any other food; if so be we thereby¹⁰ 'give no offence to our weaker brethren, for whom Christ died.'

Those who maintain the contrary opinion, namely, that the eating of blood, in any guise whatever, is wicked and unlawful, found the chief of their arguments upon the limitation of the grant given to Noah, the reasons that are commonly devised for the prohibition, and the literal sense of the apostolic decree.

¹¹ When princes give grants of lands to any of their subjects, say they, they usually reserve some royalties (such as the mines, or minerals) to themselves, as memorials of their own sovereignty, and the other's dependence. If the grant, indeed, be given without any reserve, the mines and minerals may be supposed to be included in it; but when it is thus expressly limited, 'You shall have such and such lordships and manors, but you shall not have the mines and minerals with the lands, for several good reasons specified in the patent,' it must needs be an odd turn of thought to imagine that the grantee has any title to them; and yet this is a parallel case: for, when God has thus declared his will to the children of men, 'You shall have the flesh of every creature for food, but you shall not eat the blood with it,' it is every whit as strange an inference, to deduce from hence a general right to eat blood.

The commandment given to Adam, is,¹² 'Of every tree in the garden thou shalt freely eat; but of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat.' This is the first law; and the second is like unto it,¹³ 'Every moving thing, that moveth, shall be meat for you; even as the green herb, have I given you all things; but flesh, with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall you not eat.' This, upon his donation both to Adam and Noah, God manifestly reserves to himself, as an acknowledgment of his right to be duly paid; and when it was relaxed or repealed, say they, we cannot tell.

Nay, so far from being repealed, that it is not only in his words to Noah that God has declared this inhibition, but in the law, delivered by his servant Moses, he has explained his mind more fully concerning it. ¹⁴ 'Whatever man there is, of the house of Israel, or of the strangers, that sojourn among you, that eateth any manner of blood, I will even set my face against that soul, and will cut him off from among his people.' This is a severe censure, say they; and therefore observe, how oft, in another place, he reiterates the injunction, as it were with one breath. ¹⁵ 'Only be sure that thou eat not the blood, for the blood is the life, and thou mayest not eat the life with the flesh. Thou shalt not eat it; thou shalt pour it upon the earth, as water; thou shalt not eat it, that it may go well with thee and thy children after thee.'

Now there are several reasons, continue they, why God should be so importunate in this prohibition: for, having appointed the blood of his creatures to be offered for the sins of men, he therefore requires, that it should be religiously set apart for that purpose; and, having prohibited the sin of murder under a severe penalty, he therefore guards against it, by previously forbidding the eating of blood, lest that should be an inlet to savageness and cruelty.

The Scythians (as¹⁶ Herodotus assures us) from drinking the blood of their cattle, proceeded to drink the blood of their enemies; and were remarkable for nothing so much as their horrid and brutal actions. The animals that feed on blood are perceived to be much more furious than others that do not; and thereupon they observe that blood is a very hot, inflaming food, that such foods create cholera, and that cholera easily kindleth into cruelty. Nay, they observe farther, that eating of blood gave occasion to one kind of early idolatry among the Zabii in the east, namely, the worship of demons, whose food, as they imagined, was blood; and therefore they who adored them, had communion with them by eating the same food. Good reason, therefore, say they, had God in the gospel, as well as the law, to prevent a practice, which he could not but foresee would be attended with such pernicious effects.

For the apostolic decree, as they argue farther, did not relate to one sect of people only, the proselytes of the gate, who were lately converted to Christianity; nor was it directed to some particular places only, and with a design to answer some particular ends, the prevention of offence, or the reconciliation of contending parties; to subsist for a determinate time, and then to lose all its obligation: but it concerned all Christians, in all nations, and in all future ages of the church, was enacted for a general use and intent, and has never since been repealed. And to support these assertions, they proceed in this method:—

Before the passing of this decree, say they, St Paul preached Christianity to the whole body of the Gentiles at Antioch. For he had not long preached in the synagogues, before the Gentiles¹ besought him, that he would preach to them the same words, that is, the doctrine of Jesus Christ, on the next Sabbath-day; and accordingly we are told, that, on 'the Sabbath-day, came almost the whole city together to hear the word of God;' which certainly implies a concourse of people, more than the proselytes of the gate, nay more than the whole body of the Jews, who were but a handful in comparison of the rest of the inhabitants of that great city; and that this large company was chiefly made up of Gentiles, the sequel of the history informs us. For when the² Jews saw the multitude they were filled with envy, and spake against those things which were spoken by Paul, contradicting and blaspheming. Then Paul and Barnabas waxed bold, and said, it was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you, but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles. For so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles, that thou shouldst be for salvation unto the ends of the earth. And when the Gentiles heard this they were glad, and glorified the word of the Lord; and as many as were ordained to eternal life believed; and the word of the Lord was published throughout all the region.³

Now this transaction at Antioch, say they, happened seven years before the decree against blood and things strangled was passed at Jerusalem; and therefore as the Gentiles, not in Antioch only, but in all the region round about, were no strangers to the doctrine of Jesus Christ, there is reason to suppose that this decree, when passed, was not confined to one particular set of men, but directed to all Gentile converts at large. For hear what the president of the council says upon this occasion;³ 'Wherefore my sentence is, that we trouble not them, who from among the Gentiles are turned to God; but that we write unto them, that they abstain from pollutions of idols, and from fornication, and from things strangled, and from blood: for Moses of old time hath in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogue every Sabbath-day.'

My sentence (says the apostle) is, that ye write unto the Gentile converts upon these points; 'For Moses has those of old in every city that preach him,' that is, there is no necessity of writing to any Jewish convert, or any proselyte convert to Christianity, to abstain from these things, because all that are admitted into synagogues (as the proselytes were) know all these things sufficiently already. And accordingly, upon this sentence of St James, the decree was founded and directed (according to the nature of the thing) to those whom it was fitting and necessary to inform in these points, that is, to those who were unacquainted with the writings of Moses.

The letter, indeed, which contained the decree, was directed to the brethren at Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia; but it would be shocking and unchristian to think, that the precepts of an apostolic epistle were obligatory to those only to whom the epistle was directed. The purport of it concerned all. It was to apprise the heathen converts to Christianity, that they were exempted from the observance of the law of Moses, except in four instances laid down in that canon; and as it was of general concern for all converts to know, the apostles, we may presume, left copies of it in all the churches: for so we are told expressly of St Paul and his companions, that,⁴ 'as they went through the cities, they delivered them the decrees to keep, which were ordained of the apostles and elders that were at Jerusalem; and so were the churches established in the faith, and increased in number daily.'

The apostles, say they, out of Christian prudence, might do many things to prevent offences, and to accommodate matters to the people's good liking: but certainly it looks below the dignity of a synod to meet, and debate, and determine a question with the greatest solemnity, merely to serve a present exigence; to leave upon record a decree which they knew would be but of temporary obligation; and yet could not but foresee would occasion endless scruples and disputes in all future ages of the church. If it was to be of so short a continuance, why was not the repeal notified, and why were not so many poor ignorant people saved, as died martyrs in the attestation of it? But, above all, how can we suppose it consistent with the honour and justice of the apostles, to impose things as necessary, which were but of transient and momentary duration?

Observe the words of the decree, cry they, 'It seemed good unto the Holy Ghost, and to us, to lay upon you no greater burden than these necessary things, namely, that ye abstain from meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication.' If these abstinences were only intended to be enjoined for a season, could they properly be enjoined under the denomination of necessary things? Is that the appellation for duties of a transient and temporary observation? Did neither the apostles nor the Holy Ghost know the distinction between necessary and expedient? Or, suppose it not convenient to make the distinction at that time, how come things of a temporary, and those of an eternal obligation, to be placed upon the same foot of necessity in the same decree? Or, were fornication and idol-pollutions to be abstained from only for a season, in compliment to the infirmity of the Jews; or in order to make up a breach between some newly initiated converts? These are absurdities, say they, which cannot be avoided, when men will assert the temporary obligation of this decree.

Some general declarations in Scripture, especially in St Paul's epistles, seem indeed like a repeal of it; but then, if we consider the scope and occasion of these declarations, we shall soon perceive that they were intended to be taken in a limited sense; otherwise they are not consistent with the decree itself. Our blessed Saviour, for instance, tells the people, that not that which goeth into the mouth defileth the man, but that which cometh out of it.¹ But now, if this declaration of his destroys the validity of the apostolic decree, it will follow, 1st, That this decree was repealed just twenty years before it was made, which is a supposition somewhat extraordinary; and, 2dly, That the whole body of the apostles did, after full debate, make a most solemn decree, and that under the influence of the Spirit of God, in direct contradiction to the express declaration of their Lord and Master, which is a little too contiguous to blasphemy; and therefore let us consider the occasion of our Saviour's words.

The Pharisees, it seems, were offended at his disciples for sitting down to meat before they had washed their hands, as being a violation of one of their traditional precepts. Whereupon our Saviour tells the company, 'Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth the man'—never meaning to give them a permission to eat any thing prohibited by the law, but only to instruct them in this,—That there was not all that religion, or profanation of religion, which the Pharisees pretended, in observing, or not observing the tradition of the elders, by eating with washed or unwashed hands; that the thing itself was of an indifferent nature; nor could a little soil taken in at the mouth, by eating with dirty hands, defile the man, because nothing of that kind could properly be called a pollution.

St Paul himself, was one of the council of Jerusalem when the prohibition of blood was ratified by the Spirit of God, and imposed on the Gentiles, who were converted to the Christian faith; and therefore we can hardly think that, in his epistles, which were written not many years after, he should go about to abolish the observation of those precepts, which, after mature deliberation, were enacted by a general assembly of the church; and therefore, when he tells us that the kingdom of God, that is, the Christian religion, 'consisteth not of meat and drink, and that meat commendeth us not unto God,' he must be understood in a comparative sense, namely, that it neither consists in, nor commendeth us so much, as holiness and purity of life. When he declares, 'that every creature of God is good, that nothing is unclean of itself, and that to the pure all things are pure,' &c., he must necessarily be understood with this restraining clause—In case there be no particular statute to the contrary; for where there is one, all the sanctity in the world will not give a man a toleration to break it: and when he complains of some men's commanding us to abstain from certain meats, as an infringement upon our Christian liberty, and a branch of the doctrine of devils; the meats which they forbade must be supposed to be lawful in their kind, and under no divine prohibition; otherwise we bring the apostles, who inhibited the use of blood, under the like imputation.

It cannot be denied, indeed, that¹ St Paul allows Christians to eat things offered to idols, which may seem to invalidate this apostolic decree. But, the answer to this, is—²That the plain intention of the council at Jerusalem, in commanding to abstain from meats offered to idols, was to keep Christians from idolatry, or, as St James expresses it, 'from pollutions of idols:' and the true way to effect this, they knew, was by prohibiting all communion with idols and idolaters in their feasts, which were instituted in honour of their idols, and were always kept in their temples. But how is this command defeated by St Paul's permitting the Corinthians to eat any part of a creature sold in the shambles, or set before them in private houses, (though that creature might chance to have been slain in honour to an idol,) since the Christian, who ate it in this manner, did not eat it in honour to the idol, but merely as common food?

To illustrate this by a parallel instance. Suppose that the apostolic decree had commanded Christians to abstain from things stolen. Would not any one conceive that the design of this command was to prohibit theft, and all communion with thieves in their villany? Yes, surely. Suppose then that any one of the council should, after this, tell the people whom he preached to, that they might buy any meat publicly sold in the shambles, or set before them in private houses, asking no questions for conscience sake, though possibly the butcher or the host might have stolen the meat; would any one think that this permission was intended to invalidate the decree of abstaining from things stolen? And if such a construction would be absurd in the one case, why should it not be deemed so in another? Especially when St Paul himself so expressly, so solemnly, deters Christians from all participation in idolatrous feasts.³ 'The things which the Gentiles sacrifice,' says he, 'they sacrifice to devils, not to God; and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils. Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord and of devils, ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table and of devils.'

In a word, say they, whatever the sense of certain passages in St Paul's writings may seem to be, they cannot be supposed to contradict the decree at Jerusalem: a decree to which himself consented, nay, which he himself principally occasioned, and which he himself actually carried about, and deposited with the several churches. For to imagine that, with his own hands, he deposited the decree in one church, under the sanction of a canon ratified by the Spirit of God, and then immediately went to another, and preached against that very canon, and decried it as inconsistent with Christian liberty, is to charge the apostle with such an inconsistency of behaviour, folly, and prevarication, as but badly comports with the character of an ambassador of Jesus Christ: and, therefore, unless we are minded to impair the authority, and sap the foundation of revealed religion, we must allow the decree to be still in force; and the command, which prohibits the eating of blood, still chargeable upon every man's conscience. A command given by God himself to Noah, repeated to Moses, and ratified by the apostles of Jesus Christ; given immediately after the flood, when the world, as it were, began anew, and the only one given on that occasion; repeated with awful solemnity to the people whom God had separated from the rest of the world to be his own; repeated with dreadful denunciations of Divine vengeance upon those who should dare to transgress it; and ratified by the most solemn and sacred council that was ever assembled upon earth, acting under the immediate influence of the Spirit of God; transmitted from that sacred assembly to the several churches of the neighbouring nations by the hands of no meaner messengers than two bishops and two apostles; asserted by the best writers and most philosophic spirits of their age, the Christian apologists, and sealed with the blood of the best men, the Christian martyrs; confirmed by the unanimous consent of the fathers, and revered by the practice of the whole Christian church for above 300 years, and of the eastern church even to this very day.

These are some of the chief arguments on both sides of the question: and, to form a judgment hereupon, we may observe—That, though this prohibition of eating blood can hardly be deemed a commandment of moral obligation, yet is it a positive precept which cannot but be thought of more weight and importance, for being so oft, and so solemnly enjoined; that though the reasons alleged for its injunction are not always so convincing, yet the prevention of cruelty and murder, which is immediately mentioned after it, will, in all ages, be ever esteemed a good one; and though the liberty granted in the gospel seems to be great, yet it can hardly be understood without some restriction.

It seemed once good to the Holy Ghost, among other necessary things, to prescribe an abstinence from blood; and when it seemed otherwise to him, we are nowhere, that I know of, instructed. Could it be made appear, indeed, that this prescription was temporary and occasional, designed to bind one set of men only, or calculated for the infant-state of the church, the question would be then at an end: but since there are no proper marks in the apostles' decree to show the temporary duration of it; and the notion of proselytes of the gate, to whom alone it is said to be directed, (how commodious soever it may be to solve all difficulties,) upon examination is found to be groundless or uncertain, the obligation, I fear, lies upon every good Christian still. But as this is not every one's sentiment;¹ 'as one believeth that he may eat all things, and another thinketh it the safe side of his duty to abstain; so let not him that eateth, despise him that eateth not; and let not him that eateth not, judge him that eateth; but judge this rather, that no man put a stumbling-block, or an occasion to fall, in his brother's way. Let us therefore follow after the things which make for peace, and things wherewith one may edify another.'

SECT. II.

CHAP. I.—Of the Confusion of Languages.

THE HISTORY.

It is reasonable to believe, that, for some years after the flood, Noah and his family lived in the neighbourhood of the mountains of Armenia, where the ark rested; thence removed into the countries of Syria; then crossing the Tigris into Mesopotamia, and so shaping their course eastward, came at length to the pleasant plain of Babylon, on the banks of the river Euphrates. The fertility of the soil, the delightfulness of the place, and the commodiousness of its situation, made them resolve to settle there; and to build a city which should be the metropolis of the whole earth, and in it a vast high tower, which should be the wonder of the world; for the present use, a kind of pharos, or landmark, and, to future ages, a monument of their great tower and might.^a

By this project they promised themselves mighty matters; but that which chiefly ran in their heads, was their keeping together in one body, that, by their united strength and counsels, as the world increased, they might bring others under their subjection, and make themselves universal lords: but one great discouragement to this, their project, was—That in the place, which they had chosen for the scene of all their greatness, there was no stone to build with. Perceiving, however, that there was clay enough in the country whereof to make bricks,^b and plenty of a pitchy substance called bitumen,

^a It is the opinion of many eminent critics, that the whole of Noah's descendants were not engaged in the rebellious project of building the tower of Babel—but only the descendants of Ham, or a portion of them; and this they ground chiefly on the opinion, that it is not likely the whole family of Noah would leave the fertile regions of Armenia, but that portions of them would emigrate as their number increased. During the life of that patriarch, and the lives of his sons, Dr Hales is of opinion that the whole of his descendants occupied Armenia, extending themselves gradually into the adjacent fertile and pleasant regions of Assyria, Mesopotamia, and Media. The same learned chronologer is likewise of opinion that the regions destined for the respective possessions of the families of Shem, Ham, and Japheth, were pointed out by Noah himself a little before his death, in that famous prophecy relative to the curse upon Canaan, that he should be a servant to Shem (spoken by Noah on awaking from his disgraceful sleep) which has been already considered; and he supports this opinion by apostolical authority. "We learn," says he, "from St Paul, (Acts xvii. 26.) that the division of the earth among the sons of Noah was not made at random," but that "God made of one blood all nations of men, to dwell upon the whole face of the earth, having ordained the predetermined seasons, and the boundaries of their respective settlements." This important event took place, according to the same author, B. C. 2614, about 191 years after the death of Noah, and about 29 years after the death of Shem, when Japheth and Ham were probably dead likewise.—Ed.

^b The word which our translators make slime, is in Hebrew hëmar, in Greek ἄσφαλτος, in Latin bitumen; and that this plain did very much abound with it, which was of two kinds, liquid and solid; that liquid bitumen here swam upon the waters; that there was a cave and fountain which was continually casting it out; and that this famous tower, at this time, and the no less famous walls of Babylon were afterwards built with this kind of cement, is confirmed by the testimony of several profane authors. For thus Strabo tells us, "In Babylonia much bitumen abounds; there are two kinds of it," says Eratosthenes, which would serve instead of mortar, with one consent they went to work, and, in a short time, every hand was employed in making bricks, building the city, and laying the foundation of a prodigious pile, which they purposed to have carried up to an immense height, and had already made a considerable progress in the work, when God, dissatisfied with their proceedings, thought proper to interpose, and, at the expense of a miracle, quashed all their project at once, inasmuch, that this first attempt of their vanity and ambition became the monument of their folly and weakness.

A. M. 1757. A. C. 2247; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 2857. A. C. 2554. GEN. CII. xi. TO VER. 10.

The blessing which God had given Noah and his sons, to increase and multiply, and replenish the earth, had now, for above an hundred years, (according to Hales, 540 years,) exerted itself to good purpose; but, though the number of their descendants was very large, yet the language which they all spake was but one, the same which had descended to them^a from their great progenitor, Adam, and very probably was pronounced in the same common manner. To frustrate their undertaking, therefore, God determined with himself^b to confound their

^a a liquid and a solid—the liquid kind is called Naphtha, and arises in the plain of Susa, but the solid, which also has the property of growing hard, is found in Babylonia, in a fountain high to the Naphtha," b. 16. Thus Justin, speaking of Semiramis, says, "She built Babylon, and covered over the wall of the city with bricks, instead of sand, bitumen being used—the latter substance in several parts of that country arises out of the earth," b. 1. And thus Vitruvius, who is elder than either, says, "In Babylon there is a place of vast magnitude, having liquid bitumen swimming on its surface, with that bitumen and bricks Semiramis surrounded the wall of Babylon which she built," b. 8. To these we may add some modern testimonies, which tell us that these springs of bitumen are called oyum Hit, the fountains of Hit; and that they are much celebrated by the Persians and Arabs. All modern travellers, except Rauwolf, who went to Persia and the Indies by the way of Euphrates, before the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope, mention these fountains as a very strange and wonderful thing.—See Biblioth. Bib. vol. i. p. 281.; Heidegger's Hist. Patr. Essay 21, and Univers. Hist. b. i. c. 2.

^b That the children of Noah did speak the same language with Adam is very manifest; because Methuselah, the grandfather of Noah, lived a considerable time with him, and unquestionably spake the same language; and that this language was no other than the Hebrew is very probable from this argument—that Shem, the son of Noah, was for some time contemporary with Abraham, who descended from him, and whose family continued the same language that they both spake until the time of Moses, who recorded the history of his own nation in his native language; so that, what we have now in the Pentateuch, according to the opinion of all Hebrew, and most Christian writers, is the very same with what God taught Adam, and Adam his posterity.—Patrick's Commentary. It is, however, very doubtful whether Shem was contemporary with Abraham—according to the chronology of Hales, he was not.—Ed.

^b Some commentators, from the word confound, are ready to infer, that God did not make some of these builders speak new different languages, only that they had such a confused remembrance of the original language they spake before, as made them speak it in quite a different manner: so that, by the various inflections, terminations, and pronunciations of divers dialects, they could no more understand one another, than those who understand Latin can comprehend those who speak French, Italian, or Spanish, though these languages do certainly arise from it. But this we conceive to be a great mistake—not only because it makes all languages extant to be no more than so many different dialects of the same original, and, consequently reducible to it; but because, upon examination, it will appear that there are certain languages in the world, so entirely different from each other, that they agree in no one essential property whatever, and must, therefore, at this time, have been of immediate infusion.

language; by which means it came to pass, that though their tongues still retained the faculty of speech, yet, having lost the pronunciation of their native language, on a sudden they were so changed and modified to the expression of another, (which was of a sound quite different,) that the next stander-by could not comprehend what his neighbour meant, and this, in a short time, ran them into the utmost disorder and confusion: for these different dialects produced different ideas in the minds of the builders, which, for want of understanding one another, they employed to improper objects, and so were obliged to desist from their enterprise; and, not only that, but being by this means deprived of the pleasure and comfort of mutual society, except with such as spake the same language, all those who were of one dialect joined themselves together, and leaving the devoted place, (as they then thought it,) departed in tribes,^c as their choice or their chance led them, to seek out fresh habitations. Thus God not only defeated their design, but likewise accomplished his own, of having the world more generally, and more speedily peopled, than it otherwise would have been. And, to perpetuate the memory of such a miraculous event, the place, which was first called Babel, and, with small variation, afterwards Babylon, from this confusion of languages, received its denomination.

This confusion of tongues, if not dispersion of the people, is supposed by most chronologers to have fallen 101 years after the flood; for Peleg, the son of Eber, who was great grandson to Shem, was certainly born in that year, and is said to have had the name Peleg given him, because that in his time the earth was divided.—To this short period, between the deluge and the confusion of tongues, however, no countenance is given in Sacred Scripture. It is not said that the earth was divided at Peleg's birth, but in his time, or days. Now if, as our author reasonably supposes in the succeeding chapter, that the confusion of tongues, and the consequent dispersion of the people, did not take place till Peleg was 100 years old, there was abundance of time, even according to the Hebrew chronology, for such a multiplication of mankind, as an attempt like that of the building of Babel seems to imply. Dr Hales, however, seems to have sufficiently proved that Peleg was not born till 401 years after the deluge, and that the division did not take place till he was 140 years old. Consequently there was a period of 541 years, from the deluge till the confusion of tongues and the dispersion of mankind.—Ed.

CHAP. II.—Objections answered and Difficulties explained.

THOSE, who have undertaken to settle the geography of the Holy Scriptures, tell us that the land of Shinar was

^c The dispersion of Noah's sons was so ordered, that each family and each nation dwelt by itself; which could not well be done (as Mr Mede observes) but by directing an orderly division, either by casting of lots, or choosing according to their birth-right, after that portions of the earth were set out, according to the number of their nations and families; otherwise, some would not have been content to go so far north as Magog did, whilst others were suffered to enjoy more pleasant countries.

all that valley, which the river Tygris runs along, from the mountains of Armenia northwards to the Persian Gulf, or at least to the southern division of the common channel of the Tygris and Euphrates. ¹ So that the country of Eden was part of the land of Shinar: and as Eden was probably situate on both sides of the aforementioned channel, so it is not unlikely, that the valley of Shinar did extend itself on both sides (but on the western side, without all doubt) of the river Tygris.

Now the mountains of Armenia, according to the account of most geographers, lie north, and not east from Shinar and Assyria; but then it may be supposed, ² either that Moses, in this place, followed the geographical style of the Assyrians, who called all that lay beyond the Tygris, the east country, though a great part of it, towards, Armenia, was really northward; or (as ³ some others will have it) that as mankind multiplied, they spread themselves in the country eastward of Ararat; and so making small removes from the time of their descent from the mount, to the time of their journeying into the land of Shinar, they might properly enough be said to have begun their progress from the east. But, without the help of these solutions, and taking Moses in a literal sense, he is far from being mistaken. ⁴ Most geographers indeed have drawn the mountain of Ararat a good way out of its place, and historians and commentators, taking the thing for fact, have been much perplexed to reconcile this situation with its description in Scripture: whereas, by the accounts of all travellers, for some years past, the mountain which now goes under the name of Ararat, lies about two degrees more east, than the city of Shinar or Senjar, from whence the plain, in all probability takes its name; and therefore, if the sons of Noah entered it on the north side, they must of necessity have journeyed from the east, or, which is the same thing, have travelled westward from the place, where they set out, in order to arrive at the plain of Babylon. a

Historians, indeed, as well as commentators, have generally given in to the common opinion, that Shem and his family were not concerned in this expedition, but for what reason we cannot conceive, since there is no fact in all the Mosaic account more firmly established than this—That the whole race of mankind then in being were actually engaged in it.

a The Chaldean historian Berosus, informs us, that "they proceeded circuitously to Babylonia." And Mr Penn (Remarks on the Eastern origin of mankind, Oriental Collect. vol. ii. Nos. 1 and 2,) guided only by a geographical view of the country, happily conjectures, that they followed the course of the great river Euphrates; which rising in the mountains of Armenia, flows at first in a westerly direction: then it turns to the south, and at length bending eastward, it reaches Babylon from the north-west. Its progress therefore is circuitous; and as the approach to Shinar would be most easily and naturally effected by following its winding course; so, in that case, the route of the emigrants would minutely correspond with Berosus and with Scripture, which represent them as travelling from the original settlement, eastward of the springs of the Euphrates, whose circuitous course, according to the ingenious remarks of Faber, is described in the Sanscrit word Uratta, pronounced Urat, and signifying a circle, so nearly analogous to the Hebrew name of the river Phrat.—Hales's Analysis, vol. 1. p. 358, second edition.—Ed.

As soon as Moses has brought the three sons of Noah out of the ark, he takes care to inform us that ⁵ 'of them was the whole earth overspread:' after he has given us the names of their descendants, at the time of their dispersion, he subjoins, and ⁶ 'by these were the nations divided in the earth after the flood:' and then proceeding to give us an account of this memorable transaction, he tells us, that ⁷ 'the whole earth was of one language, and of one speech,' and that as they, namely, the whole earth, ⁸ journeyed from the east, they found a plain in the land of Shinar, and dwelt there, &c., ⁹ so that, from the beginning to the end of this transaction, the connexion between the antecedent and relative is so well preserved, that there is no room to suppose, that any less than all mankind, were gathered together on the plain of Shinar, and assisted in the building of Babel: nor seems it improbable that Moses has made these unusual repetitions, to inculcate the certainty of that fact, and to take away all ground for supposing that any other branch of Noah's posterity was in any other part of the earth, at that time. ⁶

The time indeed when this transaction happened, is very differently computed by chronologers, according as they follow the LXX interpreters, who make it 531, or, as rectified by Dr Hales, 541; the Samaritan copy, which makes it 396; or the Hebrew, which allows it to be no more than 101 years from the flood, to the confusion of tongues, and less, we may suppose, to the first beginning to build the tower. If we take either of the former computations, the thing answers itself: upon a moderate multiplication, there will be workmen more than enough, even without the posterity of Shem: but if we submit to the Hebrew account of time, we shall find ourselves straitened, if we part with one third part of our complement, in so laborious a work. There is no necessity, however, to suppose, ¹⁰ with some, that every one of these progenitors, as soon as married, (which was very early) had every year twins by his wife, which, according to arithmetic progression, would amount to no less than 1,554,420 males and females, in the shortest period given. Half the number would be sufficient to be employed on this occasion, and ¹¹ half the number will be no unreasonable supposition, considering the strength of constitution men had then, and the additional blessing which God bestowed upon them, and whereby he interested his peculiar providence, that for the increase of the human race, for the restoration of a desolated world, there should be some peculiar fruitfulness granted to man; that even to boys, breaking the appointed laws of nature, power

b If we adhere to the Hebrew chronology, then this reasoning of our author cannot be admitted as conclusive; for, according to that chronology, not only Shem, Ham, and Japheth, but even Noah himself, were alive at this time; and it is surely impossible to believe that they could join in such a rebellious project, while the recollection of the deluge must have been fresh in their minds. The chronology of the Septuagint, which Dr Hales thinks correct, removes this difficulty, by dating the confusion of tongues at 541 years after the flood, but at this time mankind would be so much increased, that it is doubtful whether they could be all assembled on the plain of Shinar.—See previous note, page 109.—Ed.

should be given of replenishing the earth, ¹ as Petavius elegantly expresses it.

But, after all, there seems to be no occasion for supposing an extraordinary increase of people, or for confining the first undertaking of this great building to the compass of one hundred years after the flood. In the tenth chapter of Genesis it is said indeed, that unto Eber were born two sons, and that the name of one was Peleg, ² which being derived from an Hebrew word, that signifies to divide, has this reason annexed to it, for in his days was the earth divided. Now by the subsequent account of Peleg's ancestors we find that he was born in the 101st year after the flood; from whence it is concluded that the earth began to be divided at his birth. But this is a conclusion, that by no means results from the text, which only says, that 'in his days was the earth divided;' words which can, with no manner of propriety, imply that this division began at his birth.

His name, indeed, was called Peleg; but it does not therefore follow that this name was given him at his birth; it might have been given at any time after, from his being a principal agent among his own family, in the division made in his days; as several names have throughout all ages been given upon the like accidents, not only to private persons but to whole families. Or suppose the name to be given at his birth, yet no reason can be assigned why it might not be given prophetically, as well as that of Noah, from an event then foreseen, though it might not come to pass for some considerable time after the name was given.

² Since Peleg, then, according to the sacred account, lived 239 years, and his younger brother Jocktan, and his sons, were a considerable colony in the distribution of the world, it is much more rational to suppose, that this distribution did not begin till a good part of Peleg's life was expended. Suppose it however to be no more than an hundred years after his birth, yet we may still retain the Hebrew computation, and have time and hands enough for carrying on the great work of Babel before this distribution, since mankind might very well be multiplied to some millions in the compass of two hundred years.

Putting all these considerations together, then, we can hardly imagine that there wanted a sufficient number of men to go upon an enterprise, which, though not strictly chargeable with sin, because there was no previous command forbidding it, yet, in the sense of God himself, bold and presumptuous enough. ³ 'Behold the people is one, and they have all one language, and now this they begin to do:' this is their first attempt, and after this nothing ^a will be restrained from them; they will think themselves competent for any thing, that they shall have a fancy to do. For though God could have no reason to apprehend ^b any molestation from their attempts (as the poets make heaven all in an uproar, upon the invasion of the giants,) yet, since they were contrary to his gracious design of having the earth replenished, it was an act highly consistent with his infinite wisdom and goodness to see them disappointed.

The divine purpose was that men should not live within the limits of one country only, and so be exposed to perpetual contentions, while every one would pretend to make himself master of the nearest and most fertile lands; but that, possessing themselves of the whole, and cultivating almost every place, they might enjoy a proportionable increase of the fruits of the earth. ⁴ Thorns and briars were springing up every where; woods and thickets spreading themselves around; wild beasts increasing; and all this while the sons of Noah gathering in a cluster, and designing so to continue; so that it was highly seasonable for God to confound their mistimed projects, and disperse them.

Their purpose was to make themselves a name by enslaving others. ^c But God foresaw, ⁵ that absolute power and universal empire were not to be trusted in any mortal hand; that the first kings would be far from being the best men; but as they acquired a superiority by fraud and violence, so they would not be backward to maintain it by oppression and cruelty: and therefore, to remedy such public grievances, he determined with himself that there should be a diversity of governments in the world; that if the inhabitants of any place chanced to live under a tyrannical power, those that were no

^b What their attempts were, the historian has represented in their own words: 'and they said, Go to, let us build us a city, and a tower, whose top may reach unto heaven,' Gen. xi. 4. But far be it from any one to imagine, that these builders could be so stupidly ignorant, as ever to think by this means to climb up to heaven, or that they would not have chosen a mountain rather than a plain or a valley for this, if they could once have entertained so gross an imagination. It is a common hyperbole this in the Sacred Writings, to signify any great and lofty building, as may be seen in Deut. i. 18., Dan. iv. 8., and in several other places; nor is the like manner of expression unusual among profane authors likewise: for Homer, speaking of the island of Calyso, tells us, that in it was a place where a various sylvan scene

 Appeared around, and groves of living green,
 Poplars and alders ever quivering played,
 And nodding cypress formed a fragrant shade,
 Whose lofty branches waving swept the sky, &c.

Odys. v. 238.

By a literal interpretation of the Hebrew idioms, however, it is a common thing for the greatest absurdities to be received by the unwary for realities; and not at all a wonder, that the misunderstanding the text should give rise to what we are told of the giants in the fable attempting to scale heaven, and of the expedition of Cosigna and his companions, who had contrived ladders for that end; hoping that so they might make their nearer addresses to the queen of heaven. And thus even the silliest of the Pagan tales may be traced up to their original; for there is generally some foundation for them in truth, either misunderstood or misapplied.—See Le Clerc's Commentary; Foss. Hist. Græc. b. 1. c. 3. and Bibliotheca Biblica ad locum.

^c By this remark our author evidently implies that the whole of mankind were not engaged in this enterprise. For if the whole race were so, there could have been no others to enslave; it is therefore surprising that a few paragraphs before, he should have asserted this to be the case.—Ed.

^a The common versions say of the builders of the tower of Babel, 'And now nothing will or shall be restrained from them which they have imagined to do.' But this is false in fact; because God soon put a stop to their design by confounding them, and 'scattering them abroad from thence, over the face of the earth.' We may observe, therefore, that the same particle which is indeed sometimes taken negatively, is evidently here to be taken interrogatively, and is equal to the most express affirmation; and therefore the text should thus be translated, 'Shall they not be restrained in all they imagine to do? Yes, they shall; which accordingly was immediately executed.—Essay for a New Translation.

longer able to endure the yoke, might flee into other countries and dominions (which they could not do if the whole was one entire monarchy) and there find a shelter from oppression. And as he knew how conducive the bad example of princes would be towards a general corruption of manners, he therefore took care to provide against this malady, by appointing several distinct kingdoms and forms of governments, at one and the same time; that if the infection of vice got ascendancy, and prevailed in one place, virtue and godliness, and whatever is honourable and praiseworthy, might find a safe retreat, and flourish in another. Thus all the mischiefs which might possibly arise from an universal monarchy, and all the advantages that do daily accrue from separate and distinct governments, were in the divine foresight and consideration, when he put a surprising stop to the building of these men, and their ambitious schemes of empire together.

For in what manner soever it was that he effected this: a whether it was by disturbing their memories, or perverting their imaginations, by diversifying their hearing, or new-organizing their tongues, by an immediate infusion of new languages, or a division of the old into so many different dialects; and again, whether these tongues, or dialects of tongues, b were few or more; whether there were only so many originals at first, (as a Since Moses has nowhere acquainted us, says the learned Heidegger (in Hist. Patriar. b. 1. Essay 211) in what manner the confusion of languages was effected, every one is left to follow what opinion he likes best, so long as that opinion contains nothing incongruous to the received rule of faith: nay, it may not be inconvenient to produce several opinions upon this subject, to the intent that every one may embrace that which seems to him most conformable to truth. And therefore he instances in the opinions of several learned men, but in those more particularly of Julius Scaliger, who ascribes this event to a confusion of notions which God miraculously sent among the builders; and that of Isaac Casaubon, who will needs have all the different languages now extant to be no more than derivatives from the Hebrew. Scaliger's words, as Heidegger quotes them, are these:—"For they (the Hebrews) say that in order to put a stop to their impious undertaking, God the omnipotent and all-wise caused, that to him who asked for a stone, one would bring mortar, another sand, another pitch, another bitumen, and another water, I even think, that perhaps there would not be wanting some who would think that a reproach was meant to them, and who on that account would quarrel and fight when some signal act of cunning befell them. For, if to him that sought for a stone, one brought one thing, others other things, and all different things, the mode of one sound, increased to a diversity of species, would seem to have entered into different understandings; therefore one old language would still remain, though indeed of various meanings." The words of Casaubon are as follows: "If at Babel languages became totally different, the Chaldeans and Assyrians should of necessity retain these strangely-begotten tongues. But we see that the very contrary has happened; for other languages have preserved and still preserve traces of a Hebrew origin, just the more evident and explicit in proportion as they are farther removed from the ancient and first abode of man. For every tribe that in situation is nearest to the Hebrew nation, uses a language most akin to its language, and the greater the distance is from it, the greater the difference. This is evident from a comparison of the Syriac, Chaldaic, Arabic, Carthaginian languages, with that of the Hebrews, and still more evident on a diligent inspection of the Greek language. The Greeks at first dwelt in Asia. Thence the Ionians (or as Æschylus, in a Hebrew manner calls them Javones,) passed into Europe. In the most ancient writers of the Greeks there are many Hebrew words which afterwards became obsolete, or somewhat changed. We observe also, that the Greeks of Asia Hebrewized more than those of Europe."

b It is not to be thought that there were a many several dialects many perhaps as there were either tribes or heads of families,) and all the rest were no more than derivatives from them, the operations of an Almighty power are equally visible, and the footsteps of divine wisdom apparent, in the very method of his disappointing these ambitious builders.

² It was equally the finger of God, we allow, whether the minds or the tongues of the workmen were confounded; but then, in that case, the miracle does not so plainly and so flagrantly appear, nor would it have had so good an effect upon the builders themselves; because men may quarrel, and break off society without a miracle, whereas they cannot speak with new tongues by their own natural strength and ingenuity.

Nor was the formation of a new language only more miraculous, but to the imaginations of the persons, upon whom it is wrought, incredibly more surprising than any disagreement in opinion, or any quarrel that might thereupon ensue. And therefore I have always thought, that this account of the confusion of tongues which God wrought at Babel, would scarce have been told so particularly, and represented as God's own act and deed, had it only arisen from a quarrel among the builders, which obliged them to leave off their work, and scatter themselves over the face of the earth. For when God is here described as coming down in person to view their work, something almost as solemn as the creation, full as solemn as the denunciation of the flood, when Noah was commanded to build the ark, is certainly intended by that expression: and therefore, when Moses acquaints us, that 'there was but one language at that time,' the circumstance would be impertinent, if he did not intimate withal, that very soon after there were to be more.

as there were men at Babel, so that none of them understood one another. This would not only have dispersed mankind, but utterly destroyed them; because it is impossible to live without society, or to have any society without understanding one another. It is likely therefore that every family had its peculiar dialect, or rather that some common dialect, or form of speaking, was given to those families whom God designed to make one colony in the following dispersion. Into how many languages the people were divided it is impossible to determine. The Hebrews fancy seventy, because the descendants of the sons of Noah, as they are enumerated in Scripture, are just so many: the Greek fathers make them seventy-two, because the LXX. version adds two more, (Elisa among the sons of Japheth, and Canaan among the sons of Shem,) and the Latin fathers follow them. But this is all conjecture, and what is built upon a very weak foundation. For, in many places, so many people concurred in the use of the same speech, that of the seventy scarce thirty remained distinct, as Bochart has observed; and among these, others have supposed that the Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic, in the east; the Greek and Latin in the west; and the Finnish, Slavonian, Hungarian, Cantabrick, and the ancient Gaulish in the north, are generally reputed originals; besides some more that might be discovered in Persia, China, the East Indies, the midland parts of Africa, and all America, if we had but a sufficient knowledge of the history of these people.—See Patriarch's Commentary and Wotton on the Confusion of Languages at Babel.

A. M. 1757. A. C. 2247; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 2857. A. C. 2554. GEN. CH. xi. TO VER. 10.

The prophet Isaiah, indeed, speaking of the conversion of some Egyptians to the Jewish faith, tells us, that 'in that day shall five cities in the land of Egypt speak the language (or lip, as it is in the margin) of Canaan, and swear to the Lord of Hosts.' Speaking the language of Canaan¹ is thought by some to mean no more than being of the same religion with the Jews, who inhabited the land of Canaan, but why may it not be interpreted literally, as it is in our translation? Might not these five cities particularly, to show the value and reverence that they had for the religion of the Jews, learn their language; especially since they would thereby be better enabled to understand the books of Moses and the prophets, which were written in that tongue? Do not the Mahometans, whatever they are, Turks, Tartars, Persians, Moguls, or Moors, all learn Arabic, because Mahomet wrote the Alcoran in that language? Why, then, should we be offended at the literal sense of the words, when the figurative is so low and flat in comparison of it? ² 'In that day Egypt shall be like a woman; it shall be afraid and fear, because of the shaking of the hand of the Lord of Hosts;' ³ 'the Lord of Hosts shall be a terror unto Egypt,' and ⁴ 'in that day shall there be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt,' that is, they shall become proselytes to the law of Moses; and, that they may not mistake in understanding the sense of the law, which they shall then embrace, they shall agree to learn the language in which it is written. This is an easy and genuine sense of the words: but instead of that, to fly to a forced and abstruse one, merely to evade the evidence of a miracle, savours of vanity at least, if not of irreligion.

In short, all interpreters, both Jewish and Christian, understood this confusion of Babel to be a confusion of languages, not of opinions. They saw the texts, if literally understood, required it; they observed a surprising variety of tongues essentially different from one another; and they knew that this was not in the least inconsistent with the power of God. They did not question, but that he, who made the tongue, could make it speak what and how he pleased; and they acquiesced (as all wise and honest interpreters should) in the literal explanation, perceiving that nothing unworthy of God, or trifling or impossible in itself, resulted from it.

But why should we have recourse to miracles, say they, when the business may as well be done without them; when it is but supposing, that all languages, now extant, sprung originally from one common root; and that they are no more than different forms or dialects of it, which the force of time, assisted with some incidental courses, without the intervention of any superior power, naturally produces.

To give this objection a satisfactory answer, we shall be obliged to look a little into the nature of languages in general, that thereby we may show, that there are some languages, now extant in the world, which are essentially different from each other; that languages, when once established, are not so subject to variation as is pretended; and that, in the ages subsequent to this extraordinary event, they could not, in any natural way, undergo all the alterations we now perceive in them, supposing them all descended from one common stock.

Now, in order to this, we must observe, that every language consists of two things, matter and form: the matter of any language are the words, wherein men who speak the language express their ideas: and the several ways whereby its nouns are declined, and verbs conjugated, are its form.

The Latins and Greeks vary their nouns by terminations, as, vir, viri, viro, virum, ἀθροπος, ἀνθρώπου, ἀνθρώπου, ἀνθρώπων. We decline by the prepositions of, to, from, the, in both numbers; but the Hebrews have no different terminations in the same number, and only vary thus,—ish, man; ishim, men; ishah, woman; ishoth, women: the rest are varied by prepositions inseparably affixed to the words, as, ha-ish, the man; le-ish, to the man; be-ish, in the man, &c., which prepositions thus joined make one word with the noun to which they are affixed, and are herein different from all those languages which come from a Latin, or Teutonic original.

The western and northern people consider every transitive verb, either actively or passively, and then they have done; as amo, in Latin is, I love; amor, I am loved; and so in Greek, ἀγάπο, ἀγαπῶμαι: but in Hebrew, every word has, or is supposed to have, seven conjugations; in Chaldee and Syriac six; and in Arabic thirteen, all differing in their significations.

The western languages abound with verbs that are compounded with prepositions, which accompany them in all their moods and tenses, and therein vary their signification; but in the eastern there is no such thing. For though they have, in Arabic especially, many different significations, some literal and some figurative, yet still their verbs as well as nouns are uncompounded.

In the Greek, both ancient and barbarous, in the Latin, and the dialects arising from it, and in all the branches of what we call the old Teutonic, the possessive pronouns, my, thy, his, yours, theirs, &c., make a distinct word from the noun to which they are joined, as Πατερς ἡμων, Pater noster, fader vor, our father, &c. But in all oriental tongues the pronoun is joined to the end of the noun, in such a manner as to make but one word. Thus, ab, in Hebrew, is father; abi, my father; abiam, our father. In Chaldee, from the same root, abouna, is our father; in Syriac, abun; in Arabic and Ethiopic the same.

Once more. All western languages mark the degree of comparison in their adjectives, by proper terminations, as, wise, wiser, wisest; sapiens, sapientior, sapientissimus; σοφός, σοφώτερος, σοφώτατος: but none of the eastern tongues, already mentioned, have any thing in them like this.

These are some of the marks and characters which distinguish the eastern from the western languages; and, what is farther observable, these characters have none of them disappeared, or shifted from one to another, for near three thousand years. They appear in every book of the Old Testament, from Moses down to Malachi; in the Chaldee paraphrasts, in the Syriac versions, in the Misna, in the Gemara, and in every other rabbinical book, down to the Jewish writers of the present age: but, on the other side, if we consider Homer's poems, which are the oldest monuments we have of the Greek language; if we take Theocritus for the Doric dialect; Euripides, or Thucydides, for the Attic; Herodotus, or Hippocrates, for the Ionic; and Sappho for the Æolic, and so descend to the Greek, which is spoken at this day, we shall see the general marks of western languages running through them all. These idioms show themselves, at first sight, to be nothing more than dialects manifestly springing from the same common root, which never did, and (as far as we may judge from the practice of above two thousand years) never will, conjugate verbs, decline nouns, or compare adjectives, like the Hebrew or Arabic. These languages did always compound verbs and nouns with prepositions, which essentially alter the sense. These languages had never any possessive pronouns affixed to their nouns, to determine the person, or persons, to whom of right they belong; nor do they affix any single letter to their words, which may be equivalent to conjunctions, and connect the sense of what goes before with what follows, which any person, but tolerably initiated in the eastern languages, must know to be their properties.

And, indeed, if we cast but our eye a little forward into the sacred history, it will not be long before we may perceive some instances of this difference between languages. For, when Jacob and Laban made a covenant together, they erected an heap of stones, on which they ate, and Laban called it Jegar-Sahadutha, but Jacob, Gal-ed, which words signify (those in Chaldee, which are Laban's, and the other in Hebrew, which are Jacob's) an heap of witnesses; and, in like manner, Pharaoh calls Joseph, Tsophnath-Paaneahh, which words are neither Hebrew nor Chaldee: so that here we see three distinct dialects formed in Jacob's time; and yet we may observe, that the world was then thin, commerce narrow, and conquests few, so that the people were constrained to converse with those of their own tribe, and consequently could keep their dialect far more entire than it is possible to do now, when commerce, conquests, and colonies, planted in regions already peopled with nations that speak distinct languages, may be supposed to bring in a deluge of new words, and make innumerable changes. But nations seldom trade much abroad, or make invasions upon their neighbours, or send forth plantations into remote countries, until they are pretty well stocked at home, which could hardly be the case of any one country for several ages after the dispersion.

It is a mistaken notion which some have imbibed, that every little thing, be it but the change of air, or difference of climate (which at most can but affect the pronunciation of some letters or syllables) can make a diversity in languages. Small and insensible alterations, which perhaps will appear in an age or two, will undoubtedly happen, but unless people converse much with strangers, their language will subsist, as to its constituent form, the same for many generations.

The Roman language, for instance, was brought to a considerable perfection before Plautus's time; and though now and then some obsolete words may appear in his writings, yet any man that understands Latin may read the books that were written in it, from Plautus down to Theodorick the Goth, which was near seven hundred years; and had not the barbarous nations broken into Italy, it might have been an intelligible language for several ages more. And, in like manner, we may say, that had not the Turks, when they overrun Greece, brought darkness and ignorance along with them, the Greek tongue might have continued even to this day; since it is manifest, from Homer's poems, and Eustathius's commentaries upon them, that it subsisted for above two thousand years, without any considerable alteration; for the space of time between the poet and his commentator was no less.

And if the languages which we are acquainted with remained so long unchanged, to any great degree, in times of more commerce and action than what could be subsequent upon the dispersion; there is reason to believe, that (though it be difficult to define the number of them) there are many more original languages in the world than some men imagine: for, if we consider their great antiquity, their mutual agreement in the fundamentals (which we have described) can be no argument that any one of them is derived from the rest; since it is natural to suppose, that when God confounded the speech of the builders of Babel, he made the dialects of those people, who were to live near one another, so far to agree, that they might, with less difficulty, and in a shorter space of time, mutually understand each other, and so more easily maintain an intercourse together. For though their association, considering the ends that engaged them in it, was certainly culpable, yet perhaps it might not deserve so severe a punishment as an entire separation of every tribe among them from their nearest kindred, with whom they had hitherto spent all their time.

To sum up the force of this argument in a few words. If we consider the time since the building of the tower of Babel, not yet 4000 years,^a and the great variety of languages that are at present in the world; if we consider how entirely different some are to others, so that no art of etymology can reduce them to the least likeness or conformity; and yet, in those early days, when the world was less peopled, and navigation and commerce not so much minded, there could not be that quick progression of languages; and if we examine the alterations which such languages as we are acquainted with have made in two or three thousand years past, where colonies of different people have not been imported, we shall find the difference between language and language to be so very great, and the alteration of the same language in a considerable tract of time to be so very small, that we shall be at a loss to conceive whence so many and so various languages could have proceeded, unless we take in the account of Moses, which unriddles the whole difficulty, and justly ascribes them to the same Almighty power, which taught our first parents to speak one tongue in the beginning, and, in after ages, inspired the apostles of Jesus Christ with the gift of many.^b

^a According to Hales, 4363.

^b From the most ancient and most authentic of all historical records, the Sacred Scriptures, we know the fact, that all mankind were originally descended from a single pair, and that our great progenitor did undoubtedly possess and make use of articulate language. What the particular language was which was then employed, we have no means of ascertaining. We are, however, sufficiently warranted to conclude, that this primeval language must have consisted at first of very few and simple sounds, and that it was gradually extended as the new situation of men in society required new modes of expression. The primitive language, in all probability, continued radically the same, though CHAP. III.—Of the Tower of Babel.

THAT there really was such a building as the tower of Babel, erected some ages after the recovery of the earth enlarged by accessions closely related to the parent stock during the whole antediluvian ages; and there is little reason to doubt, when we take into view the longevity of the patriarchs, affording opportunities to men of different generations to mingle together, that from Adam down to Noah the language first made use of suffered no essential change. When the tremendous event of the deluge reduced the whole population of the earth to a single family, the primitive language, as received and used by the patriarch Noah, would still be preserved in his family, and form the only language then used among men. In this state, we find that language continued till the confusion of tongues at Babel, before which period we are assured by the sacred historian, 'the whole earth was of one language and of one speech.' Whether this primitive language was the same with any of the languages of which we have still any remains, has been a subject of much dispute. That the primitive language continued at least till the dispersion of mankind, consequent upon the building of Babel, there seems little reason to doubt. When by an immediate interposition of divine power, the language of men was confounded, we are not informed to what extent the confusion of tongues prevailed. It is unnecessary to suppose that the former language was completely obliterated, and entire new modes of speech at once introduced. It is quite sufficient if such changes only were effected, as to render the speech of different companies, or different tribes, unintelligible to one another, that their mutual co-operation in the mad attempt in which they had all engaged might be no longer practicable. The radical stem of the first language might therefore remain in all, though new dialects were formed, bearing among themselves a similar relation with what we find in the languages of modern Europe, derived from the same parent stem, whether Gothic, Latin, or Slavonian. In the midst of these changes, it is reasonable to suppose that the primitive language itself, unaltered, would still be preserved in some one at least of the tribes or families of the human race. Now in none of these was the transmission so likely to have taken place, as among that branch of the descendants of Shem from which the patriarch Abraham proceeded. Upon these grounds, therefore, we may conclude that the language spoken by Abraham, and by him transmitted to his posterity, was in fact the primitive language, modified, indeed, and extended in the course of time, but still retaining its essential parts far more completely than any other of the languages of men. If these conclusions are well founded, they warrant the inference, that in the ancient Hebrew there are still to be found the traces of the original speech. Whether this ancient Hebrew more nearly resembled the Chaldean, the Syrian, or what is now termed the Hebrew, it is unnecessary here to inquire; these languages, it has never been denied, were originally and radically the same, though, from subsequent modifications, they appear to have assumed somewhat different aspects.

We may conceive the original language of the family of Noah spread in various directions: carried by one set of colonies through Armenia, Persia, and the adjacent territories, into all the regions of the east, as far perhaps as Tartary and China, and forming the groundwork of the Armenian, the ancient Persian, the Sanscrit, perhaps, too, of the originally spoken Chinese, as well as of all the languages related to each of them: carried by another set into the regions of Arabia, Egypt, Abyssinia, and the remote parts of Africa, and there giving origin to the old Egyptian, the Coptic, the Ethiopic, and their related tongues; and carried by a third set to Scythia, or the Russian territory, Asia Minor, Ionia, Greece, Italy, and gradually through the farther parts of Europe, and there constituting the radical groundwork of the old Pelasgic, the Gothic, the Celtic, and all their kindred or derivative dialects. Among those families whose migrations were least extensive, this primitive tongue, undergoing fewest changes, would retain most of its original form; and thus it is probable, that in the language of Jacob and his descendants, of the Phœnicians, the Chaldeans, and the communities connected with them, more of the primitive form and character remained, than among the remoter and more widely scattered tribes that spread through Africa and Europe.

from the deluge, is evident from the concurrent testimony of several heathen writers. For when, besides the particular description which¹ Herodotus, the father of the Greek historians, gives us of it, we find Abydenus, as he is² quoted by Eusebius, telling us, "That the first race of men, big with a fond conceit of the bulk and strength of their bodies, built in the place where Babylon now stands, a tower of so prodigious an height, that it seemed to touch the skies, but that the winds and the gods overthrew the mighty structure upon their heads." When we find Eupolemus, as he is³ cited by Alexander Polyhistor, leaving it upon record, "That the city of Babylon was first built by giants who escaped from the flood; that these giants built the most famous tower in all history; and that this tower was dashed to pieces by the almighty power of God, and the giants dispersed and scattered over the face of the whole earth." And lastly, when⁴ we find Josephus mentioning it as a received doctrine among the Sybils, "That at a certain time, when the whole world spake all one language, the people of those days gathered together and raised a mighty tower, which they carried up to so extravagant an height, that it looked as if they had proposed to scale heaven from the top of it; but that the gods let the winds loose upon it, which, with a violent blast, beat it down to the ground, and at the same time struck the builders with an utter forgetfulness of their native tongue, and substituted new and unknown languages in the room of it."—When we find these, and several other authors, I say, that might be produced, bearing testimony to Moses in most of the material circumstances attending the building of this tower, we cannot but conclude, that the representation which he gives us of the whole transaction is agreeable to truth.

The short is, all the remains now extant of the most ancient heathen historians (except Sanchoniatho) concur in confirming the Mosaic account of this matter, and the sum of their testimonies is,⁵ That a huge tower was built by gigantic men at Babylon; that there was then but one language among mankind; that the attempt was offensive to the gods; and that therefore they demolished the tower, overwhelmed the workmen, divided their language, and dispersed them over the face of the whole earth.

There is one circumstance, indeed, wherein we find these ancient historians differing with Moses, and that is, in affirming that the tower was demolished by the anger

If these theoretical views of the filiation of tongues cannot be fully and directly confirmed by the immediate comparison of the different languages as they now are found to exist, this is not in the least to be wondered at, considering the inevitable changes many of them must have undergone in their progress through different countries; but if we attentively mark the precise manner in which such changes might be expected to operate, and make the necessary allowances on that account, in comparing the apparent groundwork of the languages scattered over the globe, a coincidence will be found, far closer and more striking than could at first be supposed.—Dr Dewar's Dissertation on Language, in the 7th volume of the Edinburgh Philosophical Transactions, *Edin. of God, and by the violence of the winds. But as it seems more consistent with the divine wisdom (for the admonition of posterity) to have such a monument of men's folly and ambition for some time standing; so we may observe that, in confirmation of our sacred penman, who speaks of it as a thing existing in his time, Herodotus, the Greek historian, tells us expressly that he himself actually saw it, as it was repaired by Belus, or some of his successors; Pliny, the Latin historian, that it was not destroyed in his days; and some modern travellers, (whom by and by we shall have occasion to quote,) that there are some visible remains of it extant even now: and, therefore, the fancy of its being beat down with the winds is taken up, in pure conformity to some Persian tales recorded of Nimrod, whom these historians suppose to be the first projector of it. It cannot be denied, indeed, but that the generality of interpreters, meeting with the expression of¹ the children of men, whereby they understand bad men and infidels, as opposed to the children of God, which usually denote the good and the faithful, are apt to imagine, that none of the family of Shem, which retained (as they say) the true worship and religion, were engaged in the work, but some of the worser sort of people only, who had degenerated from the piety of their ancestors. But by the children of men in that place, it is evident that we are to understand all mankind, because in the initial words of the chapter they are called² the whole earth. Nor can we well conceive how, in so short a time after that awakening judgment of the deluge, the major part of mankind, even while Noah and his sons were still alive, should be so far corrupted in their principles, as to deserve the odious character of unbelievers.

³ Josephus, indeed, and some other authors, are clearly of opinion that Nimrod, a descendant from the impious Ham, was the great abettor of this design, and the ring-leader of those who combined in the execution of it. But, though the undertaking seems to agree very well with the notion which the Scriptures give us of that ambitious prince, yet, besides that⁴ others, extremely well a The author of the book called Malem tells this story:—That when Nimrod saw that the fire, into which he caused Abraham to be cast for not submitting to the worshipping of idols, did him no damage, he resolved to ascend into heaven, that he might see that great God whom Abraham revealed to him. In vain did his courtiers endeavour to divert him from this design; he was resolved to accomplish it, and therefore gave orders for the building of a tower that might be as high as possible. They worked upon it for three years together, and, when he went up to the top, he was much surprised to see himself as far from heaven as when he was upon the ground: but his confusion was much increased, when they came to inform him next morning that his tower was fallen and dashed in pieces. He commanded them then that another should be built, which might be higher and stronger than the former; but when this met with the same fate, and he still continued an obstinate persecutor of those who worshipped the true God, God took from him the greatest part of his subjects, by the division and confusion of their tongues, and those who still adhered to him he killed by a cloud of flies, which he sent amongst them.—Cabnet's Dictionary on the word Nimrod. The poets, in like manner, having corrupted the tradition of this event with fictions of their own, do constantly bring in Jupiter defeating the attempts of the Titans in this manner:—"Jupiter, from the citadel of heaven, hurling his thunderbolts, overturned the ponderous masses on their founders," &c.—Ovid.

versed in all Jewish antiquities, have made it appear that Nimrod was either very young at the time, or even not yet born, when the project of building the tower and city was first formed, there is reason to believe (even supposing him then alive, and in great power and authority among his people,) that he was not in any tolerable condition to undertake so great a work.

The account which Moses gives us of him is—that he⁵ began to be a mighty one in the earth; which the best writers explain, by his being the first who laid the foundation of regal power among mankind; but it is scarce imaginable how an empire, able to effect such a work, could be entirely acquired, and so thoroughly established, by one and the same person, as to allow leisure for amusements of such infinite toil and trouble.

But admitting his kingdom to be larger than this supposition; yet, from that day to this, we can meet with no works of this kind attempted but from a fulness of wealth and wantonness of power, and after peace, luxury, and long leisure had introduced and established arts: so that nothing can be more absurd than to attribute such a prodigious work to the power and vanity of one man, in the infancy both of arts and empire, and when we can scarce suppose that there was any such thing as artificial wealth in the world.

Since, then, this building was undoubtedly very ancient, as ancient as the Scripture makes it, and yet could not be effected by any separate society in the period assigned for it, the only probable opinion is, that it was (as we said before) undertaken and executed by the united labours of all the people that were then on the face of the earth. It is not unlikely, however, that after the dispersion of the people, and their leaving the place unfinished,⁷ Nimrod and his subjects, coming out of Arabia, or some other neighbouring country, might, after their fricht was over, settle at Babel, and there building the city of Babylon, and repairing the tower, make it the metropolis (as afterwards it was) of all the Assyrian empire.

To this purpose there is a very remarkable passage⁸ in Diodorus Siculus, where he tells us, "That on the walls of one of the Babylonian palaces was portrayed a general hunting of all sorts of wild beasts, with the figure of a woman on horseback piercing a leopard, and a man fighting with a lion; and that on the walls of the other palace were armies in battalia, and huntings of several kinds." Now of this Nimrod, the sacred historian informs us, that he was a great and remarkable hunter, so as to pass into a proverb; and this occupation he might the rather pursue as the best means of training up his companions to exploits of war, and of making himself popular by the glory he gained, and the public good he did, in destroying those wild beasts, which at that time infested the world. And as this was a part of his character, the most rational account that we can give of these ornaments in the Babylonian palaces is, that they were set up by some of Nimrod's descendants in their ancestor's imperial city, in memory of the great founder of their family, and of an empire which afterwards grew so famous.

For, if we consider, that they were now in the midst of a vast plain, undistinguished by roads, buildings, or boundaries of any kind, except rivers; that the provision of pasture, and other necessities, obliged them to separate, and that, when they were separated, there was a necessity of some landmark to bring them together again upon occasion, otherwise all communication, and with it all the pleasures of life, must be cut off; we can hardly imagine any thing more natural, and fit for this purpose, than the erection of a tower, large and lofty enough to be seen at great distances, and consequently sufficient to guide them from all quarters of that immense region; and when they had occasion to correspond, or come together, nothing certainly could be more proper than the contiguous buildings of a city for their reception and convenient communication.

If we consider, likewise, that all the pride and magnificence of their ancestors were now defaced, and utterly destroyed by the deluge, without the least remains or memorial of their grandeur; that consequently the earth was a clear stage whereon to erect new and unrivalled monuments of glory and renown to themselves; and that at this juncture they wanted neither art nor abilities, neither numbers nor materials, to make themselves masters of what their vanity projected; we may reasonably suppose, that the affectation of renown was another motive to their undertaking; since it is very well known, that this is the very principle which has all along governed the whole race of mankind, in all the works and monuments of magnificence, the mausoleums, pillars, palaces, pyramids, and whatever has been erected of any pompous kind, from the foundation of the world to this very day. So that, taking their resolution under the united light of these two motives, the reasoning of the builders will run thus:—"We are here in a vast plain; our dispersion is inevitable; our increase, and the necessities of life demand it. We are strong and happy when united; but, when divided, we shall be weak and wretched. Let us then contrive some means of union and friendly society, which may, at the same time, perpetuate our fame and memory. And what means so proper for these purposes as a magnificent city, and mighty tower, whose top may touch the skies? The tower will be a landmark to us, through the whole extent of this plain, and a centre of unity, to prevent our being dispersed; and the city, which may prove the metropolis of the whole earth, will at all times afford us a commodious habitation. Since then we need fear no dissolution of our works by any future deluge, let us erect something that may immortalise our names, and outvie the labours of our antediluvian fathers." And that this seems to have been the reasoning of their minds, will further appear, if we come now to take a short survey of the dimensions of the building, according to the account which the best historians have given us of it.

It is the opinion of the learned ³ Bochart, that whatever we read of the tower, enclosed in the temple of Belus, may very properly be applied to the tower of Babel; because, upon due search and examination, he conceives them to be one and the same structure. Now of this tower ⁴ Herodotus tells us, that it was a square of a furlong on each side, that is, half a mile in the whole circumference, whose height, being equal to its basis, was divided into eight towers, built one upon another; but what made it look as divided into eight towers, was very probably the manner of its ascent. The passage to go up it, continues our author, was a circular or winding way, carried round the outside of the building, to its highest point: ⁵ from whence it seems most likely that the whole ascent was, by the benching-in, drawn in a sloping line from the bottom to the top eight times round it, which would make it have the appearance of eight towers one above another. This way was so exceedingly broad, that it afforded space for horses and carts, and other means of carriage, to meet and turn; and the towers, which looked like so many stories upon one another, were each of them seventy-five feet high, in which were many stately rooms, with arched roofs supa Here they speak as if they feared a dispersion; but it is hard to tell for what cause, unless it was this:—That Noah, having projected a division of the earth among his posterity, (for it was a deliberate business, as we noted before,) the people had no mind to submit to it, and therefore built a fortress to defend themselves in their resolution of not yielding to his design; but what they dreaded, they brought upon themselves by their own vain attempt to avoid it.—See Patrick's Commentary, and *Usher to A. ported by pillars, which were made parts of the temple, after the tower became consecrated to that idolatrous use; and on the uppermost of the towers, which was held more sacred, and where their most solemn devotions were performed, there was an observatory, by the benefit of which it was, that the Babylonians advanced their skill in astronomy beyond all other nations.

Some authors,^a following a mistake in the Latin version of Herodotus, wherein the lowest of these towers is said to be a furlong thick, and a furlong high, will have each of the other towers to be of a proportionate height, which amounts to a mile in the whole: but the Greek of Herodotus (which is the genuine text of that author) says no such thing, but only that it was a furlong long, and a furlong broad, without mentioning any thing of its height; and ¹ Strabo, in his description of it, (calling it a pyramid, because of its decreasing or benching-in at every tower,) says of the whole, that it was a furlong high, and a furlong on every side; for to reckon every tower a furlong high, would make the thing incredible, even though the authority of both these historians were for, as they are against it. Taking it only as it is described by Strabo, it was prodigious enough; since, according to his dimensions only, without adding any farther, it was one of the most wonderful works in the world, and much exceeded the greatest of the pyramids of Egypt, though it was not built of such durable materials.

In this condition continued the tower of Babel, or the temple of Belus, until the time of Nebuchadnezzar; but he enlarged it by vast buildings, which were erected round it, in a square of two furlongs on every side, or a mile in circumference, and enclosed the whole with a wall of two miles and an half in compass, in which were several gates leading to the temple, all of solid brass, which very probably were made of the brazen sea, the brazen pillars, and the other brazen vessels which were carried to Babylon, from the temple of Jerusalem; for so we are told, that all the sacred vessels which Nebuchadnezzar carried from thence, he put ² into the house of his god in Babylon, that is, into the house or temple of Bel, for ^b that was the name of the great god of the Babylonians, surrounding it with the pomp of these additional buildings, and adorning it with the spoils of the temple of Jerusalem. This tower did not subsist much above an hundred years, when Xerxes, coming from his

Grecian expedition, wherein he had suffered a vast loss of men and money, out of pretence of religion,^c as being himself a Magian, and consequently detesting the worship of God by images,³ but in reality with a design to repair the damages he had sustained, demolished it, and laid it all in rubbish; having first plundered it of all its immense riches, among which were several images or statues of massy gold, and one⁴ particularly of forty feet high, which very probably was ^d that which Nebuchadnezzar⁵ consecrated in the plains of Dura.

Thus fell this great monument of antiquity, and was never repaired any more; for though Alexander, at his return to Babylon after his Indian expedition, expressed his intention of rebuilding it, and accordingly set ten thousand men on work to rid the place of its rubbish; yet, before they had made any progress therein, that great conqueror died on a sudden, and has ever since left both the city and tower so far defaced, that the very people of the country are at a loss to tell where their ancient situation was. Since some late travellers, however, have, in their opinions, found out the true ruins, and remains of this once renowned structure, we shall not be averse to gratify our reader's curiosity ⁶ with an account of what one, of the best authority among them, has thought fit to communicate to the public.

“In the middle of a vast and level plain,” says he, “about a quarter of a league from Euphrates (which in that place runs westward), appears an heap of ruined buildings like a huge mountain, the materials of which

^c The two great sects of religion among the Persians were the Magians and Sabians. The Sabians worshipped God through sensible images, or rather worshipped the images themselves. The Babylonians were the first founders of this sect; for they first brought in the worship of the planets, and afterwards that of images, and from thence propagated it to all other nations where it prevailed. The Magians, on the contrary, worship no images of any kind, but God only, together with two subordinate principles; the one, the author and director of all good, and the other, the author and director of all evil. These two sects have always had a mortal enmity to each other; and therefore it is no wonder that Xerxes, who had always the Archimæus attending him in his expeditions, with several other inferior Magi, in the capacity of his chaplains, should by them be prevailed on to take Babylon in his way to Susa, in order to destroy all the idolatrous temples there.

^d Nebuchadnezzar's golden image is said indeed in Scripture to have been sixty cubits, that is, ninety feet high, but that must be understood of the image and pedestal altogether. For that image being said to have been but six cubits broad or thick, it is impossible that the image could have been sixty cubits high; for that makes its height to be ten times its breadth or thickness, which exceeds all the proportions of a man, forasmuch as no man's height is above six times his thickness, measuring the slenderest man living at the waist. But where the breadth of this image was measured it is not said; perhaps it was from shoulder to shoulder, and then the proportion of six cubits' breadth will bring down the height exactly to the measure which Diodorus has mentioned. For the usual height of a man being four and an half of his breadth between the shoulders, it must, according to this proportion, have been twenty-seven cubits high, which is forty feet and an half. Nor must it be forgot what Diodorus further tells us, namely, that this image contained a thousand Babylonish talents of gold, which, upon a moderate computation, amounts to three millions and an half of our money. But now, if we advance the height of the statue to ninety feet without the pedestal, it will increase the value to a sum incredible; and therefore it is necessary to take the pedestal likewise into the height mentioned by Daniel.—Prideaux's Connection, part 1, b. 2.

^a The words of Herodotus are, “In the midst of the temple there is built a solid tower, eight furlongs in length and breadth; upon this tower another one is erected, and still on till altogether they are eight in number.” Now, though it be allowed that the word μῆκος may signify height as well as length, yet it is much better to take Herodotus in the latter sense here, otherwise the tower (if every story answers the lowest) will rise to a prodigious height, although nothing near to what Jerom (b. 5. Commentary on Isaiah) affirms, from the testimony of eye-witnesses, as he says, who examined the remains of it very carefully, namely, that it was no less than four miles high.—Universal History, b. 1, c. 2.

^b Bel is supposed to have been the same with Nimrod, and to have been called Bel from his dominion, and Nimrod from his rebellion; for Bel, or Baal, which is the same name, signify Lord, and Nimrod rebel, in the Jewish and Chaldean language. The former was his Babylonish name, by reason of his empire in that place, and the latter his Scripture name, by reason of his rebellion, in revolting from God to follow his own wicked designs.—Prideaux's Connection, part 1, b. 2.

are so confounded together that one knows not what to make of it. Its figure is square, and rises in form of a pyramid with four fronts, which answer to the four quarters of the compass, but it seems longer from north to south than from east to west, and is, as far as I could judge by my pacing it, a large quarter of a league. Its situation and form correspond with that pyramid which Strabo calls the tower of Belus; but even in his time it had nothing remaining of the stairs and other ornaments mentioned by Herodotus, for the greatest part of it was ruined by Xerxes and Alexander, who designed to have restored it to its former lustre, but was prevented by death.

“There appear no marks of ruins round the compass of this rude mass, to make one believe that so great a city as Babylon ever stood here. All that one can discover, within fifty or sixty paces of it, is only the remains here and there of some foundations of buildings; and the country round about it is so flat and level, that one can hardly conceive it should be chosen for the situation of so noble a city, or that there ever were any considerable structures on it. But considering withal, that it is now at least four thousand years since that city was built, and that in the time of Diodorus Siculus, as he tells us, it was almost reduced to nothing, I, for my part, am astonished that there appears so much as there does.

“The height of this mountain of ruins is not in every part equal, but exceeds the highest palace in Naples. It is a misshapen mass, wherein there is no appearance of regularity. In some places it rises in points, is craggy, and inaccessible, in others it is smooth, and of easy ascent.—Whether ever there were steps to ascend it, or doors to enter into it, it is impossible at present to discover; and from hence one may easily judge, that the stairs ran winding about on the outside, and that, being the less solid parts, they were the soonest demolished, so that there is not the least sign to be seen of them now.

“In the inside of it, there are some grottos, but so ruined that one can make nothing of them; and it is much to be doubted, with regard to some of them, whether they were built at the same time with the work, or made since by the peasants for shelter, which last seems to be more likely. It is evident from these ruins, however, that the tower of Nimrod (so our author calls it) was built with great and thick bricks, as I carefully observed, causing holes to be dug in several places for that purpose: but they do not appear to have been barned, but only dried in the sun, which is extremely hot in these parts.

“In laying these bricks, neither lime nor sand was made use of, but only earth tempered and petrified; and in those parts which made the floors, there had been mingled with the earth, which served instead of lime, bruised reeds or hard straws, such as large mats are made of, to strengthen the work. In several other places, especially where the strongest buttresses were to be, there were, at due distances, other bricks of the same size, but more solid, and burnt in kilns, and set in good lime or bitumen, but the greater number were such as were dried in the sun.”

This is the most of what this sedulous traveller could discover; and yet, upon the foot of these remarks, he makes no doubt to declare, “That this ruin was the ancient Babel or the tower of Nimrod (as he calls it), for besides the evidence of its situation, it is so acknowledged to be, and so called by the inhabitants of the country to this very day.” Notwithstanding some others are of a contrary opinion, namely,¹ that this and some other ruins not far distant from it, are not the remains of the original tower, but rather some later structures of the Arabs.

We cannot dismiss this subject, however, without making some reflections on the vanity and transitoriness of all sublunary things, as well as the veracity of all God’s predictions; since that goodly city, which was once the pride of all Asia, and the designed metropolis of the whole universe, according to the words² of the prophets, ‘is fallen, is fallen low, very low, and become a dwelling-place for dragons, an astonishment, and an hissing without an inhabitant;’ and that stately tower, which once reared its head on high, and seemed to menace the stars, is brought down to the ground, even to the dust; insomuch, that the place of it is to be seen no more; or, if by chance found out by some inquisitive traveller, the whole is now become only a confused heap of rubbish, according to the word of God by the same prophet; ³ ‘I will roll thee down from the rocks, and make thee as a burnt mountain, and they shall not take of thee a stone for a corner, nor a stone for foundations, but thou shalt be an everlasting desolation, saith the Lord.’^a

^a Various have been the conjectures respecting the reasons which induced the human race to unite, as one man, in this great enterprise. Some have supposed that their design was to raise a tower so high as to enable them to climb up to heaven; a strange opinion, founded upon a literal interpretation of these words in Scripture:—‘Let us build a city, and a tower whose top may reach unto heaven;’ an expression evidently intended to signify no more than that its height was to be uncommonly great. Similar expressions are to be found in Deut. i. 28, and ix. 1, where the cities of the heathen nations, who inhabited the land of Canaan, are described as ‘great, and walled or fenced up to heaven.’ Nor was it uncommon for the Greek poets to use the expressions, high as heaven, or reaching to the sun, when they wished to describe things of an extraordinary height. Josephus and some others have thought that it must have been designed to preserve them from a second deluge, which they greatly dreaded; but had that been the case, they would have betaken themselves to the mountains, and not made choice of the low country, for building a place of security. A third opinion is, that, as the tower was in the form of a pyramid, to the figure of which the flame of fire bears a resemblance, it was a monument designed in honour of the sun, to whose influence they ascribed the drying up of the flood. But there is no foundation in Scripture for that conjecture, and the date of that species of idolatry was probably not so early as it supposes. The reason assigned in Scripture is, ‘Let us make us a name, lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth.’ The most probable conjecture, therefore, seems to be, that, as they were now in a vast plain, undefined by any buildings, or roads, or any distinct boundaries; and as they must soon separate to attend their flocks, or go in quest of provisions, or perhaps dreading a dispersion, in consequence of Noah’s projected division of the earth among his posterity;—they built this tower, as a pharos, or landmark, to enable them to find their way back to the surrounding city; which, with its immense tower, they believed would be a lasting monument of their fame, and transmit their name with honour to posterity. In this view, their design had been to make the whole world one kingdom, and Babel its metropolis.

This interpretation seems also to account for the reason of the divine frustration of their great design, and of their consequent dispersion. It is given in these words, ‘Behold the people is one, and they have all one language, and this they begin to do; and now nothing will be restrained from them which they have imagined to do;’ that is, not as some have explained the words

CHAP. I.—Of the Dispersion and First Settlement of the Nations.

THE HISTORY.

IN what manner the children of Noah were admitted to the possession of the several countries they afterwards came to inhabit, the sacred historian has not informed us; but this we may depend on, that ¹ this great division of the earth was not the result of chance, but of mature deliberation; not a confused irregular dispersion, wherein every one went where he pleased, and settled himself where he liked best, but a proper assignment of such and such places, for every division and subdivision of each nation and family to dwell in. a Japheth, as we said before, though usually mentioned last, yet was in reality the eldest son of Noah, and accordingly has his

—if this scheme shall succeed, the divine plan for the government of the world will be frustrated; but, as the words more naturally signify, this their first attempt, and if they succeed in it, they will think themselves able for any undertaking,—no enterprise will appear too great for them. Accordingly, the very dispersion which they dreaded, they brought upon themselves, by their vain attempt to avoid it. 'The name of it was called Babel, because the Lord did there confound the language of all the earth, and from thence did the Lord scatter them abroad upon the face of all the earth.'—Ancient Universal History, vol. 1. Edinburgh Encyclopædia, article Babel.

a According to the Armenian tradition, recorded by Abal-faragi, Noah distributed the habitable earth from north to south between his sons, and gave to Ham the region of the blacks; to Shem the region of the tawny (fuscorum); and to Japheth the region of the ruddy (ruborum). p. 9. And he dates the actual division of the earth in the 140th year of Peleg, A. C. 2614, or 541 years after the deluge, and 191 years after the death of Noah, in the following order:—To the sons of Shem was allotted the middle of the earth, namely, Palestine, Syria, Assyria, Samaria, (Singar or Shinar,) Babel (or Babylonian), Persia, and Hegar (Arabia). To the sons of Ham, Terman (or Idumca, Jer. xlix. 7), Africa, Nigritia, Egypt, Nubia, Ethiopia, Scudid, and India, (or India east and west of the river Indus.) To the sons of Japheth, also Garbia (the north), Spain, France, the countries of the Greeks, Slavonians, Bulgarians, Turks, and Armenians, (Annals, p. 11.) In this curious and valuable geographical chart, Armenia, the cradle of the human race, was allotted to Japheth by right of primogeniture; and Samaria and Babel to the sons of Shem. The usurpation of these regions, therefore, by Nimrod, and of Palestine by Canaan, was in violation of the divine decree. Though the migration of the three primitive families from the central regions of Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Assyria, began about A. C. 2614, or 541 years after the deluge; yet it would be a considerable length of time before they all reached their destinations. Sir William Jones conjectures that the migration lasted about four centuries, (Asiatic Researches, vol. 4, p. 4.) in the course of which, by successive colonizations, they established far distant communities, and various modes of society and government. The Phœnicians, Arabians, Egyptians, Ethiopians, and Lybians, southwards; the Persians, Ethiopians, Indians, and Chinese, eastwards; the Scythians, Celts, and Tartars, northwards; and the Goths, Greeks, and Latins, even as far as the Peruvians and Mexicans of South America, and the Indian tribes of North America, westwards. All these various inhabitants of the globe retain a striking affinity in the leading principles of their language, customs, and religions, however diversified in process of time, from each other, by local circumstances; such affinity evincing their common descent from one and the same parent stock.—Hales's Analysis, vol. 1. p. 351. and vol. 2. p. 50. ^b The following account of the plantations of the three sons of descendants here placed in the front of the genealogy. He had ^b seven sons: Gomer, who seated himself in Phrygia; Magog, in Scythia; Madai, in Media; Javan, in Ionia, or part of Greece; Tubal, in Tibarene; Mashech, in Moschia, (which lies in the north-east parts of Cappadocia); and Tiras, in Thrace, Mysia, and the rest of Europe towards the north.

The sons of Gomer were Ashkanaz, who took possession of Ascania, (which is part of Lesser Phrygia); Riphah, of the Riphæan mountains; and Togarmagh, of part of Cappadocia and Galatia.

The sons of Javan were Eliskah, who seated himself in Peloponnesus; Tarshish, in Spain; Kittim, in Italy; and Dodanim ² (otherwise called Rhodanim) in France, not far from the banks of the river Rhone, to which he seems to have given the name. By these, and the colonies which in some space of time proceeded from them, not only a considerable part of Asia, but all Europe and the islands adjacent were stocked with inhabitants; and the several inhabitants were so settled and disposed of, that each tribe or family who spake the same language kept together in one body; and (though distant in situation) continued, for some time at least, their relation to the people or nation from whom originally they sprang.

Shem, the second son of Noah, (and from whom the Hebrew nation did descend,) had himself five sons; whereof Elam took possession of a country in Persia, called after himself at first, but in the time of Daniel it obtained the name of Susiana; Assur, of Assyria; Arphaxad, of Chaldea; Lud, of Lydia; and Aram, of Syria, as far as the Mediterranean Sea.

The sons of Aram were Uz, who seated himself in the country of Damascus; Hul, near Cholobatene in Armenia; Mash, near the mountain Masius; and Gether, in part of Mesopotamia.

Arphaxad had a son named Salah, who settled near Susiana, and begat Eber, (the father of the Hebrew nation,) who had likewise two sons: Peleg, whose name imports division, because in his days mankind was divided into several colonies; and Jocktan, who had a large offspring to the number of thirteen sons, all seated in Arabia Felix, and who, in all probability, were the progenitors of such people and nations as in those parts, in after ages, had some affinity to their several names. For here it was that the Allumœote, who took their name from Ahudad, the Selapeni, from Sheleph, and the Abalite, from Obal, &c., lived, namely, from that part of Arabia which lies between Musa (a famous sea-port in the Red Sea), and the mountain Climax, which was formerly called Sephar, from a city of that name built at the bottom of it, and then the metropolis of the whole country.

Ham, the youngest son of Noah, had four sons: whereof Cush settled his abode in that part of Arabia which lies towards Egypt; Mizraim, in both Upper and Lower Egypt; Phut, in part of Lybia; and Canaan, in the land which was afterwards called by his name, and in other adjacent countries.

The sons of Cush, were Seba, who settled on the south-west part of Arabia; Havilah, who gave name to a country upon the river Pison, where it parts with Euphrates, to run into the Arabian Gulf; Sabtah, who lived on the same shore (but a little more northward) of the Arabian Gulf; Raamah, who, with his two sons, Sheba and Dedan, occupied the same coast, but a little more eastward; and Sabtecha, who (we need not doubt) placed himself among the rest of his brethren. But among all the sons of Cush, Nimrod was the person who in those early days distinguished himself by his bravery and courage. His lot chanced to fall into a place that was not a little infested with wild beasts; and therefore he betook himself to the exercise of hunting, and, drawing together a company of stout young fellows, not only cleared the country of such dangerous creatures, but, procuring himself likewise great honour and renown by his other exploits, he raised himself at length to the dignity of a king (the first king that is supposed to have been in the world), and, having made Babylon the seat of his empire, laid the foundation of three other cities, namely, Erech, Accad, and Calnech, in the neighbouring provinces; and so, passing into Assyria, and enlarging his territories there, he built Nineveh, Rehoboth, Calah, and Resen, (Larissa,) situate upon the Tigris. But to return to the remainder of Ham's posterity.

Mizraim, his second son, became king of Egypt, which after his death was divided into three kingdoms by three of his sons; Ananim, who was king of Tanis or Lower Egypt, called afterwards Delta; Naphtulim, who was king of Naph or Memphis in Upper Egypt; and Pathrusim, who set up the kingdom of Pathros or Thebes in Thebais. Ludim and Lehabim peopled Lybia. Caslubim fixed himself at Cashiotis, in the entrance of Egypt from Palestine; and having two sons, Philistim and Caphterim, the latter he left to succeed him at Cashiotis, and the former planted the country of the Philistines, between the borders of Canaan and the Mediterranean Sea. The sons of Canaan were Sidon, the father of the Sidonians, who lived in Phœnicia; Heth, the father of the Hittites, who lived near Hebron; Emor, the father of the Amorites, who lived in the mountains of Judea; and Arvad, the father of the Arvadites, not far from Sidon: but whether the other sons of Canaan settled in this country cannot be determined with any certainty and exactness; only we must take care to place them somewhere between Sidon and Gerar, and Admah and Zeboim; for these were the boundaries of their land.

Upon the whole, then, we may observe, that the posterity of Japheth came into the possession, not only of all Europe, but of a considerable portion of Asia; ¹ for two of his sons, Tiras and Javan, together with their descendants, had all those countries which from the Mediterranean Sea, reach as far as Scandinavia northward; and his other sons, from the Mediterranean extending themselves eastward over almost all Asia Minor, and part of Armenia, over Media, Iberia, Albania, and those vast regions towards the north, where formerly the Scythians, but now the Tartars dwell: that the posterity of Ham held in their possession all Africa, and no small part of Asia; ² Mizraim, both the Upper, Lower, and Middle Egypt, Marmorica, and Ethiopia, both east and west; Phut, the remainder of Africa, Lybia Interior and Exterior, Numidia, Mauritania, Getulia, &c.; Cush, all Arabia that lies between the Red Sea and the Gulf; beyond the Gulf, Carmania, and no small part of Persia; and towards the north of Arabia (till expelled by Nimrod), Babylonia, and part of Chaldea: and Canaan, Palestine, Phœnicia, part of Cappadocia, and that large tract of ground along the Euxine Sea, even as far as Colchis: and that the posterity of Shem had in their possession part both of the Greater and Lesser Asia; ³ in the Lesser, Lydia, Mysia, and Caria; and in the Greater, Assyria, Syria, Mesopotamia, Armenia, Susiana, Arabia Felix, &c., and perhaps eastward all the countries as far as China.

These are the plantations ⁴ of the families of the sons of Noah in their generations, and after this manner were the nations divided in the earth after the flood. And now to descend to a more particular account of the posterity of his son Shem, from whom the Hebrews (who are the proper subjects of our history) were descended.

A. M. 1658, or 2258. Two years after the flood, when Shem was 100 years old, he had a son named Arphaxad; after which time he lived 500 years; so that the whole of his life was 600.

A. M. 1693, or 2393. Arphaxad, when 35 (135), ^a had a son named Salah, after which he lived 403 (303); in all 438.

A. M. 1723, or 2323. Salah, when 30 (130), had a son named Eber (from whom his descendants were called Hebrews), after which he lived 403 (303) years; in all, 433.

A. M. 1757, or 2657. Eber, when 34 (134), had a son named Peleg, in whose time (as we said) the earth came to be divided; after which he lived 430 (330) years; in all, 464.

A. M. 1787, or 2787. Peleg, when 30 (130), had a son named Reu, after which he lived 209 (109), years; in all, 239.

A. M. 1819, or 2919. Reu, when 32 (132), had a son named Serug; after which he lived 207 (107) years; in all 239.

A. M. 1849, or 3049. Serug, when 30 (130), had a son named Nahor, after which he lived 200 (100) years; in all 230.

A. M. 1878, or 3128. Nahor, when 29 (79), had a son named Terah; after which he lived 119 (69) years; in all 148. But of all these persons, it must be remarked, that they had several other children of both sexes, though not recorded in this history.

A. M. 1918, or 3268. Terah, when 70 (130), had three sons, one after another, Abram, Nahor, and Haran; whereof Haran, the eldest, died, before his father, in his native country of Ur, leaving behind him one son, whose name was Lot, and two daughters, whereof the elder, namely, Milcah, was married to her uncle Nahor, and the younger, a whose name was Sarai, was married to her uncle Abram; but at this time she was barren, and had no children.

The corruption of mankind was now become general, and idolatry and polytheism began to spread like a contagion; b the people of Ur in particular, ¹ as is supposed by the signification of the name, worshipped the element of fire, which was always thought a proper symbol of the sun, that universal god of the east. Terah, the father of Abram, ² was certainly a companion (some say a priest) of those who adored such strange gods; nor was Abram himself (as it is generally imagined) uninfected. But God being minded to select this family out of the rest of mankind, and in them to establish his church, ordered Terah to leave the place of his habitation, which was then corrupted in this manner; which accordingly he did, and taking with him his son Abram and his wife, together with his grandson Lot, left Ur, with an intent to go into Canaan, but in his journey fell sick at ^c Haran (which Stephen calls Charran) a city of Mesopotamia, where being forced to make his abode for some time, ^d in the 145th (205th) year of his age he died.

a It is very probable that Sarai was called Iscah, before she left Ur; because, in the 29th verse, we read that Haran had a daughter of that name; and yet we cannot suppose but that, had she been a distinct person, Moses would have given us an account of her descent, because it so much concerned his nation to know from whom they came both by the father and mother's side.—Patrick's Commentary.

b The city of Ur was in Chaldea, as the Scripture assures us in more places than one; but still its true situation is not so well known. For some think it to be the same as Camarina in Babylonia; others confound it with Orcha, or Orche in Chaldea; while others again take it for Ura or Surra, upon the banks of the river Euphrates. Bochart and Grotius maintain that it is Ura, in the eastern part of Mesopotamia, which was sometimes (as it appears from Acts vii. 2, 4.) included under the name Chaldea; and this situation seems the more probable, not only because it agrees with the words of St Stephen in the above-cited place, but with the writings of Ammianus Marcellinus likewise, who himself travelled this country, and mentions a city of this name, in the place where Bochart supposes it, about two days' journey from Nisibis.—Wells' Geography, vol. 1.

c Haran, which is likewise called Charan, according to the Hebrew, and Charan, according to the Greek pronunciation, was a city situated in the west or north-west part of Mesopotamia, on a river of the same name, which very probably runs into the river Chaboras, as that does into the Euphrates. It is taken notice of by Latin writers, on account of the great overthrow which the Parthians gave the Roman army under the command of Crassus, and, as some think, had its name given by Terah, in memory of Haran, his deceased son. But others think it is much better derived from the word Hharan, which denotes its soil to be hot and dust, as it appears to be from a passage out of Plutarch, in the life of Crassus, and several other ancient testimonies.—See Calmet's Dictionary, Wells' Geography, and Le Clerc's Commentary in locum.

d St Stephen (in Acts vii. 4.) tells us, that after the death of his father, Abraham removed from Haran, or, as he calls it Charan, to the land of Canaan. In Gen. xii. 4. we are told that Abraham was 'seventy-five years old when he departed out of Charran.' In Gen. xi. 26. it is said that Terah was 'seventy years old when he begat Abraham;' and yet, in verse 32. of the same chapter, it is affirmed, that 'he died, being two hundred and five years old.' But at this rate Terah must have lived 60 years after Abraham's going from Haran: for 75 (the number of Abraham's years when he left Haran) being added to 70, the number of Terah's years when he begat Abraham, make 145

CHAP. II.—Difficulties Obviated, and Objections Answered.

It may seem not a little strange to some, perhaps, why Moses, in his account of the times, both preceding and subsequent to the flood, should be so particular in setting down the genealogies of the patriarchs; but he who considers that this was the common method of recording history in those days, will soon perceive that he had reason sufficient for what he did, namely, to give content and satisfaction to the age wherein he wrote. We indeed, according to the present taste, think these genealogies but heavy reading; nor are we at all concerned who begat whom, in a period that stands at so distant a prospect; but the people, for whom Moses wrote, had the things either before their eyes, or recent in their memories. They saw a great variety of nations around them, different in their manners and customs, as well as their denominations. The names whereby they were then called, were not to them so antique and obsolete as they are to us. They knew their meaning, and were acquainted with their derivation. And therefore it was no small pleasure to them to observe, as they read along, the gradual increase of mankind; how the stem of Noah spread itself into branches almost innumerable, and how, from such and such a progenitor, such and such a nation, whose history and adventures they were no strangers to, did arise. Nor can it be less than some satisfaction to us, even at this mighty distance, to perceive, that, after so many ages, the change of languages, and the alteration of names, brought in by variety of conquests, we are still able to trace the footsteps of the names recorded by Moses; by the help of these can discover those ancient nations which descended from them, and with a little care and application, the particular regions which they once inhabited; whereof the best heathen geographers, without the assistance of these sacred records, were never in a capacity so much as to give us a tolerable guess.

But there is a farther reason for our historian's writing in this manner. God had promised to Adam, and, in him, to all his posterity, a restoration in the person of the Messiah. This promise was renewed ³ to Noah, and afterwards confirmed to Abraham, the great founder of years only; whereas the account in Genesis is, that he lived 205. This therefore must certainly proceed from a fault crept into the text of Moses; because of the 205 years which are given to Terah, when he died at Haran, he only lived 145, according to the Samaritan version, and the Samaritan chronicle, which, without doubt, do agree with the Hebrew copy, from which they were translated.—An Essay for a New Translation. But, as Dr Hales justly remarks, the chronology of this period has been considerably embarrassed by the vulgar error that Abraham was the eldest of Terah's sons, because he is first named. The consequence of this has been, that the date of his birth is usually assigned to the seventieth year of Terah, because it is said that Terah lived seventy years, and begat Abram, Nahor, and Haran. "But this is the date of the birth of Haran, who was undoubtedly the eldest son; because his daughters, Milcah and Iscah (the latter surnamed Sarai and Sarah) were married to their uncles, Nahor and Abram respectively; and Sarah was only ten years younger than her husband, Gen. xvii. 17.; Abram was probably the youngest son, born by a second wife, Gen. xx. 12, when Terah was 130 years old, Gen. xi. 32; xii. 4."—Analysis, &c. vol. 2. p. 107, second edition.—Ed.

the Jewish nation. Fit therefore it was, in this regard, that he should record exact genealogies, and that all other sacred historians should successively do the same: nor can we sufficiently admire the divine wisdom, in settling such a method, in the beginning of the world, by Moses, and carrying it on by the prophets, as might be of general use, as long as the world should last. For, as the expectation of the Messiah put the Jews upon keeping an exact account of all their genealogies; so, when Christ came into the world, it was evident, beyond dispute, that he was of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Judah, and of the lineage of David, according to the promises, which had, from time to time, been recorded of him.

It is well worth our observation, however, that, in the catalogue which Moses gives us of the descendants of Noah, he makes mention of no more than sixteen sons of the three brothers, or principal founders of so many original nations; nor of any more than seven of these sixteen, of whom it is recorded that they had any children; and even of these seven, there is one (we may observe) whose children are not numbered.¹ But it is not to be imagined, that in two or three hundred years, upon a moderate calculation, or even but in one hundred years, at the lowest account, Noah should have had no more than sixteen grandsons, and that, of these too, the majority should go childless to the grave; it is much more likely, or rather self-evident that the nine grandsons, of whom we find nothing in Scripture, were nevertheless fathers of nations, as well as any of the rest, and not only of original nations called after their names, but of lesser and subordinate tribes, called after their sons' names; and (what makes the amount to seem much less) there is reason to suppose, that how many soever the grandchildren of Noah were, we have, in this tenth chapter of Genesis, the names of those only who were patriarchs of great nations, and only of such nations as were in the days of Moses known to the Hebrews. For, if we read it attentively, we shall perceive,² that the design of the holy penman, is not to present us with an exact enumeration of all Noah's descendants, (which would have been infinite) no, nor to determine who were the leading men above all the rest; but only to give us a catalogue, or general account of the names of some certain persons, descended of each of Noah's children, who became famous in their generations; and so pass them by, as having not space enough in his history to pursue them more minutely. For we may observe, that the constant practice of our author (as it is indeed of all other good authors) is to cut things short that do not properly relate to his purpose; and when he is hastening to his main point, to mention cursorily such persons as were remarkable (though not the subject he is to handle) in the times whereof he treats.

Thus, in the entrance of his history, his business was to attend to the line of Seth, and therefore, when he comes to mention the opposite family of Cain,³ he only reckons up eight of them, and these the rather because they were the real inventors of some particular arts, which the Egyptians vainly laid claim to. And, in like manner, when he comes to the life of Isaac, Jacob's was the next line wherein his history was to run, and therefore he contents himself with giving us a catalogue of some of Esau's race, but such of them only as were in after-ages⁴ 'the dukes of Edom, according to their habitations in the land of their possession,' as he expresses it. Unless, therefore, we would desire it in an author, that he should be luxuriant and run wild, we cannot, with any colour of reason, blame the divine historian for stopping short upon proper occasions; for had he pursued all the families descended from Noah into their several plantations, and there given us the history of all their various adventures, the world, we may almost say, would not have contained the books which he must have written.

What grounds there may be for the supposition I cannot tell; but to me there seems to be no reason why we should be obliged to maintain, that all the parts of the habitable world were peopled at once, immediately after the confusion of languages. The historian, indeed, speaking of the persons he had just enumerated, gives us to know, that⁵ 'by these were the nations divided after the flood;' but how long after the flood he does not intimate: so that there is no occasion to understand the words, as though he meant, that, either by these only, or by these immediately, or by these all at once, was the earth replenished; but only, that among others (unmentioned because not so well known to the Jews) there were so many persons of figure descended from the sons of Noah, who, some at one time, and some at another, became heads of nations, and had, by their descendants, countries called after their names; so that⁶ by them the nations were divided, that is, people were broken into different nations on the earth, not all at once, or immediately upon the confusion, but at several times, as their families increased and separated after the flood.

For, considering that the number of mankind was then comparatively small, and the distance of countries, from the place of their dispersion, immensely wide; it is more reasonable to think that these several plantations were made at different times and by a gradual progression. Moses indeed informs us, that the earth was portioned out among the children of Noah after their tongues: supposing, then, that the number of languages was, according to the number of the heads of nations, sixteen, these sixteen companies issued out of Babel at separate times, and by separate routes, and so took possession of the next adjacent country whereunto they were to go. Here they had not settled long before the daily increase of the people made the bounds of their habitation too narrow; whereupon the succeeding generation, under the conduct of some other leader, leaving the place in possession of such as cared not to move, penetrated farther into the country, and there settling again, and again becoming too numerous, sent forth fresh colonies into the places they found unoccupied; till, by this way of progression on each side, from the centre to every point of the circumference, the whole world came in time to be inhabited in the manner that we now find it. If then the several parts of the globe were, by the sons of

Noah, gradually and at sundry times peopled, there wanted not all at once so many; and if several of the sons of Noah, who had their share in peopling the globe, are not taken notice of by Moses, there might possibly be many more to plant and replenish the earth, than we are aware of. Let us then see what their number, upon a moderate computation, might at this time be supposed to be.

To this purpose we are to remember, that we are not to make our computation according to the present standard of human life, which, "since the time of the flood, is vastly abbreviated; that the strength of constitution, necessary to the procreation of children, which, by a continued course of temperance and simplicity of diet, then prevailed, is now, by an induction of all manner of riot and excess, sadly impaired; and that the divine benediction which, in a particular manner, was then poured out upon the children of Noah, could not but prove effectual to the more than ordinary multiplication of mankind; so that length of days, assisted by the blessing of God, and attended with a confirmed state of health, could not but make a manifestly great difference between their case and ours.

Various are the ways which have been attempted by learned men, to show the probable increase of mankind in that period of time: but, for our present purpose, it will be sufficient to suppose ¹ that the first three couples, that is, Noah's three sons and their wives, in twenty years' time after the flood, might have thirty pair, and, by a gradual increase of ten pair for each couple in forty years' time, till the three hundred and fortieth year after

^a In the Mosaic history we find by what degrees the long lives which preceded the flood were after it shortened. The first three generations recorded in Scripture after the deluge, Arphaxad, Salah, and Heber, lived above 130 years; yet not so long as their ancestor Shem, who, being born 100 years before the flood, lived above 500 after it. The three next generations, Peleg, Reu, and Serug, lived not much above 230 years; and from their time, only Terah lived about 200. All the others after him were below that number. Moses came not to be above 120; and, in his days, he complains, that the age of man was shortened to about seventy or eighty years; and near this standard it has continued ever since.—Millar's Church History, p. 35.

^b Petavius (de Doct. Temp. b. ix. c. 11.) supposes that the posterity of Noah might beget children at seventeen; and that each of Noah's sons might have eight children in eight years after the flood; and that every one of these eight might beget eight more: by this means in one family (as in that of Japheth, 238 years after the flood) he makes a diagram, consisting of almost an innumerable company of men. Temperarius, (as the learned Usher in his Chron. Sacra, ch. 5. tells us,) supposes that all the posterity of Noah, when they attained twenty years of age, had every year twins; and hereupon he undertakes to make it appear, that in 102 years after the flood, there would be in all 1,534,100; but, without this supposition of twins, there would, in that time, be 388,605 males, besides females. Others suppose, that each of the sons of Noah had ten sons, and, by that proportion, in a few generations, the amount will rise to many thousands within a century. And others again insist on the parallel between the multiplication of the children of Israel in Egypt, and thereupon compute, that, if from seventy-two men, in the space of 215 years, there were procreated 610,000, how many will be born of three men in the space of 100 years? But what method soever we take to come to a probable conjecture, we still have cause to believe, that there was a more than ordinary multiplication in the posterity of Noah after the flood.—Stillingfleet's Origines Sacrae, v. iii. c. 4.

the flood, in which Peleg died, there might rise a sufficient number (c as appears by the table under the page) to spread colonies over the face of the whole earth. And, if to these the several collateral descents of Noah's posterity were taken in; if the children which Noah himself might possibly have in the 350 years he lived after the flood; which Shem and his two brothers might have in the last 160; which Salah and his contemporaries might have in the last 160; and which Heber and his contemporaries might have in the last 191 years of their lives, which are not reckoned in the account, together with the many more grandsons of Noah and their progeny, which in all probability (as we observed before) are not so much as mentioned in it; it is not to be imagined how much these additions will swell the number of mankind to a prodigious amount above the ordinary calculation.

But allowing the number at this time to be not near so large as even the common computation makes it; yet we are to remember that, at the first planting of any country, an handful of men as it were took up a large tract of ground. ² At their first division they were scattered into smaller bodies, and seated themselves at a considerable distance from one another, the better to prevent the 'increase of the beasts of the field upon them.' These small companies had each of them one governor, who, in Edom, seems to be called ³ a duke, and in Canaan, ⁴ a king, whereof there were no less in that small country than one and thirty at one time: but of what power or military force these several princes were, we may learn from this one passage in Abraham's life, namely, that ⁵ when Chedorlaomer, in conjunction with three other kings, had defeated the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah, with three kings more that came to their assistance, plundered their country, and taken away Lot and his family, who at this time sojourned in these parts; Abraham, with no more than 318 of his own domestics, pursues the conquerors, engages them, beats them, and, together with his nephew Lot, and all his substance, recovers the spoil of the country which these confederate kings were carrying away. A plain proof this, one would think, that this multitude of kings which were now in the world were titular, rather than real; and that they had none of them any great number of subjects under their command. For though Canaan was certainly a very fruitful land, and may therefore be presumed to be better stored with inhabitants than any of its neighbouring provinces; yet we find that when Abraham and Lot first came into it, though ⁶ 'they had flocks and herds, and tents, that the land was not able to bear them, that they might dwell together;' yet, as soon as they were separated, they found no difficulty to settle in any part thereof, with the rest of its inhabitants.

How great soever the growth of the Assyrian monarchy became at last, yet we have too little certainty of the time when it began, ever to question, upon that account, the truth of the population of the world by the sons of Noah. Ninus, whom profane history generally accounts the first founder of it, is placed,¹ by one of our greatest chronologers, in the 2737th year of the world, according to the Hebrew computation; so that, living in the time of the Judges, he is supposed to have been contemporary with Deborah, but² others think this is a date much too early. Nimrod, we must allow, founded a kingdom at Babylon, and perhaps extended it into Assyria, but this kingdom was but of small extent, if compared with the empires which arose afterwards; and yet, had it been ever so much greater, it could not have been of any long continuance, because the custom in those early days was for the father to divide his territories among his sons. After the days of Nimrod, we hear no more in the Sacred Records of the Assyrian empire till about the year 3234, when we find Pul invading the territories of Israel, and making Menahem tributary to him. It is granted indeed, that the four kings who, in the days of Abraham invaded the southern coast of Canaan, came from the countries where Nimrod had reigned, and perhaps were some of his posterity who had shared his conquests; but of what small significance such kings as these were, we are just now come from relating. Sesac and Memnon, two kings of Egypt, were great conquerors, and reigned over Chaldea, Assyria, and Persia; and yet in all their histories there is not one word of any opposition they received from the Assyrian monarchy then standing: and though Nineveh in the time of Joash king of Israel, was become a large city, yet it had not yet acquired that strength, as not to be afraid (according to the preaching of Jonah) of being invaded by its neighbours, and destroyed within forty days. Not long before this, it had freed itself indeed from the dominion of Egypt, and had got a king of its own, but what is very remarkable,³ its king was not as yet called the king of Assyria, but only⁴ the king of Nineveh; nor was his proclamation for a fast published in several nations, no nor in all Assyria, but only in Nineveh, and perhaps the villages adjacent; whereas, when once they had established their dominion at home, secured all Assyria properly so called, and began now to make war upon their neighbouring nations, their kings were no longer called the kings of Nineveh, but began to assume the title of the kings of Assyria. These, and several more instances which the author I have just now cited has produced, are sufficient arguments to prove that the Assyrians were not the great people some have imagined in the early times of the world; and that if they made any figure in Nimrod's days, it was all extinguished in the reigns of his successor, and never revived until God, for the punishment of the wickedness of his own people, was pleased to raise them from obscurity, and as the Scripture expresses it,⁵ 'stirred up the spirit of Pul, and the spirit of Tiglathpileser, king of Assyria.

And in like manner we may observe, that, whatever noise has been made in the world with the astronomical observations of the Chaldeans, which Aristotle is said to have sent into Greece, and which Alexander is thought to have taken at Babylon, the whole is a mere fiction and romance. There is nothing extant (as⁶ a very good judge of ancient and modern learning tells us) in the Chaldaic astrology of older date than the era of Nabonassar, which begins but 747 years before Christ. By this era the Chaldeans computed their astronomical observations, the first of which falls about the 27th year of Nabonassar, and all that we have of them are only seven eclipses of the moon, and even these but very coarsely set down, and the oldest not above 700 years before Christ. And, to make short of the matter, the same author informs us farther, that the Greeks were the first practical astronomers who endeavoured in earnest to make themselves masters of the sciences; that Thales was the first who could predict an eclipse in Greece, not 600 years, and that Hipparchus made the first catalogue of the fixed stars not above 650 years before Christ.⁶

What the history of the Chaldeans and Egyptians, and their boasted antiquity is, we have had occasion to take notice⁷ elsewhere, and need only here to add, that, bating that strange affectation wherein they both agree, of being thought so many thousand years older than they have any authentic testimonies to produce, there is a manifest analogy between Scripture history and what Berosus has told us of the one, and Manetho of the other. Referring therefore to what has been already said of them, we have only to observe, that⁸ the genealogy which the Chinese—another people pretending to high antiquity—give us of the family of their first man, Puoncuus, seems to carry a near resemblance to Moses' patriarchal genealogies; Thienhoang, their second king's civilizing the world, answers very well to Seth's settling the principles and reforming the lives of men; and Fohi's fourth successor, whom they accuse of destroying their ancient religion and introducing idolatry, is plainly copied from the history of Nimrod, who was probably the first establisher of idol worship. So that from these, and some other particulars in their history, we may be allowed to conclude that the ancient Chinese (as all other nations did) agreed in the main with Moses in their antiquities; and that the true reason of their chronological difference is, that the reigns of the Chinese kings (in the very same manner as the Egyptian dynasties) were not successive,⁹ but of several contemporary princes, who at one and the same time had different and distinct dominions.

a The most ancient astronomical observations known to us are Chinese, next to them are the Chaldeans or Hindoos, both of whom had made considerable progress in astronomy at a very early period; to them succeed the Egyptians, who in placing their pyramids exactly facing the four cardinal points of the compass; and, by the zodiacs discovered in Egypt, are proved to have made considerable progress in the science; and, after the Egyptians, came the Greeks, who certainly made greater progress in the science than any of their predecessors.—Ed.

The want of certain records of ancient times, and, consequently, the gross ignorance which some nations laboured under as to their original, has thrown several into a wild notion and conceit that they were self-originated, came never from any other place, and had never any primordial founder or progenitor. But now, whatever hypothesis they are minded to take; whether they suppose a beginning or no beginning of human generation; whether they suppose men to have sprung out of the sea or out of the land; to have been produced from eggs cast into the matrix of the earth, or out of certain little pustule or fungosities on its surface; to have been begotten by the anima mundi in the sun, or by an anima terræ, pervading the body of this terraqueous globe; to have been sent forth into the world silently and without noise, or to have opened the womb of their common mother with loud claps of thunder: and, whether they suppose the succession of generations of mankind a parte ante, to have been infinite, indefinite, or finite, and the geniture, or origination of mankind, to have been either the same with the geniture of the great world, or later, or heterogeneous, or quite foreign to it: take they which of these hypotheses they will, I say, and when they once come to reason upon it, they will soon find themselves hampered and entangled with absurdities and impossibilities almost innumerable.

All nations to whom the philosophers, in search after knowledge, resorted, had memorials, we find, left among them of the first origin of things; but the universal tradition of the first ages was far better preserved among the eastern than western nations, and these memorials kept with greater care by the Phœnicians and Egyptians, than by the Greeks and Romans. ¹ Among the Greeks, however, when they first undertook to philosophize, the beginning of the world, with the gradual progression of its inhabitants, was no matter of dispute; but that being taken for granted, the inquiry was, out of what material principles the cosmical system was formed; and Aristotle, arrogating to himself the opinion of the world's eternity as a nostrum, declared that all mankind before him asserted the world's creation.

From this wild notion of Aristotle, in opposition to an universal tradition and the consent of all ages, the poets took occasion to turn the histories of the oldest times into fables; and the historians, in requital and courtesy to them, converted the fables which the poets had invented into histories, or rather popular narratives; and most of the famous nations of the earth, that they might not be thought more modern than any of their neighbours, took occasion too of forging certain antiquities, foolish genealogies, extravagant calculations, and the fabulous actions and exploits of gods and heroes, that they might thus add to their nobility, by an imaginary anticipation of time, beyond the possible limits that could be made known by any pretence of certainty.

The wiser sort of men, however, saw into this, and from the ordinary increase and propagation of mankind, the invention and growth of arts and sciences, and the advancements carried on in civil discipline and government, could discern the folly and superstition of all such romantic pretensions: but then, having lost the true ancient tradition, they were driven to the necessity of a perpetual vicissitude, either of general or particular deluges; by which, when things were come to their crisis and perfection, they were made to begin again, and all preceding memoirs were supposed to be lost in these inundations. But this is all a groundless conjecture, a mere begging of the question, and a kind of prophesying backwards of such alterations and revolutions as it is morally impossible for them to know any thing of.

Since, therefore, an eternal succession of generations is loaded with a multitude of insuperable difficulties, and no valid arguments are to be found for making the world older than our sacred books do make it; since the presumed grandeur of the Assyrian and other monarchies, too soon after the flood to be peopled by Noah's children, is a gross mistake, and the computations of the Chaldeans and other nations, from their observations of the celestial bodies, groundless and extravagant; since all the pretensions of the several aborigines are found to be ridiculous, and the more plausible inventions of successive revolutions entirely imaginary; since neither the self-originists, nor the revolutionists, even upon their own principles, can account for what is most easily accounted for by the writings of Moses; and (what is a farther consideration) since ^a there are many customs and usages, both civil and religious, which have prevailed in all parts of the world, and can owe their original to nothing else but a general institution; which institution could never have been, had not all mankind been of the same blood originally, and instructed in the same common notices before they were divided in the earth:—since the matter stands thus, I say, we have all the reason in the world to believe, that this whole narration of Moses concerning the origination of mankind, their destruction by the flood, their renovation by the sons of Noah, their speedy multiplication to a great number, their dispersion upon the confusion of languages, and their settling themselves in different parts of the world according to their allotments, is true in fact; because it is rational and consistent with every event, consonant to the notions we have of God's attributes, and not repugnant to any system of either ancient or modern geography that we know of.

Time, indeed, and the uncertain state of languages; the different pronunciation of the same word, according to the dialect of different nations; the alterations of names in several places, and substitution of others of the like importance in the vernacular tongue; the disguising of ancient stories in fables, and frequently mistaking the idiom of oriental languages; the inundation of barbarism in many countries, and the conquests and revolutions generally introductive of new names, which have happened almost in all; these, and several other causes, create some perplexity in determining the places recorded by Moses, and ascertaining the founder of each particular nation; but still, notwithstanding these disadvantages, we may, in some measure, trace the footsteps of the sons of Noah, issuing out from Babel into the different quarters of the world, and, in several countries, perceive the original names of their founders preserved in that of their own.

For though the analogy of names be not, at all times, a certain way of coming to the knowledge of things; yet, in this case, I think it can hardly be denied, but that the Assyrians descended from Assur; the Canaanites, from Canaan; the Sidonians, from Sidon; the Lydians, from Lud; the Medes, from Madai; the Thracians, from Tiras; the Elamites, from Elam; the Ionians, from Javan; with several others produced by ¹Grotius, ²Montanus, ³Junius, ⁴Pererius, and, more especially, ⁵by Bochart, that most splendid star of France, (as ⁶one calls him upon this occasion,) who, with wonderful learning and industry, has cleared all this part of sacred history, and given a full and satisfactory account of the several places where the posterity of Noah seated themselves after the deluge.

How the large continent of America came to be peopled (since no mention of it is made in the writings of Moses, and so vast a sea separates it from every other part of the known world,) is a question that has exercised the wit of every age since its first discovery. It is worthy our observation, however, that though all the great quarters of the world are, for the most part, separated from each other by some vast extensive ocean; ⁷yet there is always some place or other, where some isthmus or small neck of land is found to conjoin them, or some narrow sea is made to distinguish and divide them. Asia and Africa, for instance, are joined together, by an isthmus which lies between the Mediterranean sea and the Arabian gulf. Upon the coasts of Spain and Mauritania, Europe and Africa are divided by no larger a sea than the Fretum Herculis, or straits of Gibraltar; and above the Palus Meotis, Europe has nothing to part it from Asia but the small river Tanais. America, as it is divided into north and south, is joined together by a neck of land, which, from sea to sea, is not above eighteen leagues over: what separates North America from the northern parts of Asia is only the straits of Anien; or South America, from the most southern parts of Asia, is only the straits of Magellan. And therefore, since Providence, in the formation of the earth, has so ordered the matter, that the principal continents are, at some places or other, either joined together by some little isthmus, or generally separated by some narrow sea; and (what is further to be observed) since most of the capital islands in our part of the hemisphere, such as Sumatra in Asia, Madagascar in Africa, and England in Europe, are generally at no great distance from the continent; we have some reason to presume that there may possibly be a certain neck of land (though not as yet discovered) which may join some part of Asia, or perhaps some part of Europe, to the main continent of America. Or, if we may not be allowed that supposition, yet ⁸why might not these formerly have been such a bridge (as we may call it) between the south-east part of China and the most southern continent of this new world, though now broken off (as ⁹some suppose England to have been from France) by the violent concussions of the sea; as indeed the vast number of islands which lie between the continent of China and New Guinea (which are the most contiguous to each other) would induce one to think, that once they were all one continued tract of land, though, by the irruption of the sea, they are now crumbled into so many little islands?

The difference, however, between the inhabitants of South and North America is so remarkably great, that there is reason to imagine they received colonies at first from different countries; and therefore some are of opinion, that as the children of Shem, being now well versed in navigation, might, from the coasts of China, take possession of the southern parts; so might the children of Japheth, either from Tartary pass over the straits of Anien, or out of Europe, first pass into Norway, thence into Iceland, thence into Greenland, and so into the northern parts of America. And this they think the more probable, because of the great variety of languages which are observed among the natives of this great continent; a good indication, as one would imagine, of their coming thither at different times and from different places. ^a

^a The discoveries of Captain Cook and other celebrated navigators, whilst they have detected the mistakes that prevailed in the days of our author respecting a southern continent and immense oceans in the north, have rendered it much less difficult now than it was then to trace the population of America from Asia and Europe. It appears from Cook's and King's Voyage, vol. 3. p. 272, "that the continents of Asia and North America are usually joined together by ice during the winter. In Behring's Straits, at a place about 66° N. the two coasts are only thirteen leagues asunder, and about midway between them lie two islands, the distance of which from either shore is short of twenty miles. At this place the natives of Asia could find no difficulty in passing over to the opposite coast, which is in sight of their own. That in a course of years such an event would happen cannot admit of a doubt. 'The canoes which we saw,' says Mr Damwell, 'among the Tschutski were capable of performing a much longer voyage; and however rude they may have been at some distant period, we can scarcely suppose them incapable of a passage of six or seven leagues. People might even have been carried over by accident upon floating ice; they might also have travelled across on sledges or on foot, for we have reason to believe that the straits are entirely frozen over in the winter; so that during that season the continents, with respect to the communication between them, may be considered as one.'

North America might likewise have been peopled from Europe. The Lutheran and Moravian missionaries, who first settled in Greenland, have informed us that the north-west coast of that country is separated from America by a very narrow strait: "that at the bottom of the bay into which this strait conducts, it is highly probable that they are united; that the inhabitants of the two countries have some intercourse with one another; that the Esquimaux of America perfectly resemble the Greenlanders in their aspect, dress, and mode of living; that some sailors, who had acquired the knowledge of a few words in the Greenlandish language, reported that these were understood by the Esquimaux; that, at length, a Moravian missionary, well acquainted with the language of Greenland, having visited the country of the Esquimaux, found, to his astonishment, that they spoke the same language with the Greenlanders, that they were in every respect the same people; and he was accordingly received and entertained by them as a friend and a brother."

There can therefore be no doubt, but that either that part of America, which is occupied by the Esquimaux, was first peopled from Greenland, or Greenland from North America. The great historian, however, from whose works these extracts are immediately taken, justly observes, that the Esquimaux are the only tribe of Americans who can be rationally supposed to have emigrated from the north of Europe. All the other American nations, from Cape Horn to the northern confines of Labrador, appear to have migrated from the north-east of Asia. "There is (says he) such a striking similitude in the form of their bodies, and the qualities of their minds, that notwithstanding the diversities occasioned by the influence of climate, or unequal progress in improvement, we must pronounce them to be all descended from one source. It is remarkable, that in every peculiarity, whether in their persons or dispositions, which characterize the Americans, they have some resemblance to the rude tribes scattered over the north-east of Asia, but almost none to the nations settled in the northern extremities of Europe. We may therefore refer them to the former origin, and conclude that their Asiatic progenitors, having settled in those parts of America where the proximity of the two continents have been discovered, spread gradually over its various regions. This account of the progress of population in America coincides with the traditions of the Mexicans concerning their own origin, which, imperfect as they are, were preserved with more accuracy, and merit greater credit than those of any other people in the New World. According to them, their ancestors came from a remote country, situated to the north-west of Mexico. The Mexicans point out their various stations as they advanced from this into the interior provinces, and it is precisely the same route which they must have held if they had been emigrants from Asia. The Mexicans, in describing the appearance of their progenitors, their manners, and habits of life at that period, exactly delineate those of the rude Tartars, from whom I suppose them to have sprung."—Robertson's History of America, book iv.

We, indeed, according to the common forms of speech, call those places islands, which are on every side sur-

This is undoubtedly such an account of the peopling of the New World as ought to satisfy every candid reader. It is, however, true, as Dr Hales observes, that South America may have been peopled by means of the great chain of lately discovered islands scattered between the two vast continents, and successively colonized from Asia; and also on its eastern side, by vessels driven by storms, or trade winds and currents, from the shores of Europe and Africa. There can, indeed, be little doubt, as the same learned author observes, but that such of the tropical isles, in the great South Sea or Pacific Ocean, as are inhabited, were colonized by the Malaysians, those Phœnicians, as he calls them, of the oriental world; for the Malayan language is found to prevail in some degree through all the various clusters of those isles, from Madagascar westwards, near the African coast, to the remotest of Captain Cook's discoveries, the Marquesas and Easter island, towards South America. Nor let any man object to this theory, by asking what could induce the Malaysians first to undertake voyages of discovery in so immense an ocean. The discoveries were probably made by ships driven far out of their intended course, to islands from which those who had unexpectedly arrived at them could never return; and this is now well known to have actually happened to barbarians less likely than the Malaysians to undertake voyages of discovery. Captain Cook, in his last voyage, when carrying back Omai to his native country, discovered the island called Wateroo; and had scarcely landed with his passenger on the beach, when Omai recognised among the crowd three of his own countrymen, natives of the Society Isles. The Society Isles are distant from Wateroo about two hundred leagues; and the account which those men gave of their arrival at that island is extremely affecting, while its truth could not be questioned. "About twenty persons of both sexes had embarked on board a canoe at Otahete, to cross over to the neighbouring island Alixta. A violent and contrary wind drove them they knew not whither, to a distance from both islands. They had all perished but four men, when their vessel was overset in sight of Wateroo, when canoes came off and carried them ashore." Had all the persons, male and female, who left Otahete, been thus driven on a desert island, who can entertain a doubt but that in a short time they would have peopled it; and if a few barbarians were thus carried, in a wretched canoe, not intended for voyages out of sight of land, to an island distant 600 miles, there is surely no difficulty in conceiving that the oriental Phœnicians, in better vessels, and with greater skill in seamanship, may have successively colonized the rounded by the sea; but the Hebrews were wont to give that name to all maritime countries, such as either had several islands belonging to them, or such as had no islands at all, provided they were divided from Palestine or from Egypt by the sea, and could not conveniently be gone to any other way. ¹ Such are the countries of the Lesser Asia and the countries of Europe, where the descendants of Japheth were seated; and that by these are denoted the isles of the Gentiles, ^a might be evinced from several parallel passages in Scripture. At present we need only take notice, that as the Lesser Asia was from Babel the nearest place of Japheth's allotment, it is very probable that he and his sons continued there for some time, till the increase of their progeny made them send out colonies, which not only peopled the isles of the Mediterranean and Ægean seas, but, passing into Europe, spread themselves farther and farther, till at length they came to take possession of the very island wherein we now live.

To this purpose the writers on this subject have made it appear, that, from their original country, which was Asia Minor, they sent a colony to the Mæotic Lake, on the north of the Euxine sea, and as they were called Cimmerii in Asia, so they gave the name of Bosphorus Cimmerius to the straits we there meet with; that, after this, spreading farther they fell down the Danube, and settled in a country, which ^b from them was called Germany; that from Germany they advanced still farther, till they came into France, for the inhabitants of France (as ^b Josephus tells us) were anciently called Gomerites; and that from France they came into the south part of Britain, and therefore we find that the Welsh (the ancient islands between Asia and South America, and at last America itself. Indeed if there be any credit due to the Peruvian traditions concerning the founders of their empire, Manco Capac and his wife must have been far advanced in civilization; and were probably some enlightened Asiatics driven on the Peruvian coast.—See Hales' Analysis of Chronology, and Prichard's Researches into the Physical History of Man—one of the most satisfactory works on the colonization of the earth, and the varieties of the human species, that I have ever seen.

^a Thus the prophet Isaiah (ch. xi. ver. 10, 11) speaking of the calling of the Gentiles, and of the restoration of the Jews, has these words—"The Lord shall recover the remnant of his people from Assyria, Egypt, Pathros, Cush, Elam, Shinar, Hamah, and from the isles of the sea;" where, by the isles of the sea (which is the same with the isles of the Gentiles) we must necessarily understand such countries as are distinct from the countries which are here expressly named; namely, Assyria, Egypt, &c., and, therefore, most likely the countries of Lesser Asia and Europe. The same prophet, in order to show God's omnipotency, speaks in this manner—"Behold the nations are as a drop of the bucket, and are counted as the small dust of the balance; behold he takes up the isles as a very little thing," ch. xl. 15. Where, if by isles we mean those which we call strictly so, the comparison of the disparity is lost, because those which we call isles are indeed very little things; and therefore the proper signification of the word in this place must be those large countries which were beyond the sea, in regard to Egypt whence Moses came, or Palestine whither he was now going.—Wells' Geography, vol. 1. p. 113.

^b The people of this country are called Germans, and they call themselves German, which is but a small variation and easy contraction for Gomeren, that is, the Gomerians: for the termination en is a plural termination in the German language, and from the singular number Gomer is formed Gomren, by the same analogy that from brother we form brethren.—Wells' Geography, vol. 1. p. 127, and Bedford's Script. Chron. b. ii. c. 4. inhabitants of this isle) call themselves Kumero or Cymro; call a woman Kumeraes, and the language they speak Kumeraeg; which several words carry in them such plain marks of the original name from whence they are derived, that if any regard is to be had to etymologies in cases of this nature, we cannot forbear concluding that the true old Britons, or Welsh, are the genuine descendants of Gomer. And since it is observed that the Germans were likewise the descendants of Gomer, particularly the Cymbri, to whom the Saxons, and especially the Angles, were near neighbours, it will hence likewise follow that our ancestors, who succeeded the old Britons in the eastern part of this isle, were in a manner descended from Gomer, the first son of Japheth.

Thus we see that the plantations of the world by the sons of Noah and their offspring, recorded by Moses in this tenth chapter of Genesis, and by the inspired author of the first book of Chronicles, are not unprofitable fables, or endless genealogies, but a most valuable piece of history, which distinguishes from all other people that particular nation of which Christ was to come; gives light to several predictions and other passages in the prophets; shows us the first rise and origin of all nations, their gradual increase and successive migrations, cities building, lands cultivating, kingdoms rising, governments settling, and all to the accomplishment of the divine benediction,—² ‘Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth; and the fear of you and the dread of you shall be upon every other creature.’

CHAP. III.—Of the Sacred Chronology and Profane History, Letters, Learning, Religion, and Idolatry, &c., during this period.

BEFORE we enter upon the history of the world, as it is delivered in some heathen authors, from the time of the flood to the calling of Abraham, it may not be improper to settle the sacred chronology; and that the rather, because the difference is very considerable, as appears by the subsequent table, according as we follow the computation of the Hebrew text, of the Samaritan copies, of the Greek interpreters, or of Josephus. But, before we come to this, we must observe, that in the catalogue which we refer to, Moses takes notice of no other branch of Noah’s family, but only that of Shem and his descendants in a direct line to Abraham; and the different computations³ relating to them may be best perceived by the following table:—

Now, whoever casts his eye into this table may easily perceive, that except the variations which may possibly have been occasioned by the negligence of transcribers, the difference between the Samaritan and Septuagint chronology, and that of Josephus, is so very small, that one may justly suspect that the Samaritan has been transcribed from the Septuagint, on purpose to supply some defect in its copy, and that Josephus had, for some reason or other, adopted the chronology of the same version; but that the difference between the Greek and Hebrew chronology is so very great, that the one or other of them must be egregiously wrong; because the Seventy do not only add a patriarch, named Cainan, never mentioned in the Hebrew, and so make eleven generations from Shem to Abraham instead of ten; but, in the lives of most of these patriarchs, they insert 100 years before they came to have children, that is, they make them fathers 100 years later than the Hebrew text does, though (to bring the matter to a compromise) they generally deduct them in the course of their lives.

On both sides have appeared men of great learning; but they who assert the cause of the Septuagint, are not unmindful to urge the testimony of St Luke, who, between Arphaxad and Salah, has inserted the name of Cainan, which (as he was an inspired writer) he could never have done, had not the Septuagint been right in correcting the Hebrew Scriptures: besides that, the numbers in the Septuagint give time for the propagation of mankind, and seem to agree better with the history of the first kingdoms of the world.

On the other hand, they who abide by the Hebrew text, cannot think that the authority of the Septuagint is so sacred as their adversaries imagine. Upon examination they find many things added, many things omitted, and, through the whole, so many faults almost every where occurring, that “were a man to recount them all” as St Jerom⁶ expresses it, “he would be obliged not only to write one, but many books;” “nor need we seek for distant examples of this kind,” says Bochart, “since this very genealogy is all full of anachronisms, vastly different both from the Hebrew and the vulgar version.”

 a To show how the western part of our island came likewise to be peopled, the above-cited author of Scripture chronology supposes, that when Joshua made his conquests in the land of Canaan, several of the inhabitants of Tyre, being struck with the terror of his arms, left their country, and being skilled in the art of navigation, sailed into Africa, and there built a city called Carthage, or the “city of the wanderers,” as he interprets the word; that the Syrians and Phœnicians, being always considerable merchants, and now settling in a place convenient for their purpose, began to enlarge their trade; and, coasting the sea shore of Spain, Portugal, and France, happened at length to chop upon the islands called Cassiterides, now the islands of Scilly, whereof he gives us a description from Strabo; that, having here fallen into a trade for tin and lead, it was not long before they discovered the Land’s End, on the west side of Cornwall, and finding the country much more commodious than Scilly, removed from thence, and here made their settlement. And this conjecture he accounts more feasible, by reason of the great affinity between the Cornish language and the ancient Hebrew Phœnician.—B. ii. c. 4, p. 195.

Editions moreover there were of an ancient date, which, in imitation of the Alexandrian manuscript preserved by Origen in his Hexapla, had none of this insertion. Both Philo and Josephus, though they make use of the Septuagint version, know nothing of Cainan; and Eusebius and Africanus, though they took their accounts of these times from it, have no such persons among their postdiluvians; and therefore¹ it is highly reasonable to believe, that this name crept into the Septuagint through the carelessness of some transcriber, who, inattentive to what he was about, inserted an antediluvian name (for such a person there was before the flood) among the postdiluvians, and having no numbers for his name, wrote the numbers belonging to Salah twice over.

Since therefore the Hebrew text, in all places where we find Noah's posterity enumerated, takes not the least notice of Cainan, but always declares Salah to be the immediate son and successor of Arphaxad;² we must either say that Moses did, or that he did not know of the birth of this pretended patriarch: if he did not, how came the LXX. interpreters by the knowledge of what Moses, who lived much nearer the time, was a diligent searcher into antiquity, and had the assistance of a Divine spirit in every thing he wrote, was confessedly ignorant of? If he did know it, what possible reason can be assigned for his concealing it, especially when his insertion or omission of it make such a remarkable variation in the account of time, from the flood to the call of Abraham, unless he was minded to impose upon us by a false or confused chronology, which his distinct observation of the series of the other generations, and his just assignment of the time which belonged to each, will not suffer us to think.

Rather, therefore, than impeach this servant of God (who has this testimony upon record, that³ 'he was faithful in all his house') either of ignorance or ill intent, we may affirm (with Bochart and his followers) that St Luke never put Cainan into his genealogy, (for as much as⁴ it is not to be found in some of the best manuscripts of the New Testament) but that some transcribers, finding it in the Septuagint, and not in St Luke, marked it down in the margin of their copies as an omission in the copies of St Luke; and so later copiers and editors, finding it thus in the margin, took it at last into the body of the text, as thinking, perhaps, that this augmentation of years might give a greater scope to the rise of kingdoms, which otherwise might be thought too sudden: whereas (if we will believe a very competent judge of this matter)⁵ "those who contend for the numbers of the Septuagint, must either reject, as some do, the concurrent testimony of the heathen Greeks, and the Christian fathers, concerning the ancient kingdoms of Assyria and Egypt, or must remove all those monarchies farther from the flood.

Nor must the testimony of Varro be overlooked, which tells us, that there were but 1600 years between the first flood and the Olympiads; whereas this number is exceeded seven or eight hundred years by the Septuagint's account. These, and several other considerations,⁶ says he, "incline me to the Hebrew numbers of the patriarchs generating, rather than to the Septuagint's; because, by the numbers of the Septuagint, there must be about 900 years between the flood and the first year of Ninus, which certainly is too much distance between a grandfather and a grandchild's beginning to reign."

Thus it seems reasonable to suppose, that the interpolation of the name of Cainan in the Septuagint version, might be the work of some ignorant and pragmatical transcriber; and in like manner, the addition and subtraction of several hundred years, in the lives of the fathers beforementioned, might be effected by such another instrument,⁶ who, thinking perhaps that the years of the antediluvian lives were but lunar ones, and computing that at this rate the six fathers (whose lives are thus altered) must have had their children at five, six, seven, and eight years old, which could not but look incredible, might be induced to add the 160 years, in order to make them of a more probable age of manhood, at the birth of their respective children. Or, if he thought the years of their lives to be solar, yet still he might imagine, that infancy and childhood were proportionably longer in men, who were to live 7, 8, or 900 years, than they are in us; and that it was too early in their lives for them to be fathers at sixty, seventy, or eighty years of age; for which reason he might add the 100 years, to make their advance to manhood (which is commonly not till one fourth part of our days is near over), proportionable to what was to be the ultimate term of their lives.⁶

⁶ Shuckford's Connection, vol. i. b. v. ex Lud. Capelli, Chron. Sacra in Apparatu Walton ad Bibl. Polyglot.

⁶ This last observation respecting the proportion that the length of the period before puberty bears to the longevity of men and of all other animals, is well founded, has been already shown in the discussion concerning the antediluvian chronology of the Hebrew Scriptures; and it is almost needless to observe, that the Jews who corrupted the Hebrew chronology, had the very same reason for curtailing the period between the flood and the birth of Abraham, as for shortening the distance between the origin of the human race and the flood. Their object in both cases, was to prove by the authority of their own Scriptures, to which the Christians as well as they appealed, that Jesus of Nazareth had come into the world a thousand years earlier than the period decreed for the advent of the Messiah promised to their fathers. With this view, as they had sunk 600 years in the successive generations of the antediluvian patriarchs, they chose to sink 700 in the generations of those descendants of Shem, from whom had sprung Abraham, the founder of their own nation, and the ancestor as well of Jesus of Nazareth as of the promised Messiah.

Notwithstanding all that has been said in favour of the immaculate purity of the Hebrew Scriptures, the postdiluvian genealogy of these Scriptures in their present state, furnishes internal evidence of its own corruption more striking perhaps than even that by which the corruption of the antediluvian genealogy has been detected. In the antediluvian genealogy the sums total of the lives of the several patriarchs are uniformly given; but in the postdiluvian genealogy, they are all, except the life of Abraham, as uniformly omitted, though retained in the Samaritan copy. This cannot have been done but for some sinister purpose; and indeed the absurdity in which the editors of the present text have involved themselves in their genealogy of Terah and Abraham, shows how unsafe it would have been to persist in their short generations, and at the same time to give the ages of the several

This seems to be the only method of reconciling the difference between the Septuagint version and the Hebrew text, in point of chronology; and now to proceed to what we find recorded in profane history, during this period.

After the dispersion of nations, the only form of government that was in use for some time, was paternal, when fathers of nations were as kings, and the eldest of families as princes; but as mankind increased, and their ambition grew higher, the dominion which was founded in nature, gave place to that which was acquired and established by power.

In early ages, a superiority of strength or stature was the most engaging qualification to raise men to be kings and rulers. The Ethiopians,¹ as Aristotle informs us, made choice of the tallest persons to be their princes; and though Saul was made king of Israel by the special appointment of God, yet it appears to have been a circumstance not inconsiderable in the eyes of the people,² 'that he was a choice young man, and goodly, and that there was not, among the children of Israel, a goodlier man than he:' but when experience came to convince men that other qualifications, besides stature and strength were necessary for the people's happiness, they then chose persons of the greatest wisdom and prudence for their governors.³ Some wise and understanding men, who knew best how to till and cultivate the ground, to manage cattle, to prune and plant fruit trees, &c., took into their families, and promised to provide for such as would become their servants, and submit to their directions: and thus, in continuance of time, heads of families became kings; their houses, together with the near habitations of their domestics, became cities; their servants, in their several occupations and employments, became wealthy and considerable subjects; and the inspectors and overseers of them, became ministers of state, and managers of the public affairs of the kingdom.

In the first beginning of political societies, almost every town (as we may suppose) had its own king;⁴ who, more attentive to preserve his dominions than to extend them, restrained his ambition within the bounds of his native country; till disputes with neighbours (which were sometimes unavoidable) jealousy of a more powerful prince, an enterprising genius, or martial inclination, occasioned those wars which often ended in the absolute subjection of the vanquished; whose possessions, falling into the power of the conqueror, enlarged his dominions, and both encouraged and enabled him to push on his conquests by new enterprises.

Nimrod was the first man we meet with in Scripture, who made invasions upon the territories of others: for he dispossessed Ashur, the son of Shem, who had settled himself in Shinar, and obliged him to remove into Assyria, whilst himself seized on Babylon, and having repaired, and not a little enlarged it, made it the capital of his kingdom.

⁵ This city was situated on both sides of the river Euphrates, having streets running from north to south, patriarchs at their respective deaths. The omission, however, it must be confessed, appears to have prevailed at an early period in the Hebrew text; for, as Dr Hales observes, it occurs also in the present copies of the Septuagint, and in all the other ancient versions.

"Still, however, the Septuagint furnishes evidence of the omission, by retaining the last words, found uniformly in the Samaritan text, και ἀπέθανε—and he died, throughout the whole. There cannot, therefore, remain a doubt, that the total lives were originally inserted in the ancient Jewish Hebrew copies, as well as in the Samaritan; no less than the total lives of the antediluvian patriarchs, in both Hebrew texts, and in all the ancient versions. And the centenary addition to the generations of the first seven patriarchs after the flood, is now fully established, by the triple evidence of the Samaritan text, the Septuagint version, and Josephus."

The same learned chronologer has proved likewise that the short Hebrew computation is absurd in itself, and inconsistent with history sacred and profane. 1. Eusebius well remarks; "The error of the Jewish Hebrew text is evident from this; that it makes Abraham and Noah contemporaries; for since, according to that text, there are no more than 292 years from the flood to Abraham; and since, according to the same text, Noah survived the flood 350 years; it follows that he lived to the fifty-eighth year of Abraham, which is absurd. 2. Upon this supposition, idolatry must have begun and prevailed, and the patriarchal government have been overthrown by Nimrod and the builders of Babel, during the lifetime of the second founder of the human race, and his three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth," which is surely in a high degree improbable. 3. "If Shem lived until the 110th year of Isaac, and the fiftieth of Jacob, why was not he included in the covenant of circumcision made with Abraham and his family?" Or, if this was not compatible with God's general scheme of revelation, "Why was Shem passed over without notice in the history of the most illustrious members of his own family, with whom he was contemporary?" 4. "How could the earth be so populous in Abraham's days, or the mighty kingdoms of Assyria and Egypt be so soon established after the deluge?"

To this last question, our author produces a reply from Sir Isaac Newton's chronology, which is certainly not one of the most valuable of that immortal author's works. To prove that the world was but thinly peopled in the days of Abraham, Sir Isaac observes that four great kings with their armies were pursued and beaten by Abraham, though the whole force that he and the princes in alliance with him brought into the field amounted only to 318 men. But, answers our author, we learn from the joint testimony of Scripture and Josephus, that Abraham and his three friends defeated the enemy by stratagem; for they overtook them on the fifth night, and attacked them on two different sides of their camp, when they were oppressed by sleep and wine. Newton proceeds to say, that at the birth of Moses, Egypt was so thinly peopled, that Pharaoh said the Israelites were more numerous and mighty than the Egyptians, and therefore ordered their male children to be drowned as soon as born; but this is not what Pharaoh is, in Scripture, represented as having said of the Israelites. We are there told, that he said, 'Come let us deal wisely with them, lest they multiply: and it come to pass, that when there falleth out war, they join themselves to our enemies, and fight against us, and get them up out of the land.' Here it is evident that Pharaoh did not then consider the Israelites as more or mightier than the Egyptians, or that he was even afraid of their ever becoming so without foreign aid; and the multitudes, with whom he pursued them when they afterwards actually got up out of the land under the command of the same Moses, furnish a complete proof that Egypt must have been, not only then, but for many generations, a populous and powerful kingdom.

The present Hebrew computation of time from the flood to the birth of Abraham is therefore undoubtedly erroneous; but the computation of the Septuagint is not to be followed implicitly. The insertion of Cainan between Arphaxad and Salah is unquestionably an interpolation; and it is not without other errors. The computation that comes nearest to the truth is that of Josephus as restored by Dr Hales; and on that account it has been inserted into the preceding table in addition to the Hebrew, Samaritan, and Septuagint computations published in all the former editions of this work.—Ep. Gleig.

parallel with the river, and others from east to west. ^a The compass of the wall, which was surrounded with a vast ditch filled with water, was 480 furlongs, that is, about sixty miles; the height of it, 350 feet, and the breadth so vastly great, that carts and carriages might meet on the top of it, and pass one another without danger. Over the Euphrates (which cut the city into two equal parts, from north to south) there was a stately bridge, and at each end of the bridge, ^b a magnificent palace, the one of four and the other of eight miles' circumference; and belonging to the larger palace, were those hanging gardens, which had so celebrated a name among the Greeks. They were made in form of a square of 400 feet on every side, and were carried up aloft into the air, in the manner of several large terraces, one above another, till they came up to the height of the walls of the city. They were sustained by vast arches built upon arches, one above another, and strengthened by a wall on every side, that was twenty-two feet thick; and as they wanted no plants or flowers fit for a garden of pleasure, so there are said to have grown in them trees, which were no less than eight cubits thick in the body, and fifty feet in height. But this among other pompous things appertaining to this city, was the work of ages, subsequent to Nimrod, and built by Nebuchadnezzar, to gratify his wife Amytis, who, being the daughter of Astyages, king of Media, and much pleased with the mountainous and woody parts of her own country, was desirous of having something like it in Babylon.

From the Assyrians, this great and noble city came into the hands of the Persians, and from them into the hands of the Macedonians. Here it was that Alexander the Great died; but not long after his death the city began to decline apace, by the building of Selucia, about forty miles above it, by Seleucus Nicanor, who is said to have erected this new city in spleen to the Babylonians, and to have drawn out of Babylon 500,000 persons to people it; so that the ancient city was, in the time of Curtius the historian, lessened a fourth part; in the time of Pliny, reduced to desolation; in the days of St Jerom, turned into a park, wherein the kings of Persia used to hunt; and, according to the relation ^c of some late travellers, is now reduced to one

^a It must be observed, however, that all this compass of ground was not really built upon, for the houses stood at a considerable distance, with gardens and fields interspersed; so that it was a large city in scheme, rather than in reality.—Prideaux's Connection, part 1. b. 2.

^b The old palace (which was probably built by Nimrod) stood on the east side of the river, and the new one (which was built by Nebuchadnezzar) exactly over against it, on the west side.—Ibid.

^c Mr Reuwolf, who, in 1574, passed through the place where this once famous city stood, speaks of the ruins of it in the following manner:—"The village of Elugo is now situate where heretofore Babylon of Chaldea stood. The harbour, where people go ashore in order to proceed by land to the city of Bagdad, is a quarter of a league distant from it. The soil is so dry and barren, that they cannot till it; and so naked, that I could never have believed that this powerful city, once the most stately and renowned in all the world, and situated in the fruitful country of Shinar, could have stood there, had I not seen, by the situation of the place, by many antiquities of great beauty, which are to be seen round about, and especially by the old bridge over the Euphrates, whereof some piles and arches, of incredible strength are still remaining, that it certainly did stand there. The whole front of the village Elugo is the hill upon which the castle stood, and the tower only, called the tower of Daniel, from whence may be seen all the ruins of this once vast and splendid city.

It can hardly be imagined that the first kings were able either to make or execute laws with that strictness and rigour which is necessary in a body of men so large as to afford numerous offenders: and for this reason it seems to have been a prudent institution in Nimrod, when his city of Babylon began to be too populous to be regulated by his inspection, or governed by his influence, to ^d lay the foundation of other cities; by which means he disposed of great numbers of his people, and, putting them under the direction of such deputies as he might appoint, brought their minds by degrees to a sense of government, until the beneficial use of it came to be experienced, and the force and power of laws settled and confirmed. He is supposed to have begun his reign A. M. 1757, to have reigned about 148 years, and to have died A. M. 1905. ^e

About the beginning of Nimrod's reign, Ashur, ^f one of the descendants of Shem, being driven from Babel, as most suppose, by the invasion of Nimrod, led his company on the Tigris, and so settling in Assyria, laid the first foundation of Nineveh, which in process of time exceeded even Babylon itself in size. For, whereas we observed of Babylon, that it was in circuit 488 ruins of its fortifications are still visible, though demolished. Behind, and some little way beyond, is the tower of Babylon, which is half a league diameter, but so ruinous, so low, and so full of venomous creatures, which lodge in the holes they make in the rubbish, that no one durst approach nearer to it than within half a league, except during two months in the winter, when these animals never stir out of their holes.—Calmet's Dictionary.

^d The cities which he founded are said to be Erce, Aecad, and Calne. Erce was the same that occurs in Ptolemy, under the name of Areeca, and which is placed by him at the last, or most southern turning of the common channel of the Tigris and Euphrates. Aecad lay northward of Erce, and very probably at the common joining of the Tigris and Euphrates. And Calne (which is said to be the same with Ctesiphon) upon the Tigris, about three miles distant from Selucia, and was for some time the capital city of the Parthians; for that it was the same with Ctesiphon, seems to be confirmed by the country which lies about it being called Chalontis, which is evidently derived from Chalne, or Chalne, whereby we find it called in different parts of Scripture.—Hells' Geography, vol. 1. c. 5.

^e According to Dr Hales, Nimrod began his reign A. M. 2857, reigned about 98 years, and died A. M. 2955.—Ed.

^f Many authors have imagined that Nineveh was not built by Ashur, but by Nimrod himself, because they think it not likely that Moses should give an account of the settlement of one of the sons of Shem, where he is expressly discoursing of Ham's family; and therefore they interpret (as the marginal note directs) Gen. x. 11, 'out of that land went forth Ashur;' he, that is, Nimrod, went forth into Assyria, which is the explanation that I have in some measure followed; but others imagine that Moses is not so exactly methodical, but that, upon mentioning Nimrod and his people, he might hint at a colony which departed from under his government, though it happened to be led by a person of another family; that the land of Ashur and the land of Nimrod are mentioned as two distinct countries in Micah v. 6, and that if Nimrod had built Nineveh, and planted Assyria, Babylon and Assyria would have been but one empire, nor could the one be said to have conquered the other with any propriety; whereas we are expressly told by Diodorus, that the Assyrians conquered the Babylonians; and may thence infer, that before Nimrus united them, Babylonia and Assyria were two distinct kingdoms, and not the plantation of one and the same founder.—Shuckford's Connection, vol. 1. b. 4.

furlongs,¹ the description which Diodorus gives us of Nineveh is, that it was 150 furlongs, that is, near nineteen miles in length; ninety furlongs, that is, somewhat above eleven miles in breadth; and 480 furlongs, that is, just sixty miles in circumference; and for this reason it is² called 'an exceeding great city of three days' journey,' according to the common estimation of twenty miles to a day's journey. And equal to the greatness was the strength of this city: for its walls were 100 feet high, and so very broad, that three carts might go abreast on the top of them; whereon were raised 1500 turrets, and each of them 200 feet high, and so very strong, that the place was deemed impregnable,³ till Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, having made an affinity with Astyages, king of Media, entered into a confederacy with him against the Assyrians, and hereupon joining their forces together, they besieged Nineveh, and after having taken the place, and slain the king thereof, to gratify the Medes, they utterly destroyed that ancient city, and from that time Babylon became the metropolis of the Assyrian empire.

Such was the rise and fall of this great city, where Ashur governed his subjects much in the same manner as Nimrod did his in Babylon; for as they increased he dispersed them in the country, and^a having built some other cities along the Tigris, he there settled them under the government of deputies or viceroys.

Whilst Nimrod and Ashur were settling their people in their respective countries, Mizraim, the second son of Ham,^b and who, by heathen writers, is constantly called

^a The cities which Ashur is said to have built were Rehoboth, Resen, and Calah. The word Rehoboth, in the Hebrew tongue, signifies streets; and the sacred historian seems to have added the word city, on purpose to show that it was here to be taken as a proper name. Now, as there are no footsteps of this name in these parts, but a town there is, by Ptolemy called Birtha, which in the Chaldee tongue denotes the same as does Rehoboth in the Hebrew, in an appellative or common acceptance; it is hence probably conjectured, that Rehoboth and Birtha are only two different names of one and the same city, which was seated on the Tigris, about the mouth of the river Lycus. Resen is supposed by most learned men to be the same city which Xenophon mentions under the name of Larissa, and that not only because the situation of this Larissa well enough agrees with the situation of Resen, as it is described by Moses, lying between Nineveh and Calah; but because Moses observes in the same text, that Resen was a great city; in like manner, as Xenophon tells us, that Larissa, though then ruined, had been a large city, of eight miles' circumference, with walls 100 feet high and twenty-five feet broad. And whereas Larissa is a Greek name, and in the days of Xenophon there were no Greek cities in Assyria; for this they account by supposing, that when the Greeks might ask, What city those were the ruins of? the Assyrians might answer Larezen, or of Resen, which Xenophon expressed by Larissa, a name not unlike several cities in Greece. And, lastly, as to Calah, or Calach, since we find in Strabo a country about the head of the river Lycus called Calachine, it is very probable that the said country took this name from Calah, which was one of the capital cities of it. Ptolemy makes mention likewise of a country called Calacine in these parts: and whereas Pliny mentions a people called Classite, through whose country the Lycus runs, there is some reason to suppose, that Classite is a corruption of Calachite. — Wells' Geography, vol. 1.

^b The person whom Moses calls Mizraim, is, by Diodorus and other heathen writers, commonly called Menes, by Syncellus, Mestraim. Menes is supposed to be the first king of Egypt by Herodotus, b. 2. by Diodorus b. 1. by Eratosthenes and Afri-

Menes, seated himself at first near the entrance of Egypt. and there perhaps built the city of Zoan, which was anciently the habitation of the kings of Egypt; but from Zoan he removed farther into the country, and took possession of those parts, which were afterwards called Thebais, where he built the city of Thebes, and, as Herodotus will have it, the city of Memphis likewise. He reigned sixty-two years, and died A. M. 1943. ^c

Belus succeeded Nimrod, and was the second king of Babylon; but whether he was related to his predecessor or not, is a thing uncertain. It seems most likely, that as Niurod, though a young man in comparison of many then alive, was advanced, for some merit or other, to the regal dignity; so when he died, Belus might appear to be the most proper person, and for that reason was appointed to succeed him: for he is represented a prince of study, the inventor of the Chaldee astronomy, and one who spent his time in cultivating his country and improving his people. He reigned sixty years, and died A. M. 1969. ^d

Ashur, king of Nineveh, dying much about this time, Ninus became the second king of Assyria, and proved a man of an ambitious and enterprising spirit. Babylonia lay too near him not to become the object of his desire; and, therefore, making all military preparations for that purpose, he invaded it, and as its inhabitants had no great skill in war, soon vanquished them, and laid them under tribute. His success in this attempt made him begin to think of subjecting other nations; and, as one conquest paved the way for another, in a few years he overran many of the infant states of Asia, and so, by uniting kingdom to kingdom, made a great accession to the Assyrian empire. His last attempt was upon Oxyartes, or Zoroastres, king of Bactria, where he met with a brisker opposition than he had hitherto experienced; but at length, by the contrivance and conduct of Semiramis, the wife of one Memmon, a captain in his army, he took the capital, and reduced the kingdom; but being hereupon charmed with the spirit and bravery of the woman, he fell in love with her, and prevailed with her husband (by giving him his own daughter in lieu of Semiramis in marriage) to consent to his having her for his wife. By her he had a son named Ninyas; and after a reign of fifty-two years he died A. M. 2017. ^e

Ninyas was but a minor when his father died; and therefore his mother, who all along had a great sway in the administration of public affairs during her husband's reign, was continued in the same power. See Wells' Geography, vol. 1. b. 4. canus from Manetho; by Eusebius and Syncellus in Chro. Euseb.; and the time of Menes coincides very well with those of Moses' Mizraim, as Sir John Marsham [in his Can. Chron. p. 2.] has pretty clearly evinced.—Shuckford's Connection, vol. 1. b. 4.

^c According to Hales's chronology, Mizraim settled in Egypt A. M. 2798; but whether Mizraim the son of Noah was the same person with Menes, called by the Greek writers the first king of Egypt, is uncertain. According to the same chronologist, Menes began his reign, B. C. 2412; that is, A. M. 2990.

^d Dr Hales, and Bishop Gleig following him, think that Belus and Nimrod were the same person; this, however, is doubtful. See Bell's Dissertation on the Origin of the Assyrian Empire, Rollin, vol. 1. pp. 117—122.—Ed.

^e The Ninus of whom all this is said, was not the son of either Ashur or Nimrod, but Ninus II. who succeeded to the Assyrian throne B. C. 1252, and A. M. according to Hales's chronology, 4159.

lifetime, continued in the government, with the "consent and approbation of her subjects. She removed her court from Nineveh to Babylon, which she encompassed with the wall we mentioned before, and adorned with many public and magnificent buildings; and, having thus finished the seat of her empire, and settled all the neighbouring kingdoms under her authority, she raised an army, with an intent to conquer India: but after a long and dangerous war, being tired out with defeats, she was obliged, with the small remainder of her forces, to return home, where, finding herself in disgrace with her people, she resigned the crown and authority to her son, after she had reigned forty-two years, and soon after died, A. M. 2059.^b

Her son Ninias began his reign full of a sense of the errors of his mother's administration, and engaged in none of the wars and dangerous expeditions wherein she had harassed and fatigued her people: but though he was not ambitious to enlarge his empire,¹ yet he took all due care to regulate and settle upon a good foundation the extensive dominions which his parents had left him. By a wise contrivance of annual deputies over his provinces, he prevented many revolts of distant countries, which might otherwise have happened, and his taking up that state of being difficult of access (which was afterwards much improved by eastern monarchs) might perhaps procure him a greater veneration from his subjects. However this be, it is certain that most authors have represented him as a weak and effeminate prince, which might naturally arise, without any other foundation, from his succeeding a father and mother, who were rather too active to enlarge their dominions; as well as from the disposition in most writers to think a turbulent and warlike reign, if victorious, a glorious one, and to overlook an administration that is employed in the silent but more happy arts of peace and good government.

In Egypt, Mizraim had three sons, who, after his death, became the kings of the several parts thereof. Ananim, or rather Anan, was king of the Lower Egypt, or Delta; Naphtulim, or Naph, of Middle Egypt, or the country about Memphis; and Pathrusim, or Patrus, of the Upper Egypt, or the country of Thebais; and agreeably hereunto, from these three kings did these several countries take their ancient denominations. Of the first of these, namely, Ananim, we have nothing remaining but

^a Justin, in his history of this woman, informs us, that upon the death of her husband, she made use of the stratagem of personating her son to obtain the empire to herself; but Diodorus, with more probability, ascribes her advancement to her conduct, bravery, and magnanimous behaviour. When she took upon her to be queen, the public affairs were put in the hands to which Ninus, when alive, used generally to commit them; and it is not likely that the people should be uneasy at her governing, who had for several years together, by a series of actions, gained herself a great credit and ascendancy over them; especially if we consider, that when she took up the sovereignty, she still pressed forward in a course of action which continually exceeded the expectations of her people, and left no room for any to be willing to dispute her authority.—Shuckford's Connection, vol. 1. b. 4.

^b There is no reason to believe that the Semiramis, who enlarged and beautified the city of Babylon, was the wife of Ninus II. Ctesias and Justin, from whom this story is taken, are authors of no credit. It is probable that the great Semiramis was either the mother or the wife of Nabonassar, who really walled Babylon, about B. C. 747, as we learn from Herodotus. Hales, vol. 4. p. 51, second edition.

only his name and the time of his death: for after he had reigned sixty-three years, according to Syncellus, he died A. M. 2006.

Of the second, namely, Naphtulim, we are told that he was the author of the architecture of those ages, had some useful knowledge of physic and anatomy, and taught his subjects (as he learned it from his brother Pathrusim) the use of letters; for to this Pathrusim (whom they call Thyoth) the Egyptians indeed ascribe the invention of all arts and sciences whatever. The Greeks called him Hermes, and the Latins, Mercurius; and while his father Mizraim lived, he is supposed to have been his secretary, and greatly assistant to him in all his undertakings. When his father died, he instructed his brothers in all the knowledge he was master of; and as for his own people, he made wholesome laws for their government; settled their religion and form of worship; and enriched their language by the addition of several words, to express several things which before they had no names for.^c

This is the best account that we can give of the Babylonian or Assyrian empires, and of the kings that ruled Egypt, for some ages next after the dispersion of mankind. Other nations, no doubt, were settled into regular governments in these times: Canaan was inhabited rather sooner than Egypt; and,² according to Moses, Hebron, in Canaan, was built seven years before Zoan in Egypt; but as none of those nations made any considerable figure in the first ages, their actions lie in obscurity, and must be buried in oblivion. The few men of extraordinary note that were then in the world lived in Egypt and Assyria; and for this reason we find little or no mention of any other countries until one of these two nations came to send out colonies, which by degrees polished the people they travelled to, and instructed them in such arts and sciences as made them appear with credit in their own age, and (as soon as the use of letters was made public) transmitted their names with honour to posterity.

The knowledge of letters cannot have been of any long standing among us Europeans, who are settled far from the first seats of mankind, and far from the places which the descendants of Noah first planted. "None of the ancient Thracians,"³ says Elian, "knew any thing of letters; nay, the Europeans in general thought it disreputable to learn them, though in Asia they were held in greater request." The Goths, according to the express testimony⁴ of Socrates, had their letters and writings

^c It is well observed by Dr Hales, that the Egyptian chronology, at this early period, is a labyrinth, in which the most eminent scholars and antiquaries have lost their way and misled their readers. Unquestionably the best account of it that has fallen in my way, is that which he has furnished himself; but to give, in a note on this work, any abridgment of the discussions by which he endeavours to render it consistent with the chronology of Scripture, or indeed with itself, is impossible. Suffice it to say here, that if Pathrusim be the same with Thoeth or Thyoth, he was the son and minister, not of Mizraim the son of Ham, but of Menes, whom our laborious chronologer has proved to have begun his reign, B. C. 2412, and A. M. 2999; that is, at a period earlier, by 990 years, than that at which our author fixes the death of Pathrusim's elder brother. See Hales' Analysis, second edition, vol. 4. pp. 400 et seq. as quoted by Bishop Gleig.

from Ulphilas their bishop, A. D. 370. The Sclavonians received theirs from Methodius, a philosopher, about A. D. 856. The people of Dalmatia had theirs not till St Jerom's, and those of Illyria, not till St Cyril's days, towards the end of the fourth century.

The Latins, who were more early, received their letters (as most authors agree) from the Greeks, and were taught the use of them, either from some of the followers of Pelasgus, who came into Italy about one hundred and fifty years after that Cadmus came into Greece, or from the Arcadians, whom Evander led into those parts about sixty years after Pelasgus.

Among the Greeks, the Ionians were the first who had any knowledge of letters; and they, in all probability, had them from the Phœnicians, who were the followers of Cadmus when he came into Greece; but from whom the Phœnicians had them, has been matter of some dispute. Many considerable writers have derived them directly from Egypt, and are generally agreed, that Thyoth, or Mercury, was the inventor of them. In the early ages, when mankind were but few, and these few employed in the several contrivances for life, it could be but here and there one that had leisure, or perhaps inclination, to study letters: the companies that removed from Babel were most of them rude and uncultivated people; they followed some persons of figure and eminence, who had gained an ascendant over them; and these persons, when they had settled them in distant places, and came to teach them such arts as they were masters of, had every thing they taught them imputed to their own invention, because the poor ignorant people knew no other person that was versed and skilled in them.

Though, therefore, the Egyptians had confessedly the use of letters very early among them, and though their Thyoth or Mercury might be the first who taught others their use, and for that reason be reputed the inventor of them; yet I cannot but think, that Noah and his sons, who had learned them in the old world, taught them to their posterity in the new. For, since mankind subsisted 1600 [probably 2256] years before the flood, it is not very probable that they lived all this while without the use of letters. If they did, how came we by the short annals which we have of the antediluvian ages? But if they did not, it is not unlikely that Noah, being well skilled in the knowledge and use of them, might teach them to his children; and if we pursue the inquiry, and ask from whence Noah attained his knowledge, the most proper reply will be, that he had it from the instruction of his parents, as his parents might have it in their several successions from Adam, and as Adam might have it from God.

And indeed if we consider the nature of letters, it cannot but appear something strange, that an invention so surprising as that of writing is, should be found out in an age, so near the beginning of the world. ¹ Nature may easily be supposed to have prompted men to speak, to try to express their minds to one another by sounds and noises; but that the wit of man should, among its first attempts, find out a way to express words in figures or letters, and to form a method by which they might expose to view all that can be said or thought, and that within the compass of 16, 20, or 24 characters, variously placed, so as to form syllables and words; that the wit of man, I say, could immediately and directly fall upon a project of this nature, is what exceeds the most exalted notions we can possibly form of his capacity, and must therefore remit us to God (in whom are hid all the treasures of infinite wisdom) for the first invention and contrivance of it.

As soon as the use of letters, whether of divine or human invention, came generally to be known, it is reasonable to think, that all arts and sciences would from thence receive a powerful assistance, and in process of time begin to take root and flourish. But this was a period a little too early to bring them to any great perfection. ² For though Noah and his sons had doubtless some knowledge of the inventions of the antediluvians, and probably acquainted their descendants with such of them as were most obvious and useful in common life; yet it cannot be imagined that any of the more curious arts, or speculative sciences, were improved to any degree (supposing them to be known and invented) till some considerable time after the dispersion. On the contrary, one consequence of that event seems to have been this— that several inventions known to their ancestors were lost, and mankind gradually degenerated into ignorance and barbarity, till ease and plenty had given them leisure to polish their manners, and to apply themselves to such parts of knowledge as are seldom brought to perfection under other circumstances.

The inhabitants of Babylon indeed are supposed to have had a great knowledge in astronomical matters, much about this time; ³ for when Alexander the Great took possession of that city, Callisthenes the philosopher, who accompanied him, upon searching into the treasures of the Babylonian learning, found that the Chaldeans had a series of observations for 1903 years backwards from that time; that is, from the 1771st year of the world's creation forwards. But this is a notion that we have already confuted; as indeed the nature of the thing will teach us, that upon the first settlement in any country, a nation could not but find employment enough (at least for some ages) in cultivating their lands, and providing themselves houses and other necessaries for their mutual comfort and subsistence.

Ninus and Semiramis are supposed to have improved vastly the arts of war and navigation about this period; for, ^a we read of armies consisting of some millions of

^a The history of the Assyrian empire, as we have it in Diodorus Siculus, b. 2, c. 1—22, and in Justin, b. 1, c. 1, 2, is, in the substance of it, to this effect:—The first who extended this empire was Ninus, who being a warlike prince, and desiring to do great things, gathered together the stoutest men in the country, and having trained them up to the use of arms, entered into an alliance with Ariæus, king of Arabia, by whose assistance he subdued the Babylonians, and imposed a tribute on them, after he had taken their king captive, and killed him with his children. Then having entered Armenia with a great army, and destroyed several cities, he so terrified the rest, that king Barzanes submitted to him. After this he vanquished Pharnus king of Media in battle, crucified him and his wife, and seven children; and in the space of seventeen years overcame all Asia, except India and Pætria; but no author declares the particulars of his victories. Of the maritime provinces, he subdued, according to Ctesias, whom we follow, (says Diodorus,) Egypt, Phœnicia, the horse and foot; and of fleets and galleys with brazen beaks, to transport the forces over a river only, to the number of two thousand. But all that narration of Diodorus and Justin, as it is acknowledged to be taken from Ctesias (whom "all the best critics of antiquity look upon as an author deserving no credit) may very justly be accounted false and fabulous. And though it cannot be denied that the invention of shipping, which was not before the flood (for had it been before, more than Noah and his family might have saved themselves from the waters) is a great step towards the improvement of commerce; yet, as the dispersion of mankind made it more difficult to trade with nations who spoke a different language, so the method whereunto we may suppose they entered at Lower Syria, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia: and besides these, Caria, the Phrygias, Lydia, Mysia, Troas, together with the Propontis, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and all the barbarous nations, as far as the Tanais; with Persia, Susiana, Caspiana, and many other nations that we need not here enumerate. From this last expedition, as soon as he returned, he built a city which he called by his own name, Ninus, not far from the river Euphrates; and being afterwards enamoured with the beauty and valour of a woman of uncertain birth, named Semiramis, the wife of Menon, the prefect of Syria, he took her to wife, and by her advice and direction governed all things with success. For having gathered together an army of seventeen hundred thousand foot, and two hundred and ten thousand horse, and six hundred thousand armed chariots, (numbers incredible in those days,) with these he advanced against Oxyartes, king of Bactria, who met him with an army of four hundred thousand men; but the Bactrians being defeated, and their capital, by the valour and direction of Semiramis, taken, she was thereupon advanced by Ninus to the honour of being made queen, which occasioned her husband Menon, to hang himself. After Ninus had thus settled his affairs in Bactria, his wife Semiramis had a son whom he named Ninyas, and not long after died, leaving the administration of the kingdom in his wife's hands; who, to raise her own glory, built a stately monument for her deceased husband, built the city of Babylon, and other remarkable places; and then, having brought Egypt, Ethiopia, and Lydia, all the way to the temple of Jupiter Hammon, under her jurisdiction, returned into Asia; where she had not been long before, hearing that Staprobates or Staurobates, king of India, governed a rich country, she resolved to take it from him. To this purpose she prepared a great army and fleet; but being told what mighty elephants there were in India, in order to have something like them, she caused three hundred thousand hides of oxen to be dressed and stuffed with straw, under which there was a camel to bear the machine, and a man to guide it, which at a distance made a kind of resemblance of these vast creatures. Her army consisted of three millions of foot, one million of horse, and an hundred thousand chariots; of an hundred thousand of those that fought on camels; of two hundred thousand camels for the baggage, and two thousand galleys with brazen heads, to transport her army over the river Indus. But all this must be false and fabulous; because it is incredible to think, either that her own country should supply, or that the country whereinto she was marching, should be able to sustain such an immense number of men and other creatures as are here related. Besides that it is false in fact, that the kings of Assyria ever governed all Asia, or stretched their conquests over Egypt and Libya.—Miller's History of the Church, c. 1, part 3.

a This Ctesias was a native of Cnidus, and physician to Artaxerxes Mnemon. He wrote a Persian history in three and twenty books, of which there remain only a few fragments preserved by Photius. But very valuable authors, who have seen Ctesias when prefect, give him no commendable character. Plutarch (in Artaxerxes) calls him a fabulous vain man, and a great liar. A. Gellius (Noctes Attice, b. 9. c. 4.) reckons him among the fabulous writers; and Aristotle (in his Historia Animalium) says, that he was an author who deserves no credit; as indeed if we will judge either by the incredible things in his story, or by what he says of the Indian or Persian affairs, in his fragments that remain, we shall have reason to conclude that these great men have not given him this character without good grounds.—Miller's History, ibid.

first, extended no farther than this:—That the colonies who planted new countries, not only perceiving their own wants, from the conveniences they had left behind them, but finding likewise something useful in their settlements which were before unknown to them or their founders, fetched what they wanted from the parts where they formerly dwelt, and in exchange for that carried what they had discovered in their new plantations thither, and this seems to have given the first rise to traffic and foreign trade, whose gradual advances we may have occasion to take notice of hereafter. In the mean time, we shall conclude this book and this chapter together, with an account of the religion which at this time obtained in the most famous nations of the world, and observe withal by what means it came to degenerate into idolatry, and other wicked and superstitious practices.

Now, besides the common notion of a God, which men might either learn from tradition, or collect by their own reflection; the very history of the deluge, which had not so long ago befallen the world, could not but instruct and confirm the generations we are now treating of, in several articles of their religion. If they had the account of this remarkable judgment transmitted to them in all its circumstances, they could not but entertain these conceptions of God. That he takes cognizance of the things which are done here on earth; that he is a lover of virtue, and a severe punisher of vice; that he is infinite in power, by commanding the winds and rains, seas and elements, to execute his will; that he is likewise infinite in mercy, in forewarning the wicked of their ruin (as he did the old world) several years before its execution; and that therefore a being of such a nature and disposition was to be served, and worshipped, and feared, and obeyed. So that the sum of religion, in the ages subsequent to the flood, even to the promulgation of the law, must have consisted in the belief of a God, and his sacred attributes; in the devout worship of him, by the oblation of prayers and praises, and such sacrifices as he himself had instituted; and in the observance of those eternal rules of righteousness, of justice and mercy, of sobriety and temperance, &c., which, if not expressly delivered to the sons of Noah, were nevertheless deducible from the nature of things, and the relations wherein mankind stood toward one another.

And now, if we look into the principal nations which were at this time existing, we shall find, that¹ the Persians, above all other people, were remarkable for having amongst them a true account of the creation of the world, and its destruction by water: which they strictly adhered to, and made the foundation of their religion: nor have we any reason to think but that they were for some time, very zealous professors of it, though by degrees, they came to corrupt it, by introducing novelties and fancies of their own into both their faith and practice: we shall find² that many of the ancient Arabians preserved the true worship of God for several ages, whereof Job, who perhaps lived in the days now under consideration, was a memorable instance; as was likewise Jethro, the priest of Midian, in the days of Moses: we shall find, that the Canaanites of old were of the same religion with Abraham; for though he travelled up and down many years in their country, yet was he respected by the inhabitants of it as a person in great favour with God; and Melchisedek, the king of Salem, who was the 'priest of the most high God,' and consequently of the same religion, received him with this address, 'Blessed be Abraham, servant of the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth: we shall find from Abimelech's prayer, upon his receiving intimation that Sarah was Abraham's wife, that among the Philistines there were some true worshippers of the God of heaven, 'Lord, wilt thou slay a righteous nation? said he unto me, she is my sister; and she, even she herself, said, he is my brother: in the integrity of my heart and innocency of my hands have I done this: we shall find, that the Egyptians allowed no mortal creature to be a god; professed to worship nothing but their god Oneph, whom they affirmed to be without beginning and without end; and though in the mythologic times, they represented this deity by the figure of a serpent with the head of an hawk, in the middle of a circle, yet they affirmed at the same time, that the god whom they thus represented was the creator of all things,—a being incorruptible and eternal, with several other attributes becoming the Divine nature. In short, we shall find that all the nations then known in the world, not only worshipped the same God, whom they called the Maker and Creator of the universe, but worshipped him likewise in the same form and manner; that they had all the like sacrifices, either expiatory, to make atonement for their sins; precatory, to obtain favours from Almighty God; propitiatory, to avert his judgments; or eucharistical, to return thanks for his extraordinary mercies; and that all these sacrifices were every where offered upon altars, with some previous purifications, and other ceremonies to be observed by the offerer: so that religion in every nation, for some time after the flood, both in principle and practice, was the same, till some busy and pragmatistical heads being minded to make some improvements (as they thought), added their own speculations to it, and so both destroyed its uniformity, and introduced its corruption.

When this corruption of religion was first introduced, is not so easy a matter to determine, because neither sacred nor profane history have taken any notice of it. Those, who account idolatry one of the sins of the antediluvian world, suppose that Ham being married into the wicked race of Lamech, retained a strong inclination for such a false worship; and that, after he was cursed by his father Noah, and separated from the posterity of Shem, he soon set it up. Those who imagine that the tower of Babel was a monument intended for the honour of the sun, which had dried up the waters from off the face of the earth, must suppose that the worship of that planet began when the remembrance of the deluge was fresh in men's minds; but those who are of opinion that the difference of men's dialects, and the difference of their sentiments concerning God might not improperly commence together, must date the first institution of idolatry not a great deal lower than the time of the dispersion.

The generality of Christian fathers, as well as oriental writers, are positive in their assertions, that the first appearance of idolatry was in the days of Serug: "Because as Enoch," say they, "was the seventh from Adam, in whose time the general impiety before the flood is said to have begun; so Serug, being in like manner the seventh from Noah, lived at a proper distance for such a corruption of religious worship to be introduced and grow." but this is a reason too trifling to be taken notice of. "Nor can I see," says our learned Selden, "how they can be able to maintain their opinions, who determine so peremptorily concerning a matter of so distant and uncertain a nature."

But whatever the date of idolatry might be, it is certain that it had its first birth, not in Egypt, as some have maintained, but in Chaldea, as the most reverend author of the Treatise of Idolatry has evinced; and that because in the days of Abraham we find all other nations and countries adhering to the true account of the creation and deluge, and worshipping the God of heaven according to what had been revealed to them; whereas the Chaldeans had so far departed from his worship, and were so zealous in their errors and corruptions, that upon Abraham's family refusing to join with them, they expelled them their country, and cast them out from the face of their gods."

The Chaldeans indeed, by reason of the plain and even situation of their country, which gave them a larger prospect of the heavenly bodies than those who inhabited mountainous places, had a great conveniency for astronomical observations, and accordingly were the first people who took any great pains to improve them. And as they were the first astrologers, so learned men have observed, that lying on the ground, or else on flat roofs all night, to make their observations, they fell in love with the lights of heaven, which in the clear firmament of those countries, appeared so often and with so much lustre; and perceiving the constant and regular order of their motions and revolutions, they thence began to imagine that they were animated with some superior souls, and therefore deserved their adoration; and as the sun excelled all the rest, so the generality of learned men have with good reason imagined, that this bright luminary was the first idol in the world.

Among the Egyptians, Syphis king of Memphis was the first who began to speculate upon such subjects. He examined what influence the sun and moon had upon the terrestrial globe; how they nourished and gave life and vigour to all things; and thereupon, forgetting what his ancestors had taught him, namely, that in the beginning God created the heavens, as well as the earth, the sun and moon, as well as the creatures of this lower world, he concluded that they were two great and mighty deities, and accordingly commanded them to be worshipped.

The Persians perhaps were never so far corrupted as to lose entirely the knowledge of the Supreme God.

They saw those celestial bodies running their courses, as they thought, day and night, over all the world, and reviving and invigorating all the parts and products of the earth ; and though they kept themselves so far right, as not to mistake them for the true God, yet they imagined them to be his most glorious ministers ; and not taking care to keep strictly to what their forefathers had taught them, they were led away by their own imaginations, to appoint an idolatrous worship for beings that had been created, and by nature were not gods.

What kind of idolatry was current among the Canaanites, Moses sufficiently intimates in the caution he gives the Israelites, just going to take possession of it, namely, that ¹ ‘ when they lifted up their eyes to heaven, and saw the sun and moon, and stars, even all the hosts of heaven, they should not, as the inhabitants of the country were, be driven to worship and to serve them. And that this was the customary worship among the Arabians, the justification which Job makes of himself is a sufficient proof ; ² ‘ If I beheld the sun, when it shined, or the moon, walking in brightness, and mine heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand, ’ that is, if with devotion of soul, or profession of outward respect, I have worshipped those heavenly bodies, which by their height, motion, and lustre, attract the eye and ravish the senses, ‘ this also were an iniquity to be punished by the judge ; for then I should have denied the God that is above. ’ And therefore the account ³ which the Greek historian gives us of the origin of this kind of idolatry is more than probable, namely, that the most ancient inhabitants of the earth, (meaning those who lived not long after the flood, and particularly the Egyptians,) ‘ contemplating on the world above them, and being astonished with high admiration at the nature of the universe, believed that they were eternal gods, and that the two principal of them were the sun and the moon, the former of which they called Osiris, and the latter Isis : ’ since, of later years, upon the discovery of America, though many different idols were found in different places, yet as for the sun, it was the universal deity both in Mexico and Peru.

But whatever the first idol might be, it soon multiplied into such a prodigious number as to fill both heaven and earth with its progeny ; insomuch, that there are not three parts of the creation but what in one nation or other had their worshippers. ⁴ They worshipped universal nature, the soul of the world, angels, devils, and the souls of men departed, either separate and alone, or in union with some star or other body. They worshipped the heavens, and in them both luminaries and constellations ; the atmosphere, and in it the meteors and fowls of the air ; the earth, and in it beasts, birds, insects, plants, groves, and hills, together with divers fossils and terrestrial fire. They worshipped the water, and in it the sea and rivers, and in them fishes, serpents, and insects, together with such creatures as live in either element. They worshipped men both living and dead ; and in them the faculties and endowments of the soul, as well as the several accidents and conditions of life. Nay, they worshipped the images of men ; the images of animals, even the most hateful, such as serpents, dragons, crocodiles, &c., and descended at last so low, as to pay a religious regard to things inanimate, herbs and plants, and the most stinking vegetables.

How men came to part with the religion of their ancestors for such trash, and ⁵ ‘ to change the glory of the incorruptible God into the image of corruptible man, and birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things, ’ the apostle who remonstrates against the indignity, has in some measure supplied us with a reason, when he tells that this state of things, so gross and strange soever it was, was introduced under the pretences of wisdom, or by men professing to be wise.

It was the wise amongst them that formed the design ; and, addressing the multitude with a grave appearance, prevailed (as we may conceive) by some such form of arguing as this, ⁶ ‘ We are all aware, ye sons of Noah, that religion is our chief concern, and therefore it well becomes us to improve and advance it as much as possible. We have indeed received appointments from God for the worship which he requires ; but if these appointments may be altered for his greater glory, there is no doubt but that it will be a commendable piety so to alter them. Now our father Noah has instructed us in a religion which in truth is too simple, and too unaffecting. It directs us to the worship of God abstractly from all sense, and under a confused notion, under the formality of attributes, as power, goodness, justice, wisdom, eternity, and the like ; an idea foreign to our affections, as well as our comprehensions ; whereas in all reason we ought to worship God more pompously and more extensively, and not only to adore his personal and essential attributes, but likewise all the emanations of them, and all those creatures by which they are eminently represented. Nor can this be any derogation from his honour ; since his honour is certainly more amply expressed when in this manner we acknowledge that not only himself, but all his creatures likewise are adorable. We ought therefore (if we will be wise) to worship the host of heaven, because they are eminent representations of his glory and eternity. We ought to worship the elements, because they represent his benignity and omnipresence. We ought to worship princes, because they sustain a divine character, and are the representatives of his power upon earth. We ought to worship men famous in their generation, even when they are dead, because their virtues are the distinguishing gifts and communications of God ; nay, we ought to worship the ox and the sheep, and whatever creatures are most beneficial, because they are the symbols of his love and goodness ; and with no less reason, the serpent, the crocodile, and other animals that are noxious, because they are symbols of his awful anger.

This seems to be a fair opening of the project, and by some such cunning harangue as this we may suppose it was that the first contrivers of idolatry drew in the ignorant and admiring multitude. And indeed, considering the natural habitude of vulgar minds, and the strong inclinations they have in matters of an abstruse consideration, to help themselves by sensible objects, it seems not so difficult a task to have drawn them in.

Those who worshipped universal nature, or the system of the material world, perceived first, that there was excellency in the several parts of it, and then (to make up the grandeur and perfection of the idea) they joined them altogether in one Divine Being. Those who laboured under a weakness and narrowness of imagination, distributed nature into its several parts, and worshipped that portion of it which was accounted of most general use and benefit. Usefulness was the common motive, but it was not the only motive which inclined the world to idolatry: for upon farther inquiry, we shall find, that whatever ravished with its transcendent beauty, whatever affrightened with its malignant power, whatever astonished with its uncommon greatness, whatever, in short, was beautiful, hurtful, or majestic, became a deity, as well as what was profitable for its use. ¹ The sun, men soon perceived, had all these powers and properties united in it: its beauty was glorious to behold, its motion wonderful to consider, its heat occasioned different effects, barrenness in some places, and fruitfulness in others; and the immense globe of its light appeared highly exalted, and riding in triumph, as it were, round the world. The moon, they saw, supplied the absence of the sun by night; gave a friendly light to the earth, and, besides the great variety of its phases, had a wonderful influence over the sea and other humid bodies. The stars they admired for their height and magnitude, the order of their positions, and celerity of their motions, and thence were persuaded either that some celestial vigour or other resided in them, or that the souls of their heroes and great men, were translated into them when they died; and upon these, and such like presumptions, they accounted all celestial bodies to be deities. ² The force of fire, the serenity of air, the usefulness of water, as well as the terror and dreadfulness of thunder and lightning, gave rise to the consecration of the meteors and elements. The sea, swelling with its proud surface, and roaring with its mighty billows, was such an awful sight, and the earth bedecked with all its plants, flowers, and fruits, such a lovely one, as might well affect a pagan's veneration; when for the like motives, namely, their beneficial, hurtful, delightful, or astonishing properties, beasts, birds, fishes, insects, and even vegetables themselves, came to be adored.^a

The pride and pomp of the great, and the low and abject spirits of the mean, occasioned first the flattery, and then the worship of kings and princes as gods upon earth. Men famous for their adventures and exploits, the founders of nations or cities, or the inventors of useful arts and sciences, were revered while they lived, and after death canonized. The prevailing notion of the soul's immortality, made them imagine that the spirits of such excellent persons either immediately ascended up into heaven, and settled there in some orb or other, or that they hovered in the air, whence, by solemn invocations, and by making some statue or image resemblant of them, they might be prevailed with to come down and inhabit it.

Whether the idolatry of image worship was first begun in Chaldea or in Egypt, we have no grounds from history to determine: but wherever it had its origin, the design of making statues and images at first was certainly such as ³ the author of the book of Wisdom has represented it, namely, to commemorate an absent or deceased friend, or to do honour to some great man or sovereign prince; which (whether so intended or no at first) the ignorance and superstition of the people turned, in time, into an object of religious adoration; "the singular diligence of the artificer," as our author expresses it, "helping to set forward the ignorant to more superstition: For he, peradventure, willing to please one in authority, forced all his skill to make the resemblance of the best fashion; and so the multitude, allured by the grace of the work, took him now for a god, who, a little before, was but honoured as a man."

We cannot but observe, however, with what elegance and fine satire it is that the Scripture sets off the stupidity and gross infatuation both of the artificer and adorer. 'The carpenter heweth down cedars, and taketh the cypress, and the oak. He stretcheth out his rule, he marketh it out with a line, he fitteth it with planes, he marketh it out with the compass, and maketh it after the figure of a man, according to the beauty of a man.—He burneth part thereof in the fire; with part thereof he eateth flesh; he roasteth roast, and is satisfied; yea, he warmeth himself, and saith, Ah! I am warm, I have seen the fire; and the residue thereof he maketh a god, even his graven image. He falleth down unto it, and worshippeth it, and prayeth unto it, and saith, Deliver me, for thou art my god; never considering in his heart, nor having knowledge or understanding to say, I have burnt part of it in the fire; yea, also I have baked bread upon the coals thereof: I have roasted flesh, and eaten it; and shall I make the residue thereof an abomination? Shall I fall down to the stock of a tree? He feedeth on ashes: a deceived heart hath turned him aside, that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand?'

That rational creatures should be capable of so wretched a degeneracy as this amounts to, may justly provoke our wonder and amazement: and yet we may remember, that these people (who may possibly be the object of our scorn and contempt) had the boasted light of nature to be their guide in matters of religion: nay, they had some advantages that we apparently want: they lived much nearer the beginning of the world; had the terrors of the Lord in the late judgment of the deluge, fresh in their minds; had the articles of their religion comprised in a small compass; and (what is no bad friend to reason and sober recollection) lived in more simplicity, and less luxury than these later ages can pretend to; and yet, notwithstanding these advantages, so sadly, so shamefully did they miscarry, that the wit of man would be at a loss to devise a reason for their conduct, had not the divine wisdom informed us, that ¹ 'they alienated themselves from the life of God, and lightly regarded the counsels of the Most High; that they forsook the guide of their youth, and rejected those revelations, which at sundry times, and in divers manners,' were made to their forefathers, for the rule and measure of their faith and practice. We indeed, had we lived in those days, may be apt to think that we would not have been carried away with the common corruption; that the light of nature would have taught us better than to pay our devotions to brute beasts, or to look upon their images as our gods. But alas! we little consider, what the power of reason, of mere unassisted reason, is against the force of education and the prevalence of custom, engaged on the side of a false but flashy and popular religion. Aristotle, Plato, and Cicero, were, in after ages, some of the greatest reasoners that the world has produced, and yet we find them complying with the established worship of their country: what grounds have we then to imagine, that, in case we had been contemporaries with them, we had acquitted ourselves any better? Our reason indeed now tells us that we should have died rather than submitted to these impious modes of worship: but then we are to remember, that reason is now assisted by the light and authority of a Divine revelation; that therefore we are not competent judges how we would act without this superior aid; but that, in all probability, ² taking away the direction and restraint of this, reason would relapse into the same extravagancies, the same impiety, the same folly and superstition which prevailed on it before. And therefore (to conclude in the words of our blessed Saviour, spoken indeed upon another, but very applicable upon this occasion), ³ 'Blessed are the eyes which see the things which ye see,' a full and perfect rule of faith and manners contained in that Holy Bible, which is in every one's hands; 'for I tell you that many prophets and kings have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them.'

^a The extent of idol worship, and the similarity of the system of idolatry in all the countries in which it has been practised, are truly amazing. From these circumstances, some learned writers have been led to trace it up to the plains of Shinar, and to maintain that it issued from thence, and accompanied the progress of the human race over the globe. Whatever truth there may be in this opinion, the history of mankind amply proves, that man, without the light of revelation, is prone to idolatry, and to give to the creature, or to the dedications of his own mind, the worship which is due to God. This proneness had widely shown itself so early as the time of Abraham, when it was necessary to separate that patriarch and his posterity, to preserve the knowledge of the living and true God.—See on the Nature and History of Idolatry, Dewar's Moral Philosophy, vol. 2. ch. vi.

BOOK III.

CONTAINING AN ACCOUNT OF THINGS FROM THE CALLING OF ABRAHAM TO THE ISRAELITES' DEPARTURE OUT OF EGYPT, IN ALL 430 YEARS.—ACCORDING TO DR HALES 1015 YEARS.

PRELIMINARY OBSERVATIONS.

ABRAHAM was born only two^a years after the death of Noah, from whom he descended in the line of Seth. Of Abraham the sacred historian gives us little information till he was seventy-five years old, when the Lord called him to leave his father's house and his native country. Promises were added, for his encouragement, respecting his posterity, that from him should arise a numerous and powerful people; and respecting himself, that God would so highly honour him, as not only to make his name great, but also to render his life a general blessing to mankind.

In wisdom and in mercy God called Abraham, the person in whose family he intended to uphold the true religion, out of his own country, which was the land of Chaldea, and from his kindred, to a far distant land, that his posterity might there remain, a people separate from the rest of mankind, that so the true religion might be maintained and preserved. A foundation was thus laid, and means were thus provided, for upholding the church of Christ in the world till he should come. For the world having become idolatrous, it was necessary that the people of God should be thus separated, that they might receive and preserve the types and prophecies that were to be given concerning Christ; that they might be the depositaries of the Oracles of God; and that, at the appointed time, the light of the gospel might shine forth from them to the rest of the world. As Abraham was the person in whom this foundation, as it were, was laid, he is represented in Scripture as though he were the father of all the church, the father of all them that believed,—the stem whence the visible church thenceforward through Christ rose, as a tree distinct from all other plants,—and from which, after ^a That is reckoning according to the common or Hebrew computation; but, according to Josephus and Dr Hales, Noah died B. C. 2805, and Abraham was born B. C. 2153; consequently, a period of 652 years intervened between the death of the former and birth of the latter.—ED.

Christ came, the natural branches were broken off, and the Gentiles were grafted in their stead.

At this era there was given a more full and clear discovery of the plan of redemption than had previously been enjoyed by the church. There had been given, on two particular occasions, disclosures of the covenant of grace,—one to our first parents immediately after the fall—the other to Noah and his family soon after the flood. There is now a third, and a more particular revelation given of the provisions of that covenant, which, in due time, was to be sealed and ratified by the blood of Christ. It was now revealed, not only that Christ should come into the world, but that he should be of the seed of Abraham, and that in him all the families of the earth should be blessed.^b In the institution of circumcision, there was appointed a seal of the covenant of grace,—‘a seal of the righteousness of faith.’ This sacrament distinguished Abraham's seed from the world, and kept up a distinction and separation in future ages. It was in consequence of the clearer vision which was vouchsafed to this patriarch, that he rejoiced to see the day of Christ, and was glad.

Nor should we omit to notice, in our survey of the period on which we are now entering, the preservation of the patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, during their sojournings in the land of Canaan. For the inhabitants of that country were exceedingly wicked; so much so, that Abraham, when he was old, could not be content till he had made his servant swear that he would not take a wife for his son of the daughters of the land. When we consider that the lives of those holy men formed a continual reproof of the wickedness of the Canaanites, and that they were strangers and sojourners among them, we cannot but admire the remarkable dispensation of providence in their preservation.

In the course of this period, we have presented to our view an extraordinary and visible manifestation of God's displeasure against sin, in the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities of the plain.

The destruction of the world by the flood served to exhibit the terrors of the law, and manifest the wrath of God; and thus to make men sensible of the absolute necessity of redeeming mercy. But this was now, in a great measure, forgotten; and God was pleased again, in a most striking manner, to show his abhorrence of sin, and his determination to punish it; which tended to convince men of the necessity of redemption, and so to prepare the way for the accomplishment of that great work.

Bearing in mind that the sacred history is the history of the gradual and progressive unfolding of the plan of redemption, we shall not fail to mark, in our survey of this period, the renewal of the covenant of grace to Isaac and to Jacob. God said to Isaac,¹ 'And I will perform the oath which I swore unto Abraham thy father; and I will make thy seed to multiply as the stars of heaven, and will give unto thy seed all these countries; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed.' This covenant was repeatedly confirmed to Jacob, more especially at Bethel, in his vision of the ladder that reached to heaven, which was a symbol of the way of salvation by Christ:—'Thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth; and thou shalt spread abroad to the west, and to the east, and to the north, and to the south; and in thee, and in thy seed, shall all the families of the earth be blessed.'²

Besides these particulars, the reader will observe included in the section of the sacred history on which we are now entering, the preservation of the family from which Christ was to descend, by the instrumentality of Joseph, who was a type of the Great Deliverer; the remarkable prophecy respecting the coming of the Messiah, and the gathering of the people to him,³ and the upholding of the children of Israel, the visible church of God, in Egypt, notwithstanding the grinding oppression and deep affliction which they suffered.

THE HISTORY.

AFTER the death of his father Terah, Abram, who, by God's appointment, had not long before left Ur in Chaldea, was now ordered to leave Haran, and go into a country^a whereunto God would conduct him, and who, at the same time, gave him assurance, that he would bless, protect, and multiply his posterity in an extraordinary manner, and that ^b 'in his seed all the families of the earth should be blessed.'

Abram was fully persuaded of the truth of all God's promises; and therefore, without any hesitation, taking his wife and family, and all his effects, together with his nephew Lot, and his substance with him, he pursued his journey, 'not knowing whither he should go,' until, by the divine guidance,^c he came into the land of Canaan; and being minded to make some survey of the country, proceeded^d to the famous Oak of Moreh, not far from

^b Some interpreters have imagined, that these words require no higher sense than this,—that all nations should see the prosperity of Abraham and his seed so evidently, that they should bless themselves; and others, in some such form as this:—'God make thee as great as Abraham and his seed.' But, besides the incongruity of supposing that God's everlasting covenant, as he calls it, Gen. xvii. 19, was given only to produce a proverbial form of speech, it is plain matter of fact, that the posterity of Abraham, in the line of Isaac, was far from being the most prosperous, as to temporal affairs, of all the other branches of his family; and therefore this promise must of necessity be supposed to relate to some more spiritual and distant blessing, just as St Paul, in his epistle to the Galatians, has explained it: 'Now to Abraham and to his seed were the promises made; he saith not, and to seeds, as of many, but as of one, and to thy seed, which is Christ.' Gal. iii. 16.—See Bishop Sherlock's Use and Intent of Prophecy.

^c The land of Canaan lies between the Mediterranean sea and the mountains of Arabia, and extends from Egypt to Phœnicia. It is bounded to the east by the mountains of Arabia; to the south by the wilderness of Paran, Idumea, and Egypt; to the west, by the Mediterranean, called in Hebrew the Great sea; and to the north, by the mountains of Libanus. Its length from the city of Dan (since called Casarea Philippi, or Paneadis, which stands at the foot of these mountains) to Beersheba, is about seventy leagues, and its breadth, from the Mediterranean sea to the eastern borders, is, in some places, thirty. It was first called the land of Canaan, from Caiman the son of Ham, whose posterity possessed it. It was afterwards called Palestine, from the people which the Hebrews call Philistines, and the Greeks and Romans corruptly Palestines, who inhabited the sea coasts, and were first known to them. It likewise had the name of the Land of Promise, from the promise God made Abraham of giving it to him; that of the land of Israel, from the Israelites having made themselves masters of it; that of Judah, from the tribe of Judah, which was the most considerable of the twelve; and lastly, the happiness it had of being sanctified by the presence, actions, miracles, and death of Jesus Christ, has given it the name of the Holy Land, which it retains to this day.—Lamy's Introduction.

^d The city of Sichem, or Sechem, or Sychar (for it had all these names), was at this time so called by way of anticipation (for as yet it was not founded), and is a town of Samaria, in the borders of Ephraim, which stands in a narrow valley, between Gerazim on the south, and Ebal on the north, being built at the foot of the former. At present it is called Naplossa, and consists only of two streets, lying parallel under mount Gerazim, and is far from being in the flourishing condition it was once, though it is still full of people, and the seat of a bashaw. The true name, which was given it by Abram, was Moreh, or Allon Moreh, which our translation renders the plain of Moreh; by St Jerome, the illustrious vale; by the Jerusalem Targum, the Valley of Vision, because of God's appearing to Abraham here; and by others, the Oak of Moreh, or the Illustrious Oak, &c., though it seems very probable that there was in this place, not only one single tree, but a whole grove of them; and therefore it is called Allon, or Aulon, being a corruption from Elon, in Latin Esculetum, that is, an oaken grove, or forest of evergreen oaks. And since this was the place where Abraham, at his first coming into the country, built an altar, we have great reason to be of the same opinion with the learned and sagacious Mr Mede, namely, that this Allon Moreh was a place of divine worship, a proseucha, or open oratory, in imitation of which the Jewish proseucha (which were certain spaces of ground, with

^a It is very probable that this was done by some appearance or other of the Shekinah going before him, even as afterwards his posterity was conducted in the way thither; since, passing over rivers, climbing mountains, and travelling through a dangerous and vast desert, he had certainly need of an extraordinary divine direction, and of some sensible exhibition or token of it, while he had nothing but the promise of God to support him in so long and so hazardous a journey.—Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. the city of Sichem, then^a inhabited by the Canaanites. Here he took up his abode for some time, and here built an altar, in order to pay his devotions to God; who, pleased with his behaviour, appeared to him again, as he had done at Haran before, and gave him fresh assurances of his favour, and a promise inviolable, that, in process of time, the whole land, where he then dwelt, should be the portion of his posterity.

From Sichem he removed^b into the mountainous country, which lies between Bethel and Hai, where he likewise built an altar for a place of divine worship, (as he did in all other countries where he came), and from Bethel he was travelling farther to the south, when he was stopped by a famine, which grew grievous in the land, and obliged him to go down to^c Egypt, the only place for provision in such like exigencies. But as he came to the confines of Egypt, he began to be not a little uneasy upon the account of his wife, who, though an altar in the midst, encompassed with a wall, or some other enclosure, and open above, but shaded with trees) in after ages were set up.—See Wells' Geography of the New Testament, vol. 1, and Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. 1. Occasional Annotations, 18; where the reader may meet with a particular enumeration, upon how many accounts more this place was in former times very famous.

^a The words in the text are, 'Abram passed through the land unto the place of Sichem, unto the plain of Moreh, and the Canaanite was then in the land;' from whence some have raised an objection, that Moses could not be the author of this book of Genesis, because the words seem to import that the writer of them lived after that the Canaanites were driven out of the land, which was after Moses' death. But, in answer to this, it may be observed, that as by 'the land' here we are not obliged to understand the whole country, but only that part of it which lay about Sichem, so by 'the Canaanite' we need not mean the whole posterity of Canaan, or all the Canaanitish tribes, but only one particular tribe of them, as in the very next chapter, ver. 7, is more distinctly expressed. And the reason why this is taken notice of by the sacred historian, is best accounted for in that ancient tradition in Epiphanius (Hæres. 66. N. 84.), if we will allow it to be true, namely, that according to the original settlement and distribution among the sons of Noah, Palestine was not allotted to any of the sons of Ham, but was usurped by Canaan from the children of Shem, to whom it did of right belong; so that these words, 'the Canaanite was then in the land,' signify, that they had already invaded the land, before Abraham came thither; and therefore God's promising to give it him, was only in order to restore that to the posterity of Shem, which the children of Ham had wrongfully seized.—Patrick's Commentary, and Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. 1.

^b What our author here means is mount Ephraim, which lay between Bethel, a town not far from Jerusalem, northwards, and Hai, which is situate towards the west of Bethel.—Wells' Geography, vol. 1.—Bethel was situated, according to Eusebius, twelve miles north of Jerusalem, toward Sichem, on the confines of Ephraim and Benjamin. Hai, or Ai, lay a little east of Bethel; and Eusebius and Jerome tell us that, in their time, they were shown some small remains of its ruins. Masius says that Ai was three leagues from Jericho, and Bethel one from Ai.—Ed.

^c Josephus tells us "that Abraham, understanding that there was a great plenty in Egypt, resolved upon a journey thither; not only to partake of their plenty, but also to consult the priests in their profession in divine matters, with an impartial desire and disposition to find out the truth, and either to give or receive satisfaction, according as the subject in question did require; that here he gained himself infinite credit, not only for the solidity of his judgment, and an admirable felicity of elocution, but for his instructive talent of informing and convincing his hearers at once; and that here he read lectures of astronomy and arithmetic, which the Egyptians understood nothing of until Abraham brought them with him out of Chaldee into Egypt, from whence they passed into Greece."—Antiquities, b. 1. c. 9.

she had passed the sixty-fifth year of her age, retained still beauty enough to endanger the man's life who should pass for her husband in that country. And therefore, after some deliberation, concluding, that the safest way would be for her to conceal her marriage, he took an opportunity to acquaint her with his fears, and, with a small entreaty, prevailed with her, in all places where they were to sojourn, to go under the notion of his sister.

They had not been long in Egypt before Abram's fears were found to be true. His wife's charms had captivated several, and her beauty was become the common topic of conversation; insomuch, that in a short time it reached the court, and the high commendations which every one gave the king of it, raised his curiosity to see this amiable stranger. Immediately therefore she was brought to court, and taken in to the king's apartment, as designed for one of his royal concubines; ^d while her pretended brother was treated with great civility for her sake, and loaded with many valuable presents from the king.

It is hardly to be imagined, what a sad distress both the patriarch and his consort must have been in, upon this occasion. She was a beautiful woman, in the power of a loose and vicious prince, and destitute of all protection but God's; and her lord not so much as daring to own her his wife, knowing how certain and sudden must be the destruction of an helpless man, that provokes passion and power, rage of lust, and security of gratifying it.

While matters were in this dangerous position, the providence of God interposed in her behalf, and to deter^e Pharaoh and his nobles from any dishonourable attempts upon her virtue, ^finfested them with such plagues, as made them not insensible upon whose account it was that they suffered: even upon hers who, though she ^d When a woman was brought into the seraglio or harem of the eastern princes, she underwent for a considerable time certain purifications before she was brought into the king's presence. It was in this interim that God plagued Pharaoh and his house with plagues, so that Sarai was restored before she could be taken to the bed of the Egyptian king.—Clarke's Commentary.—Ed.

^e Pharaoh was the common name for all the Egyptian kings for above 3300 years (as Josephus tells us, Antiquities, b. 8. c. 2.), but what its proper etymology is, the learned are not so well agreed. Bochart thinks that the word Pharaoh signifies a crocodile, and that Ezekiel alludes to it in these words; 'Behold I am against thee, Pharaoh, king of Egypt, the great dragon that lieth in the midst of the river,' Ezekiel xxix. 3. M. Le Clerc fancies that the Arabic word Pharaoh, to be raised on high, or to be superior to, is the true root of the name. Kircher does indeed derive the word from the same root, but will have it to signify to deliver, or to free; and that Pharaoh therefore signifies to be exempt from the jurisdiction of the laws. And, to name no more, the learned Renaudot thinks that Pharaoh is the same with the Egyptian Pourro, or Pooro, which signifies a king.—Calmet on the word.

^f Some of the Hebrew interpreters think that they had grievous ulcers in their secret parts, which made both him and them incapable of enjoying either her or any other woman; and in the punishment inflicted upon Abimelech and his people, upon the same account, Gen. xx. 18, they suppose that there were such swellings in their privy parts, as that the men could neither enjoy their wives, nor the women who were with child be delivered.—Patrick's Commentary.—Whatever the plagues were, it is evident they were understood by Pharaoh as proofs of the disapprobation of God; and consequently, even at this time, in Egypt there was some knowledge of the primitive and true religion.—Clarke's Commentary.—Ed.

passed for a single, was in reality a married woman; so that the king, immediately calling for Abram, expostulated with him on the ill consequences that might have ensued from the method he had taken; and after some few exprobrations, returned him his wife, and gave orders that they might safely depart his kingdom, without any the least molestation, either to their persons or possessions.

Abram, after this, tarried not long in Egypt; for understanding that the famine was ceased in Canaan, he returned thither by the same way, and on the altar which he had built before, offered a sacrifice of thanks for his happy escape and safe return. Lot and Abram had hitherto lived together; but by this time their substance was so much increased, that they found it inconvenient to be any longer near one another. Their cattle mingled; their herdsmen quarrelled; and their flocks, when together, required a larger tract of ground to feed and support them than they could take up, without interfering with the property of the inhabitants of the land wherein they sojourned. Upon these considerations, Abram resolved, in a friendly manner, to separate from Lot; and having given him his choice of the whole country that lay before him, Lot chose the fertile and pleasant plains of Sodom and Gomorrah,^b which he saw were well watered by the streams of Jordan, and so parted from ^a The Jews here tell us, that the herdsmen of Abraham were commanded by their master not to go near the Canaanites, or the Perizzites, nor to come into the grounds which they had taken, either for culture or pasturage, so that they might not appear to do the least injury to any of them; and that, in obedience to his command, they took especial care to confine all their cattle, and to watch their flocks with a strict eye, so that none might go astray, and so trespass upon the natives; but that Lot's herdsmen were herein very negligent, and suffered their cattle to go beyond their bounds, and to feed in the fields which belonged to the Canaanites and Perizzites, who dwelt then in the land, and claimed the sovereignty of it.—Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. 1.

^b The words in the text are these: 'The plain of Jordan was well watered every where, before the Lord destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah (even like the garden of the Lord, like the land of Egypt) as thou goest to Zoar.' The last clause, 'as thou goest to Zoar,' has much perplexed commentators, whilst they refer it to the land of Egypt in the clause immediately preceding; whereas, if what is said by way of comparison of the plain of Jordan to the garden of the Lord, that is, the garden of Eden, and to the land of Egypt, be understood as inserted by of parenthesis, the difficulty will be taken away, and the import of the last clause will be plain and easy; for then the meaning of the verse will amount to this,—'That before the Lord destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, the plain of Jordan was well watered every where, as thou comest unto Zoar,' that is, in the parts where Sodom and Gomorrah stood, or in short, in the vale of Siddim. But there is another interpretation which supposes the word Zoar to be a false reading for Zoar, a city that was once the capital of Egypt, situate at the lower part of the river Nile, where it divides itself into several branches, and so waters the country more plentifully thereabouts than in any other part. According to which reading, the import of the verse will be this:—'That the plain of Jordan was well watered every where about Sodom and Gomorrah, before the Lord destroyed them; yea, the plain was so well watered, that it was in this respect as the garden of Eden, or as the land of Egypt, and particularly as thou goest to Zoar, that is, in the parts about Zoar, where the Nile is divided into several branches.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 1. The river Jordan, called by the Arabs El Sharia, which runs through this plain, is of so great note in the Sacred Writings that we must not pass it by without this observation,—that it derives its name (as some assert) from the Hebrew word Jor, which signifies a spring, and Dan, which is a small town near the source of this river. But the misfortune is, that the name of Dan is much more modern than that of Jordan. From its source, in Anti-Libanus, about his uncle. Abram, continuing, for some time, in the place where Lot had left him, had a vision imparted to him, wherein God was pleased to renew the promise of enlarging his posterity; and bidding him cast his eyes round the horizon, confirmed the gift of all the land which he beheld to him and his posterity. Not long after this, he left Bethel, and went to dwell at the Oak of Mamre, which is not far from Hebron, where he built an altar unto the Lord, and in a short time contracted an acquaintance with three of the greatest men there, Mamre, Aner, and Escol; the first of whom communicated his name to all the country.

This alliance proved very serviceable to him, but more especially upon the following occasion. Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, had held five petty princes in a tributary subjection to him for some years, of which number the king of Sodom was one. At length they shook off their yoke, and confederated against him which provoked him (in conjunction with three other kings, his allies) to march directly with a powerful army against them. The revolted kings, seeing the enemy drawing towards them, took the field with the resolution to try the fate of a pitched battle. The valley of Siddim was the place where the armies were to meet; and twelve miles north of Cæsarea Philippi, now Baniyas, it runs through a space of fifty leagues, till it discharges itself into the Dead Sea, otherwise called the Asphaltic lake, where Sodom and Gomorrah, and the other cities of the plain, that were destroyed with fire from heaven, once stood. About five or six leagues' distance from its spring it forms the lake Semechon, or waters of Merom, now Houle, and from thence it enters the lake Tiberias, or Gennesereth, passes quite through it, and is lost in the Dead Sea. Its water, in the summer time, is very shallow; but about the time of the barley-harvest, or the feast of the passover, it constantly overflows its banks, and greatly fructifies the plain.—Culmet's Dictionary.

^c What we translate the plain should be rendered the Oak of Mamre; because the word elon signifies an oak, or tree of long duration. Sazemon tells us that this tree was still extant, and famous for pilgrimages and annual feasts, even in Constantine's time; that it was about six miles distant from Hebron: that some of the cottages which Abraham built were still standing near it; and that there was a well likewise of his digging, wherein both Jews, and Christians, and Heathens, did at certain seasons resort, either out of devotion or for trade, because there was held a great mart. As for Hebron, or Chedor, it was accounted one of the most ancient cities in the world, having been built seven years before Tanis, the capital of Lower Egypt. It was situate on an eminence, twenty miles southward from Jerusalem, and twenty miles north from Beersheba, and had its name very probably from the word Chavar, to couple or join; because these married couples, Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebecca, Jacob and Leah, were buried there.—Culmet's Dictionary, and Universal History, in the Notes, b. 1. c. 7.

^d We meet no where in profane history with the name of Chedorlaomer, nor with any of those names of the kings that were confederate with him; and the reason hereof is, that Ctesias, (from whom the profane historians took the names of these kings) did not use the original Assyrian names in his history, but rather such as he found in the Persian records. However, since the date of this transaction falls four years before the death of Ninias, there are good grounds to infer, that Ninias, who then lived in Persia, was the Chedorlaomer of Moses, at that time the head of the Assyrian monarchy; that Amraphel was his deputy at Babylon in Shinar; and Arioch and Tidal his deputies over some other adjacent countries: for it is remarkable that Ninias was the first who appointed under him such deputies; nor is there any absurdity in Moses to call them kings, since it is observable, from what Isaiah hinted afterwards, ch. x. 8, that the Assyrian boasted his deputy princes to be equal to royal governors, 'Are not my princes altogether kings?'—Shuckford's Connection, vol. 2. b. 6.

as it was full of pits of bitumen, it might have made the engagement more difficult and dangerous to the enemy's horse: but so it was,^a that the five kings were put to the rout; one part of their army was cut in pieces, and the other fled to the neighbouring mountains, leaving their cities a prey to the conquerors. Lot, who at this time resided at Sodom, was involved in the calamity of the city; was plundered of all he had, and himself carried away among the rest of the captives. As soon as Abram had intelligence of this by an express messenger, he immediately sends to his three friends, desiring their assistance at this critical juncture; and putting himself at the head of three hundred and eighteen of his own domestics, all well prepared, and men of resolution, he began his pursuit, and after a march of almost seventy leagues, coming up with the enemy, and dividing his forces into small parties, he fell upon them by night, and charging them on all sides at once, put them in such a terror and consternation, that they took to their heels and fled, leaving all the booty and captives behind them, among whom he happily recovered Lot, and brought him back with all his substance to his former habitation.

The first person who came to congratulate Abram upon this victory, was the king of Sodom, (very probably the son of him¹ who perished in the slime-pits,) who, in thankful acknowledgment of the benefits he had received from his valour and assistance, offered him all the booty which he had retaken, and desired only his subjects, the prisoners, to be restored. But Abram was too generous to take the advantage of the misery of war; and, therefore, saving to his confederates such a proportion of the plunder as by the law of arms belonged to them, he returned all the rest, both prisoners and goods, to the king of Sodom; having before resolved to keep no part of them, that it might be said he undertook that enterprise, not for any private advantage, but purely for the public good, which every man of honour should have always primarily in his view.

The next who congratulated him upon this occasion, was Melchizedek king of Salem; who, upon his return from the battle, had provided plenty of all things necessary for his refreshment and his men's in their march; and as he was a priest, as well as a king, he both blessed Abram for being the instrument of so public a deliverance in the hands of God, and God himself, who had given such uncommon success to his arms; whereupon Abram, in return, presented him with the tenth part of the spoils which he had taken from the enemy in this expedition.

Abram's deportment, upon this occasion, was so very acceptable to God, that he was pleased to appear to him again in a vision, and to give him fresh assurances of his special favour, and of his intention to be his shield of defence in all dangers, and for all the good acts which he performed his exceeding great reward.

^a As the text tells us, that the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah fell into some of the slime pits, with which the valley of Siddim abounds, and takes no notice of their coming out of them, it is more rational to suppose that they perished there, than that Abraham staid to take them up, as the Jews vainly imagine; and that therefore the king of Sodom, who afterwards came out to congratulate Abraham, must have been the son of the deceased.

Hitherto, indeed, the patriarch had listened to God's promises without any expression of distrust; but upon this fresh assurance, he ventured, for the first time, to expostulate with him, not knowing how these things possibly could be accomplished whilst himself continued childless, and, to all appearance, must be obliged to leave the bulk of his substance to Eliezar, his household steward. This, indeed, was a modest way to try whether God designed to bless him with a child; and God did not leave him long in suspense. He told him, that not his servant, but a son of his own, begotten of his body, should be his heir, and should have a race descending from him as innumerable as the stars.

This was such joyful news, as gave Abram fresh courage, even to request of God some sensible and visible token, whereby he might be assured of this blessing; and accordingly God was pleased to comply with his request. That, therefore, they might enter into a formal covenant upon this occasion, he ordered him to take an heifer, a goat, and a ram, of three years old each, with a pigeon and a turtle-dove, and to offer them up. Abram did as he was ordered; and having killed the four-footed beasts, he^b cut them in two, and laid the halves at proper distances, directly opposite to each other, but the fowls he left whole; and so passing between the dissected bodies, (as the manner of covenanting then was,) he made his solemn vows of perpetual obedience to God; and then sitting down, in expectation of what God would do on his part, he took care to drive away all birds of prey from settling upon the sacrifice.

As soon as the sun began to set, a deep sleep,^c attended with an horrible darkness and dread of spirits, fell upon him; during which it was revealed to him that he was not to expect an immediate accomplishment of ^b The only place, besides this, where we have any intimation given us of this custom of making covenants, by dividing the beasts then to be sacrificed, and by the parties who covenanted passing between the parts of the beast so divided, is in Jer. xxxiv. 18, 19. 'I will give the men that have transgressed my covenant, which have not performed the words of my covenant, which they had made before me, when they cut the calf in twain, and passed between the parts thereof: the princes of Judah, and the princes of Jerusalem, the eunuchs, and the priests, and all the people of the land, which passed between the parts of the calf; I will even give them into the hands of their enemies, and into the hand of them that seek their life; and their dead bodies shall be for meat unto the fowls of the heaven, and unto the beasts of the earth.' This certainly was a very ancient custom; and accordingly we find in Homer, that making a solemn covenant by oaths and sacrifices, literally, cutting faithful oaths, is a very common phrase, upon which his commentator Eustathius has this observation, 'that in matters of great moment, oaths or covenants were generally made by dividing the animals, which upon such occasions were sacrificed;' and the design of this rite (as the learned Mede, in a discourse upon the subject, has expressed it) was as much as to say, 'Thus let me be divided, and cut in pieces, if I violate the oath which I have now made in the presence of God.' — Patrick and Le Clerc's Commentary.

^c That horror and dread of spirits do frequently seize on those who see visions, is evident from what Daniel tells us of himself, 'I was left alone, and saw this great vision, and there remained no strength in me; for my comeliness was turned in me into corruption, and I retained no strength' (chap. x. 8); but the description which we have in Job of this matter, is, in itself, very awful and affecting. 'In thoughts from the visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth on men, fear came upon me and trembling, which made all my bones to shake. Then a spirit passed before my face, the hair of my flesh stood up. It stood still, but I could not discern the form thereof; an image was before mine eyes, there was silence, and I heard a voice;' ch. iv. 13, &c.

the divine promises; for though ^a himself was to die in peace, and in a good old age, yet his posterity were after that to sojourn, and be afflicted in a strange country ^b for the space of four hundred years; at the expiration of which God would punish their oppressors, and conduct them safe to the land which he had promised them. And for his confirmation in this, he caused the symbol of his divine presence, namely, ^c ‘a smoking furnace and a burning lamp,’ to pass between the divided pieces of the victims, and consume them, in ratification of his part of the covenant.

Ten years had Sarai expected the performance of God's promise, and judging now, by the course of nature, that her husband's issue must proceed from some other woman, and not from her own body, she prevailed with him to take her handmaid ^a Hagar to be his secondary

^a The expression in the text is, ‘Thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace,’ which some will have to be no more than an oriental phrase for going to the grave; but since it cannot be said of Abraham that he did, in this sense, go to his fathers (forasmuch as his body was so far from being laid with them in the sepulchre, that it was deposited in a country that had no manner of communication with that of his fathers,) it must be allowed, that from this text an argument may justly be drawn for the separate existence of human souls. The expression, however, of ‘going to our fathers,’ seems to have been formed from some such notion as this,—That the souls of the deceased do go to a certain place, where those of the same family, or same nation at least, are supposed to live together, and in communion; which notion certainly arises from that natural desire, which all men, who think their better part immortal, have to see and converse with such of their relations or countrymen as have left behind them a great and lasting fame. “For if the soul of Socrates,” says one, “were permitted to go where it desired, it would certainly associate with the worthies of Greece, with Orpheus, Musæus, Homer, and those ancient demigods, who, in their several generations, were so renowned.”—See Le Clerc's Commentary; and Biblioth. Biblica, vol. 1. in locum.

^b Expositors have been very much divided in their opinions, how to make it out that Abraham's posterity was in a state of servitude and affliction for the space of four hundred years. It may be observed, however, that all this difficulty is removed, if we suppose that their state of affliction is to be reckoned from the time of Isaac's birth, which, to the deliverance out of the Egyptian bondage, was just four hundred and five years; but the five odd years are therefore not mentioned, because it is a common custom among all writers to take no notice of broken numbers (as they call them) when they name a round sum. And if there be supposed a farther difficulty, in that their sojourning is (in Exod. xii. 40) said to have continued four hundred and thirty years; in these years, the time of Abraham's sojourning (which was exactly twenty-five years from his coming into the land of Canaan to the birth of Isaac) may be comprehended, and then all the difficulty vanishes; because these twenty-five years, added to the four hundred and five before mentioned, exactly make up the four hundred and thirty.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c By this symbol God designed to represent to Abraham, either the future state of his posterity, the ‘smoking furnace’ signifying Israel's misery in the land of Egypt, and ‘the burning lamp’ their happy escape and deliverance; or (what seems more probable) to notify his own immediate presence, since both smoke and fire are, in several parts of Scripture, mentioned as emblems and representations of the divine appearance. And, therefore, as it was a thing customary, and especially in Chaldea, (from whence Abraham came,) for persons covenanting together to pass between the pieces of the sacrifice; so God, who had no body to do it visibly for him, did it in this type and emblem.—Pool's Annotations; and Bibliotheca Biblica, in locum.

^d In concubinage, these secondary, or wives of a lower order, were accounted lawful and true wives; had an equal right to the marriage bed with the chief wife, and their issue was reputed as legitimate; but in all other respects they were inferior. And as they had no authority in the family, nor any share in household government; so, if they had been servants in the family before wife, pleasing herself with the thoughts, that if her maid should conceive by her husband, the child would be reputed hers, and her house be established in the completion of the divine promise.

It was not long before Hagar accordingly did conceive; and forgetting now the former condition of her life, she began to value herself upon it, and to treat her mistress with insolence and ill-manners. Sarai, impatient to see herself insulted by a slave, could not forbear breaking out into bitter complaints against her to her husband; but he, willing to make her easy, and withal to discountenance any disrespectful carriage towards her, left her to treat her maid just as she pleased. This license gave Sarai an opportunity of expressing her resentment with too much severity, which the other not able to bear, she stole from her master's house, and was making the best of her way to her own country, which was Egypt; when, in her travels through the wilderness, meeting with a fountain, she tarried to rest and refresh herself there. As she was revolving her sorrows in her mind, an angel came to her, and, after some previous questions, advised her to return home, and be subject to her mistress, because it would not be long before she should be delivered of a son, (whom he ordered her to name ^e Ishmael,) whose posterity would be very numerous, a stout and warlike people, living upon plunder in the deserts, and apt to annoy others, though not easily vanquished themselves.^f they came to be concubines, they continued in that state afterwards, and in the same subjection to their mistresses as before—Hovel's History of the Bible.

^e Ishmael is compounded of the words Jishmag and El, the Lord hath, or the Lord will hear; and the reason of the name is immediately subjoined by the angel, namely, because the Lord hath heard her complaint.

^f Gen. xvi. 12. ‘His hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him.’ “The one is the natural, and almost necessary consequence of the other. Ishmael lived by prey and rapine in the wilderness; and his posterity have all along infested Arabia and the neighbouring countries with their robberies and incursions. They live in a state of continual war with the world, and are both robbers by land and pirates by sea. As they have been such enemies to mankind, it is no wonder that mankind have been such enemies to them again; that several attempts have been made to extirpate them; and even now as well as formerly, travellers are forced to go with arms, and in caravans or large companies, and to march and keep watch like a little army, to defend themselves from the assaults of these freebooters, who run about in troops, and rove and plunder all whom they can by any means subdue. These robberies they also justify, by alleging the hard usage of their father Ishmael, who being turned out of doors by Abraham, had the open plains and deserts given him by God for his patrimony, with permission to take whatever he could find there; and on this account they think they may, with a safe conscience, indemnify themselves, as well as they can, not only on the posterity of Isaac, but also on every body else; always supposing a kind of kindred between themselves and those they plunder; and in relating their adventures of this kind, they think it sufficient to change the expression, and instead of I robbed a man of such and such a thing, to say, I gained it.” Sale's Preliminary Discourse, 50.—Newton on the Prophecies, vol. 1. p. 42.

“The Arabs have never been entirely subdued, nor has any impression been made on them, except on their borders; where, indeed, the Phenicians, Persians, Ethiopians, Egyptians, and in modern times, the Ottoman Tartars, have severally acquired settlements; but, with these exceptions, the natives of Hejaz and Yemen have preserved for ages the sole dominion of their deserts and pastures, their mountains and fertile valleys. Thus, apart from the rest of mankind, this extraordinary people have retained their primitive language and manners, features and characters, as

Hagar, hearing this comfortable news, was soon persuaded to take the angel's advice, and in memory of this surprising vision, having called first the fountain where she sat, Beer-lahai-roi, which signifies 'the well of him that lives and sees me,'^a she made what haste she could home; and in a short time after her return, was delivered of a son, according to the angel's promise.

At the birth of Ishmael, Abram was eighty-six years old; and lest, in the excess of his joy, he should mistake this child for the heir of the promises which had been made to him, about thirteen years after, God renewed his covenant^b with him; instituted the rite of circumcision upon a severe penalty; changed^c his name from Abram to Abraham, and his wife's from Sarai to^d Sarah, (where the difference in sense is much more than in sound,) and long and as remarkably as the Hindoos themselves.—Sir W. Jones's Discourse on the Arabs, Works, vol. 3, p. 49.—Ed.

^a Gen. xvi. 13. 'And she called the name of the Lord that spake unto her, Thou God seest me.' The religion of names was a matter of great consequence in Egypt. It was one of their essential superstitions: it was one of their native inventions, and the first of them which they communicated to the Greeks. Thus when Hagar, the handmaid of Sarai, who was an Egyptian woman, saw the angel of God in the wilderness, 'She called the name of the Lord that spake unto her, ELROI, the God of vision, or the visible God,' that is, according to the established custom of Egypt, she gave him a name of honour; not merely a name of distinction, for such all nations had (who worshipped local tutelary deities) before their communication with Egypt; but after that they decorated their gods with distinguished titles, indicative of their specific office and attributes. Zechariah (chap. xiv. 9.) evidently alluding to these nations, when he prophesies of the worship of the supreme God, unmixed with idolatry, says, 'in that day shall there be one Lord, and his name shall be one.' Out of indulgence, therefore, to this weakness, God was pleased to give himself a name. 'And the Lord said unto Moses, I am that I am. Exod. iii. 14.—Warburton's Divine Legation, b. 4. sec. 6.—Ed.

^b Gen. xvii. 10. 'This is my covenant.' Covenants were anciently made in the eastern countries by dipping their weapons in blood (as Xenophon tells us,) and by pricking the flesh, and sucking each other's blood, as we read in Tacitus; who observes (p. 1. Annal.) that when kings made a league, they took each other by the hand, and their thumbs being hard tied together, they pricked them, when the blood was forced to the extreme parts, and each party licked it. This was accounted a mysterious covenant, being made sacred by their mutual blood. How old this custom had been we do not know; but it is evident God's covenant with Abraham was solemnized on Abraham's part by his own and his son Isaac's blood, and so continued through all generations, by circumcision: whereby, as they were made the select people of God, so God, in conclusion, sent his own son, who by this very ceremony of circumcision, was consecrated to be their God and Redeemer.—Patrick, in locum.—Ed.

The ceremony of laying a knife or sword upon the altar, was the usual mode of ratifying grants before the invention of seals; and it appears that it was not entirely laid aside afterwards. King Stephen's last charter to the nuns at Barking, in Essex, was executed at the monastery by the ceremony of laying his knife upon the altar of the Virgin Mary and St Ethelburgh.—Lytson's Environs of London, vol. 3, p. 60.—Ed.

^c Abram is compounded of two Hebrew words, Ab and Ram, which signify high father; and Abraham is commonly derived from three, namely, Ab-Ram-Hamon, the father of a great multitude. But this is forced and ungrammatical, having nothing to support it but only the reason which God gives in the text, for changing Abram into Abraham, namely, because he was to make of him 'a father of many nations,' as indeed he was; for not only the twelve tribes, but the Ishmaelites, the Edomites, and all the posterity of Keturah, descended from his loins.

^d Sarai signifies my princess, or princess of my family only: but Sarah, the name now given her, denotes a princess indefinitely, and at large, according to the prediction concerning her, 'a mother (or princess) of many nations shall she be, and kings of people shall come of her.' Gen. xvii. 16.

to complete his happiness, gave him a promise that his wife Sarah should bear him a son. This seemed a thing so strange, and almost impossible, that Abraham, falling on his face, began to intercede for the life and preservation of Ishmael, as thinking it unreasonable to ask, or wish for any thing more; but the Almighty soon assured him, that these great blessings were not designed for Ishmael, but for a son to be born of the once barren Sarah, (and therefore to be named^e Isaac,) which would certainly come to pass within the compass of a year. That he might not, however, seem wholly to neglect his request for Ishmael, he promised to make him a great nation, and the father of twelve princes, though the son begotten of Sarah should alone be entitled to the covenant and promise of 'making all the nations of the earth blessed.' This was the purport of the vision; and as soon as it was ended, Abraham delayed not (according to the divine command) to circumcise himself, his son, and all the males in his family; an ordinance which the Hebrews have ever since observed very religiously.

Abraham continued still to dwell at Mamre; and, as he was sitting one day at the door of his tent,^f he espied three persons, whom he took to be travellers, coming towards him.^g He therefore went out to meet them; and having, in a very civil and respectful manner, invited them to take a small refreshment with him, (which they consented to,) he immediately gave orders for an^h enter-

^e Isaac, or, according to the Hebrew, Ischack, signifies he or she has, or shall laugh; and this name Sarah gave him, because when the angel promised that she should become a mother, though she was not of an age to have children, she privately laughed at the prediction; and when the child was born, she said 'God hath made me to laugh, so that all that hear will laugh with me.' Gen. xxi. 6.—Calnet's Dictionary.

^f Gen. xviii. 1. 'And he sat in the tent door in the heat of the day.' Those who lead a pastoral life in the east, at this day, frequently place themselves in a similar situation. At ten minutes after ten we had in view several fine bays, and a plain full of booths, with the Turcomans sitting by the doors, under sheds resembling porticoes; or by shady trees, surrounded by flocks of goats.—Chandler's Travels in Asia Minor, p. 180.—Ed.

^g Gen. xviii. 1.—8. When a party belonging to Captain Cook (in his last voyage) went ashore on an island near that of Mangeea, in the South Seas, they were forcibly detained by the natives a considerable time, which much alarmed them. But this detention proceeded, as they afterwards found, from pure motives of hospitality; and continued only till such time as they had roasted a hog, and provided other necessaries for their refreshment. "In reviewing this most curious transaction," says the writer of that voyage, "we cannot help calling to our memory the manners of the patriarchal times. It does not appear to us that these people had any intention in detaining us, different from those which actuated the patriarch in a similar transaction."—Ed.

^h The following quotations seem to illustrate the nature and manner of this entertainment:—Gen. xviii. 4, 'Let a little water, I pray you, be fetched, and wash your feet.' One of the first rites of hospitality observed towards strangers amongst the ancients, was washing the feet: of this there are many instances in Homer. Gen. xviii. 6. 'And Abraham hastened into the tent unto Sarah, and said, make ready quickly three measures of fine meal, knead it, and make cakes upon the hearth. These instructions are quite similar to the manners of the place, which even at present are little if any thing altered from what they anciently were. Thus Dr Shaw relates, (Travels, p. 29,) "That in cities and villages, where there are public ovens, the bread is usually leavened; but among the Bedouens, as soon as the dough is kneaded, it is made into thin cakes, which are either immediately baked upon the coals, or else in a txjen, a shallow earthen vessel like a frying pan."—2 Sam. xiii. 8. 1 Chron. xxiii. 29. Gen. xviii. 7. 'Abraham tainment to be made ready, ^a which accordingly was served in, and himself waited at the table, under the covert of a shady oak.

While they sat at table, ^b one of the guests, inquiring after Sarah, and being told that she was in the tent, he then addressed himself to Abraham, and assured him that he had still in remembrance the case of his wife Sarah, who, at the end of the year, should certainly have a son. Sarah, who was listening at the tent door, and thought herself far enough past child-bearing, ^c could not refrain from laughing within herself; and when the stranger asked the reason of it with such a serious air as struck her ran into the herd, and fetched a calf tender and good.' Abraham appears to have taken a very active part in preparing to entertain the angels. But when it is said that 'he ran to the herd, and fetched a calf,' we must not understand him as descending to an office either menial or unbecoming his rank, since we are informed, that "the greatest of these countries is not ashamed to fetch a lamb from his herd, and kill it, whilst the princess is impatient till she hath prepared her fire and kettle to dress it."—Shaw's Travels, p. 501.

"As the Panther was, at two o'clock, too far off to give us any hope of dining on board, we applied to our friendly Dola, who readily undertook to give us the best the island could afford. A fine young kid was killed, and delivered to his wife, who performed the office of cook, in an inner room, where we were not permitted to enter. In about two hours the whole was served up in very clean bowls of wood; and instead of a table-cloth, we had new mats. The good lady had also made us some cakes with juwany and glice: pepper and salt were laid beside them. It was excellently roasted; and I do not know that I ever enjoyed a dinner more."—Lord Valentia's Travels, vol. 2. p. 323.—Ed.

^a The Scripture informs us, Gen. xviii. 8, 'that Abraham took butter and milk, and the calf, (that is, the choicest parts of the calf) and set it before them, and they did eat;' where the eating of these angels must be understood according to the nature of the bodies we may suppose them to have assumed. If their bodies were aerial, their eating must have been in appearance only: if substantial, their eating might have been real; that is, they might have received the meat into their bodies, which afterwards, by a divine power, was consumed there.—Poole's Annotations and Le Clerc's Commentary.

^b It is very observable, that one of these angels (as the apostle to the Hebrews calls them, chap. xiii. 3) appeared more honourable and superior to the other two; and therefore Abraham makes his address to him as the chief, and the historian styles him Jehovah, which the generality both of Jews and Christians do look upon as the incommunicable name of God; and therefore it is believed by the far greatest part of the latter, that it was the Son of God who appeared in that form. There are others, however, (particularly some modern ones,) who maintain, that it was no more than an angel who spoke to him in the person of God; though it hardly seems probable, either that Moses should call an angel by that name, or that Abraham should intercede with him, as he does, when he saith, 'That be far from thee, to destroy the good with the wicked: shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?' Or that an angel should peremptorily say, 'If I find forty righteous men in the place, for their sakes I will not destroy it.' So that the most probable opinion is, that it was Christ himself, who is emphatically called 'the Judge of all the earth.'—Universal History. The Jews, however, have a maxim, that no angel performs two ministries, or is sent upon two messages at once; and therefore they think, that these three angels (as they suppose them) were dispatched for different purposes; one of them, who was the chief, to bring a confirmation of the birth of Isaac; another, to conduct Lot safe out of Sodom; and the third, to overthrow the cities of the plain: and therefore, when one of them had delivered his message to Abraham, there were but two that held on their course to Sodom.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c In the preceding chapter (ver. 17.) we read, that Abraham laughed upon the same occasion, and yet was not reproved; but the difference of their conduct might be this,—that Abraham laughed for joy upon hearing the glad tidings of a son, but Sarah's laughter proceeded from a spirit of distrust and infidelity. Poole's Annotations.

with terror, and she endeavoured to deny it, he dismissed her with this gentle reproof,—That it was highly wrong in her to mistrust what he had said unto her, since nothing was impossible with God.

Upon this the conversation ceased, and the three heavenly guests rising up to proceed on their journey, Abraham very courteously attended them some part of the way. Their way lay towards Sodom, whither two of the guests advanced with more haste, but the third, continuing with Abraham, began to reveal a most dreadful secret, namely, that the iniquity of Sodom, and the other neighbouring cities, was come to such a prodigious height, that he was now going down with an intent to destroy them, ^d if, upon inquiry, he found their abominations equal to the report of them. This condescension of God, in communicating his design to Abraham, gave him encouragement to make intercession for the wicked inhabitants of these cities, which, in six petitionary propositions, he managed so well, as, by a gradual decrease of the number every time, to bring him at last to a concession, that if even ten just persons were found in Sodom, he would not destroy it: and with this conditional promise he left Abraham.

In the mean time, the other two guests, (who as we said went before, and were indeed the ministering angels whom God had appointed to execute his judgments upon the Sodomites,) held on their course towards the city, where they arrived in the evening, when Lot was sitting in the gate. As soon as he saw them, he rose up to meet them, and, after proper salutations, ^e invited them

^d Here is a wonderful instance of God's patience and goodness, who, though he knew all without inquiry, yet would not condemn even the most flagitious, without good examination and trial. Before the flood, God proceeded against the old world upon ocular evidence. 'God saw that the wickedness of man was great,' Gen. vi. 5, 12. At the building of Babel, it is said that 'the Lord came down to see the city and the tower, which the children of men had built,' Gen. xi. 5. And now again, before the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, though the cry against them was great, because of the grievousness of their sin, yet the Lord would not proceed against them upon common fame: 'but I will go down,' saith he, 'and see, whether they have done according to the cry of it; and if not, I will know,' Gen. xviii. 21. And hereupon we may observe, that the appearing of gods in the manner of strangers, to punish or reward men, was a common tradition among the heathens.

^e In the eastern countries of late indeed, some few caravansaries have been set up; but in the time we are now speaking of, there was no such thing as inns for the accommodation of strangers; and therefore all travellers, when they came to a town, if they were not entertained in a private house, were forced to abide all night in the streets. It was therefore a customary thing for those of the better sort to receive such wayfaring men (whether they knew them or knew them not) into their houses, and there entertain them with great civility. And this is the reason why, both in sacred and profane authors, we meet with such large commendations of this act of hospitality, and particularly in the Epistle to the Hebrews, (ch. xiii. 2.) have a precept to this effect, alluding to the very historical passage now before us. 'Be not forgetful to entertain strangers, for thereby some have entertained angels unawares.'—Le Clerc's Commentary. Thus we read in Homer that Minerva, coming in the shape of Mentor, to make Telemachus a visit, descends in the realm of Ithaca, and stands in the portal of Ulysses, until he saw her, and then upon went to her, and very kindly invited her in: thus, as Pope has it,

While his fond soul these fancied triumphs swell'd,
The stranger guest the royal youth beheld,
Grieved that the visitant so long should wait,
Unasked, unhonour'd, at a monarch's gate;
Instant he flew with hospitable haste,

to his house to refresh and repose themselves that night; which at first they declined, but afterwards, on some importunity, complied with. ^a But before it was time to go to rest, the inhabitants of the city, both young and old, being informed that Lot had strangers with him, and in all probability tempted with the beautiful forms which the angels had assumed, encompassed the house, and demanded of him to deliver them up, ^b that they might abuse them.

Lot thinking by mild and soft words to appease his outrageous neighbours, steps out of the door, and shutting it after him, entreats them to offer no affront to his guests; nay, rather than have the laws of hospitality violated, he offers to give up his two virgin-daughters to their discretion. But all would not do; they threatened to use him worse than his guests, a pragmatical stranger that pretended to control them in any thing! and were pressing forward to break open the door, when the two angels, with more than human strength, forced their way out, took in their host again, and then shutting the door, ^c struck all that were round it with blindness, so that they were not able to find any more where it was.

Whilst they were thus groping about in vain, the two angels acquainted Lot with their commission; that their errand was to execute the divine vengeance upon that execrable place; and therefore they advised him, if he had any friends, for whose safety he was concerned, that he would immediately let them know their danger, and warn them to depart in time. Lot had no relations, but only ^d two sons-in-law, to whom his daughters were contracted; but these, when he went to them early in the morning, desiring them to go along with him, and leave that accursed place, took the old man to be crazy, or beside himself, and made a banter and ridicule of all that he said.

In the morning, as soon as it was day, one of the angels observing Lot to linger, (possibly to pack up some of his most valuable goods,) took him, his wife, and his two daughters by the hand, and carried them in a manner forcibly out of the city, bidding them to fly for their lives; and, lest they should be involved in the common ruin, to make the best of their way to the mountains. Lot looking before him, and perceiving the mountains to be at a good distance, began to fear that he should not be able to reach them in time, and therefore entreated the angel, that he might be permitted to escape to a small city not far from Sodom, then called Bela, but afterwards Zoar, which he accordingly granted, and for his sake spared the city; but then he urged them to be expeditious, and to make all possible haste thither, because they could not begin to execute their commission until he was safely arrived.

What the angels enjoined them at their departure was, neither to tarry in the plain nor to look behind them. But before they got to Zoar, so it was, that Lot's wife, either out of forgetfulness of the prohibition, or out of love to the place of her habitation, looking back, was turned into a pillar of ^e metallic salt, a lasting monument of God's vengeance on obstinate and unbelieving offenders: ^f and no sooner were the rest

^a Gen. xix. 1, 2. 'And there came two angels to Sodom at even, and Lot sat in the gate of Sodom; and Lot seeing them rose up to meet them; and he bowed himself with his face toward the ground. And he said, behold now, my lords, turn in, I pray you, into your servant's house, and tarry all night, and wash your feet, and ye shall rise up early, and go on your ways.' The eastern people have always distinguished themselves by their great hospitality. Of very many instances the following is a truly characteristic one:—"We were not above a musket shot from Anna, when we met with a comely old man, who came up to me, and taking my horse by the bridle, 'friend,' said he, 'come and wash thy feet, and eat bread at my house. Thou art a stranger, and since I have met thee upon the road, never refuse me the favour which I desire of thee.' We could not choose but go along with him to his house, where he feasted us in the best manner he could, giving us, over and above, barley for our horses; and for us he killed a lamb and some hens."—Tavernier's Travels, p. 111. See also Gen. xviii. 6. Judges xvii. 7, Rom. xii. 13, 1 Tim. iii. 2, 1 Pet. iv. 9.—Ed.

^b That is, in an unnatural and preposterous manner, which was afterwards expressly forbidden in the law: Lev. xviii. 22, and thereby made capital, ch. xx. 13, which vile sin continued among the Gentiles even in the apostles' time, (as may be gathered from Rom. i. 27, and 1 Cor. vi. 9.) and was so generally practised among the people of Sodom, that from thence it took the name of Sodomy, and the practisers of it are called Sodomites, both in the Holy Scriptures and our English laws, which (as did the law of God of old) do still make the punishment of it to be death.—Honell's History.

^c It is a probable opinion, that these men were struck not with actual blindness, but with a dizziness, which disturbed their sight, and represented objects falsely, and in confusion, in the same manner as the Syrians were, when sent to take Elisha, 2 Kings vi. 18. And this was no hard matter for the angels to do, by making a small alteration either in their sight or in the air, whereby either the door might appear to them like the solid wall, or the several parts of the wall like so many doors.—Poole's Annotations and Le Clerc's Commentary.

^d Several translators, as well as some Rabbins, suppose that these were the husbands of some other of Lot's daughters, who were actually married, and had left their father's house; which seems to be confirmed by the angels ordering him to take his wife, and his two daughters that were there present: but the original words, which in our version are rendered 'his sons-in-law which married his daughters,' may be translated, according to the interpretation of Onkelos 'his sons-in-law which were to marry,' &c., the contract having been passed, but the marriage not consummated by cohabitation.—Universal History, b. 1, c. 4.

^e It is not agreed by commentators what was the crime for which Lot's wife was so severely punished. Some are of opinion that she deserved it, merely for disobeying the commandment of the angel, and expressing too much concern for a people that deserved no compassion. Others say, that being anxiously solicitous for her daughters that were married there, and turning about to see whether they followed her, she saw the divine Shechinah, or majestic appearance of God, descending to destroy the place, which was the occasion of her metamorphosis. Others suppose that, being in concubinage with the Sodomites, she told them that her husband was distracted, and gave them notice, when any strangers came to lodge with him, by a sign of smoke by day, and of fire by night; whilst others again imagine, that the Scripture does not represent the fate which she met with as a punishment for any crime, but as a thing merely accidental.—Universal History, b. 1, c. 4. There is one circumstance, however, in the text, namely, that 'she looked from behind her husband,' whom she followed, which seems to be mentioned as the reason of this her presumption, because she could do it without her husband's observation or reproof; to which she seems to have had a greater regard, than to the all-seeing eye of God.—Poole's Annotations.

^f Gen. xix. 26. 'A pillar of salt;' or, as some understand it, 'an everlasting monument;' whence, perhaps, the Jews have given her the name of Adith (R. Elieser, chap. 25.), because she remained a perpetual testimony of God's just displeasure. For she standing still too long, some of that dreadful shower of brimstone and fire overtook her, and falling upon her, wrapped her body in a sheet of nitro-sulphureous matter, which congealed into a crust as hard as stone, and made her appear like a pillar of salt, her body being, as it were, candied in it. Kimchi calls arrived at Zoar, but the angry heavens began to pour down showers of liquid fire upon Sodom and Gomorrah, and the other wicked cities of the plain, which, within a short time, so totally consumed them, that when Abraham, the next morning, looked towards the country, he saw it all in a smoke, like the smoke of a large furnace.^a

The judgment indeed was so very terrible, that Lot, not thinking himself safe at Zoar, withdrew to the mountains, to which he was first directed, and for want of houses lived there, with his two daughters, in a cave.

it a heap of salt, which the Hebrews say continued for many ages. Their conjecture is not improbable who think the fable of Niobe was derived hence, who, the poets feign, was turned into a stone upon her excessive grief for the death of her children.—Patrick, in locum.—Ed.

a Gen. xix. 24. 'The Lord rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah brimstone and fire.' These cities are said by Moses, on account of their abominable impurities, to have been overwhelmed with a torrent of liquid fire, rained down upon them from heaven. This narrative is equally confirmed by profane historians and by modern travellers. Diodorus Siculus mentions the peculiar nature of the lake which covered the country where these towns were formerly situated. "The water of it is bitter and fetid to the last degree, inasmuch that neither fish nor any other aquatic animals are able to live in it." (Biblical History, b. xix. p. 731.) Tacitus relates that a tradition still prevailed in his days of certain powerful cities having been destroyed by thunder and lightning, and of the plain in which they were situated having been burned up. He adds, that evident traces of such a catastrophe remained. The earth was parched, and had lost all its natural powers of vegetation; and whatever sprung up, either spontaneously or in consequence of being planted, gradually withered away, and crumbled into dust. (Tacit. Hist. b. 5. c. 7.) Strabo, after describing the nature of the lake Asphaltis, adds, that the whole of its appearance gives an air of probability to the prevailing tradition, that thirteen cities, the chief of which was Sodom, were once destroyed and swallowed up by earthquakes, fire, and an inundation of boiling sulphureous water. (Strab. Geog. b. 16.) Maundrell visited the lake Asphaltis in the year 1697, and makes the following observations upon it:—"Being desirous to see the remains, if there were any, of those cities anciently situated in this place, and made so dreadful an example of the divine vengeance, I diligently surveyed the waters as far as my eye could reach; but neither could I discern any heaps of ruins, nor any smoke ascending above the surface of the water, as is usually described in the writings and maps of geographers. But yet I must not omit, what was confidently attested to me by the father-guardian and procurator of Jerusalem, both men in years, and seemingly not destitute either of sense or probity, that they had once actually seen one of these ruins; that it was so near the shore, and the waters so shallow at that time, that they went to it, and found there several pillars, and other fragments of buildings. The cause of our being deprived of this sight was, I suppose, the height of the water." (Travels, p. 85.) The account which Thevenot gives is much to the same purpose. "There is no sort of fish in this sea, by reason of the extraordinary saltiness of it, which burns like fire when one tastes of it. And when the fish of the water Jordan come down so low, they return back again against the stream; and such as are carried into it by the current of the water immediately die. The land within three leagues round is not cultivated, but is white, and mingled with salt and ashes. In short, we must think that there is a heavy curse of God upon that place, seeing it was heretofore so pleasant a country." (Travels, vol. 1. p. 191.) See also Pococké's Travels, vol. 2. p. 1. ch. 9. and Shaw's Travels, p. 346, 4to.—Ed.

The curious Wormius tells of the raining of brimstone, May 16, 1646. "Here, at Copenhagen, when the whole town was overflowed by a great fall of rain, so that the streets became impassable, the air was infected with a sulphureous smell; and when the waters were a little subsided, one might have collected in some places a sulphureous powder, of which I have preserved a part, and which, in colour and every other quality, appeared to be real sulphur."—Mus. Worm. b. 1. c. 2. sec. 1.—Ed.

His daughters had lost their espoused husbands in Sodom; and now despairing of having any other, they plotted together to deceive their father, and have issue by him. The elder was the forwarder of this wicked contrivance; and therefore representing to her sister the condition they were in, she proposed the expedient of making her father drunk with wine; and accordingly one evening they put their project in execution: for, having intoxicated the old man, they put him to bed, and the elder lying with him, without his privity, obtained her end. The next night they employed the same artifice, and the younger had her turn; so that, in the event, they had each of them a son from this incestuous commerce, whereof the elder's was called Moab, and the younger's Ammon, from whom the Moabites and Ammonites, both bitter enemies in after times to Israel, were descended.^b But to return to Abraham.

After the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, he removed from Mamre (probably to avoid the stench of the vale of Siddim), and came and dwelt not far from Gerar, a city of the Philistines, at a place named afterwards Beersheba, between Kadesh and Shur, where the same adventure happened to him which he had met with in Egypt. The king of Gerar, supposing Sarah to be no more than Abraham's sister (for here likewise she passed under that character), notwithstanding her advanced age, saw charms enough in her to invite her unto his bed; but God appeared to him in a dream, and c Gerar was a regal city, situate not far from the angle where the south and west sides of Palestine meet, twenty-five miles from Eleutheropolis, beyond Daroma, in the south of Juda; and the country, to which it gave the name, extended itself pretty far into Arabia Petraea. Beersheba signifies 'the well of the oath,' because here Abraham made a covenant with Abimelech king of Gerar, concerning a well which he had digged hard by. Here he likewise planted a grove, and instituted an oratory, or place of divine worship; and in process of time here was a city or considerable town built, which is taken notice of by heathen authors under the name of Berzima or Bersaba. Kadesh was a city, lying on the edge of the land of Canaan, to the south of Hebron; Shur was the name of that part of Arabia Petraea which joins Egypt and the Red sea; and somewhere between these two was that well near which Abraham, when he left Mamre, fixed his habitation.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 1.

^b Moab settled himself in the parts adjoining eastward to the Salt Sea, or Lacus Asphaltites, and in the neighbouring tract on the river Jordan eastward; for we plainly learn, that great part of the kingdom of Sion, king of the Amorites, did formerly belong to the Moabites, Numb. xxi. 21. Ammon seated himself in the parts adjoining to Moab; for it is evident from Scripture, that the Ammonites were formerly possessed of the parts on the east of Jordan, about the river Jabbok, or of the northern part of that which was afterwards the kingdom of Sion. See Numb. xxi. 13.; Josh. xiii. 25.; and Judg. xi. 13, 23. But these things we shall have occasion to illustrate more fully, when we come to describe the course of the travels of the Israelites out of Egypt into the land of Canaan.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 1.

d Sarah was now ninety years old when Abimelech took her into his family; whence it may seem very strange, that a woman of her age should look so very well, as to be desired by a king, who in those days might have commanded the most youthful beauties in his whole dominions. But, according to some interpreters, people of ninety then were as fresh and vigorous as those of forty now; and Sarah might, even in that respect, excel her coevals, by reason of her sterility, which is a great preserver of beauty; though others are of opinion, that God, having taken away her sterility, her beauty returned with her fruitfulness; for by this time it is computed that she had conceived her son.—Howell's History, b. 1.

threatened him with immediate death, if he did not return her untouched to her husband. Whereupon Abimelech (for that was the common name in those days of all the kings of Palestine) calls for Abraham, and expostulates the matter with him, who, in excuse for the fiction, alleged his fears lest the beauty of his wife should have endangered his life; though it was not altogether a fiction, as he said, because she was so near a relation to him, especially by his father's side, as might properly enough be called a sister.^a This apology pacified the king; so that he not only restored him his wife, but giving her ^b a thousand pieces of silver, desired her ^c to buy a veil with the money, which might

^a Gen. xx. 12. 'And yet indeed she is my sister; she is the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother: and she became my wife.' This peculiar mode of contracting marriage appears, in after ages, to have become a common practice. It prevailed at Athens. It was lawful there to marry a sister by the same mother. Montesquieu (Spirit of Laws, vol. 1. p. 54.) says that this custom was originally owing to republics, whose spirit would not permit that two portions of land, and consequently two inheritances, should devolve on the same person. A man that married his sister only by his father's side, could inherit but one estate, that of his father; but by marrying his sister by the same mother, it might happen that this sister's father, having no male issue, might leave her his estate, and consequently the brother that married her might be possessed of two.

Among the Egyptians, it was lawful for the brother to marry the sister of either of the whole or the half blood, elder or younger; for sometimes brother and sister are born twins. And this license, in process of time, descended also to the Grecians. For the example, drawn from Isis, obtained among the Macedonians. To justify this incestuous use by yet more illustrious examples, the Grecians as well as the Latins say the gods themselves affected such marriages.—Ed.

^b The original word does not so properly mean pieces as weight, because money was then paid by weight; and may, therefore, be interpreted a thousand shekels of silver, that is, about fifty-seven pounds in the value of our present money.—Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 3. c. 4.

^c The words in the text, according to our translation, are these:—'And unto Sarah he said, Behold, I have given to thy brother a thousand pieces of silver; behold, he is to thee a covering of the eyes, unto all that are with thee, and to all others: thus she was reproved.' Where we must observe, in the first place, that the word which we render reprove, does more properly signify to instruct, which must certainly be the right sense of the word here, considering that Abimelech had already accepted of Abraham's apology, and was so far from irritating either him or Sarah by reproaches, that, on the contrary, he was endeavouring to win their friendship with very considerable presents. But then, as to the covering of Sarah's eyes, this may be variously expounded, according as the words refer either to Abraham or to the pieces of silver. If they refer to Abraham, then the meaning of the king's words will be, 'Thou needest no other defence of chastity than he; nor hast thou any reason hereafter to say, he is thy brother; for so dear is he to God, that God will defend him, and he will defend thee; and not only him, but all that are with thee, and that even among strangers, without any such shifts and equivocations as you have hitherto thought fit to make use of.' But if the words refer to a present of a thousand pieces, then the sense must be, 'I have given him that sum of money to buy thee a veil, that all who converse with thee here, or in any other country where thou shalt come, may know thee to be a married woman.' This sense, indeed, is countenanced by the LXX.; but others have thought that it might better be rendered thus:—'This money, which I have paid thy husband as a mulet for my having endeavoured to take thee from him, will be a means to deter all others from having any concern with thee, when once they shall hear how much I have suffered upon that account.' The reader is left to his own option; but we should rather think that the last of these interpretations is preferable.—Patrick and Le Clerc's Commentary.

not only be a covering to her face, but in every country an indication likewise of her being a married woman, because he held it inconvenient for her any more to pass for her husband's sister. On her husband he bestowed, in like manner, plenty of other kind of wealth, and made him a free offer to live where he pleased in his dominions; which generous treatment engaged Abraham to intercede with God^d to remove the disability which he had inflicted on the king, in order to restrain him from Sarah; and to restore the queen and the other women of the nation to their wonted fertility, which for some time seems to have been obstructed.

A year was now passed, and the time appointed come when Sarah brought forth a son, whom Abraham, according to the divine direction, called Isaac, and circumcised him the eighth day. They were now in the zenith of their happiness. Sarah suckled the child herself, and ^e weaned him at the usual time; and Abraham upon this joyful occasion made a great feast: but in the midst of their festivity, Sarah perceiving that Ishmael treated her son with contempt and derision, was so enraged against him, that she never ceased importuning her husband to turn both mother and son out of doors. Abraham had the tenderness of a father to his child. He loved Ishmael, and was loth to part with him; and therefore applied himself to God, in this arduous juncture, for direction. But God confirming what Sarah had requested, and promising moreover to make of Ishmael (because he was his son) a populous nation, though his portion and inheritance was not to be in that land, which was all along designed for the descendants of Isaac, he was at last prevailed on to send him and his mother away. ^f

Calling Hagar therefore, one morning to him, he ordered her to take her son, some water, and other provisions with her, to go into the neighbouring wilderness, and to tarry by the side of a certain fountain she would meet with there, until she should hear farther from him.

^d The text tells us, that 'God had fast closed up all the wombs' of the house of Abimelech; which phrase in Scripture does frequently denote barrenness; but that it cannot do so here, is pretty plain from hence, that the history of this transaction is of too short a continuance to give space for a discovery of this kind, namely, whether the women, by God's infliction, were become actually barren or not. And therefore the other opinion, noticed in note ^f, p. 144, is more probable.

^e It is not easy to guess how long it was that women gave suck in those days, because the ancient Hebrews are divided about it: some affirming that Isaac was weaned when he was two, some five, and others not till he was twelve years old. If however we will judge by what the young Maccabee's mother said to him, 'My son, remember I have suckled thee three years,' 2 Macc. vii. 27. that time will appear the most probable. For there is no reason to believe that Isaac was weaned before the usual term, for want of care or affection in his mother.—Patrick's Commentaries, and Universal History, b. 1. c. 7.

^f Gen. xxi. 10. 'Wherefore she said unto Abraham, cast out this bond woman and her son; for the son of this bond woman shall not be heir with my son.' The following extract will exhibit to the reader a striking similarity of practice with that to which the above cited passage alludes, and that amongst a race of people very remote, both as to local situation and time. 'The Algonquins make a great distinction between the wife to whom they give the appellation of the entrance of the hut, and those whom they term of the middle of the hut; these last are the servants of the other, and their children are considered as bastards, and of inferior rank to those which are born of the first and legitimate wife. Among the Caribs also, one wife possesses rank and distinction above the rest.'—Babie's Travels among Savage Nations, in Universal Magazine, for Feb. 1802, p. 84.—Ed.

She did as she was ordered; but mistaking their way, and missing of the fountain, they had quite exhausted the little water they had, and her son being in a high fever, and ready to die with thirst, to shade him a little from the scorching heat, she placed him under a tree, whilst herself, despairing to find any succour in the place, and not bearing to see him expire before her eyes, withdrew a little, and began to bemoan her hard fate, while with earnest cries and tears, she was imploring the divine help and commiseration. The divine help was not long a coming; for suddenly an angel from heaven bids the weeping mother dry up her tears, and fear not; tells her, that God had heard the child's prayer, and would make of him a great nation; and, for their present relief, points to her a well of water, which she had not perceived before; and directs her how to cure her son. Refreshed with this water, and supported with other things which Abraham (very probably) from time to time might send them; instead of going into Egypt, as they first intended, they here took up their abode in the wilderness of Paran, where Ishmael, in a short time growing a very expert archer, was able to get provisions both for himself and his mother; and when he grew up unto man's estate, his mother, who was herself an Egyptian, married him to a woman of her own country, by whom he had twelve sons, who dwelt from Havilah unto Shur, that is, in several parts of Arabia Petraea, whereof the western part, towards Egypt, is in Scripture called Shur, and the eastern part towards the Persian gulf, Havilah.^a

Abraham, in the mean time, having accepted of Abimelech's offer, continued to live in the land of Palestine, and, as his riches and power every day increased, Abimelech, fearing lest, at some time or other, he might attempt something in prejudice of him, or his successors in the government, came with the general of his forces, whose name was Phicol, and made a solemn league of friendship with him.^b Some^c little difference had

^a The names of these sons are Nabajoth, Kedar, Adheel, Mibsam, Mishma, Dumah, Massa, Hadar, Tema, Jethur, Naphish, and Kedemah, 'twelve princes according to their nations,' Gen. xxv. 13, &c.; and as their descendants were, from their father, denominated by the common name of Ishmaelites, so from Hagar, the mother of Ishmael, they are also called Hagarens, or Hagarites, under which name we find some footsteps of them in heathen authors; but certain it is, that the Arabians do, to this very day, value themselves upon their being descended from Ishmael.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 1.

^b Gen. xxi. 23. 'Swear unto me here by God.' This kind of oath appears not only to have been generally in use in the time of Abraham, but also to have descended through many generations and ages in the east. When Mr Bruce was at Shekh Ammer, he entreated the protection of the governor in prosecuting his journey. Speaking of the people who were assembled together at this time in the house, he says, (Travels, vol. 1. p. 248.) "The great people among them came, and, after joining hands, repeated a kind of prayer, of about two minutes long, by which they declared themselves and their children accursed, if ever they lifted up their hands against me in the tell, or field in the desert; or in case that I, or mine, should fly to them for refuge; if they did not protect us at the risk of their lives, their families, and their fortunes, or, as they emphatically expressed it, to the death of the last male child among them."—See also Gen. xxvi. 28, 29.—Ed.

^c It will not seem strange that Abraham should look upon the losing of a well as a matter of such consequence, considering how ill furnished these eastern countries were with water; and it was highly prudent of him to complain of grievances now, before he entered into covenant with Abimelech, that they being once arisen between Abimelech's servants and Abraham's, about a well which Abraham's servants had digged. But after a little expostulation, they quickly came to a good understanding. The well was restored to Abraham, and the place where they entered into this solemn covenant was thenceforth called Beersheba. Here Abraham, intending to end his days, unless God should otherwise dispose of him, planted a grove for a place of religious worship, and built an altar, and called on 'the name of the Lord, the everlasting God,' who was minded^d to make one trial more of his faith and fidelity, and a severe trial it was.

God had ordered him to send away Ishmael, and given him assurance, that the blessings promised to his posterity were not to take place in any part of that branch of his family, but that Isaac should be the son of the promise, and his descendants heirs of that happiness and prosperity which he had made over to him; and now he was pleased to require him with his own hands, to destroy this his son, his only son Isaac. A cruel injunction! But Abraham, we see, never stayed to expostulate about the severity or unlawfulness of it; but on the very next morning, without saying a word to any of his family, gets all things ready, and leaving it to God to make good his own promises, resolves to obey.^e redressed, there might remain no occasion of quarrel afterwards.—Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. 1.—Wells of water were of great consequence in those hot countries, especially where the flocks were numerous; because water was scarce, and digging to find it was attended with much expense of time and labour. In Arabia, the wells are generally dug in the rocks; their mouths are about six feet in diameter, and they are from nineteen to twenty feet in depth, (but many of them, says Niebuhr, are 160 to 170 feet deep.) Strife between the different villagers and the different herdsmen here, exists still, as in the days of Abraham and Lot; the country has often changed masters; but the habits of the natives both in this and other respects, have been nearly stationary.—Dr Richardson's Travels, vol. 2. p. 196.—Ed.

^d The words in the text are, 'that God did tempt Abraham;' but God is said to tempt no man; and therefore all that he could be supposed to do in this case, was only to make trial of him; and that too, not to inform himself of the sincerity and steadiness of his faith, but in order to the holy patriarch's own justification, and to make him an illustrious pattern of an entire dependence on the Almighty, to future saints and confessors. The Jews reckon up ten trials of Abraham, of which the last was the greatest. 1. God's command to him to leave his country. 2. The famine which forced him to go into Egypt. 3. Pharaoh's taking his wife from him. 4. His war with the four kings. 5. His despair of having Isaac by Sarah, and marrying Hagar on that account. 6. His circumcision in his old age. 7. His wife's being again taken from him by Abimelech. 8. The expulsion of Hagar when she was with child by him. 9. His expulsion of her and Ishmael. And 10. His oblation of his only son Isaac.—Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. 1.

^e Gen. xxii. 3. 'Saddled his ass.' There is no ground for supposing that the ancient eastern saddles were like our modern ones. Such were not known to the Greeks and Romans till many ages after the Hebrew judges. "No nation of antiquity knew the use of either saddles or stirrups." (Goguet's Origin of Laws, vol. 3. p. 172. English Edit.) and even in our own times Hasselquist, when at Alexandria, says, "I procured an equipage which I had never used before; it was an ass with an Arabian saddle, which consisted only of a cushion on which I could sit, and a handsome bridle." (Travels, p. 52.) But even the cushion seems an improvement upon the ancient eastern saddles, which were probably nothing more than a kind of rug girdled to the beast.—Parkhurst's Heb. Lex. p. 213.

Instead of saddles the ancients used a kind of housing or horse cloth which the Greeks called sagè and the Latins sagum. This housing is to be seen upon the horses represented on Trajan's pillar, and in many other monuments of antiquity.—Ed.

To that purpose, taking his son Isaac with him, and some servants, with provisions and instruments proper for the sacrifice, he sets out; and ^a in three days' time, came within sight of ^b mount Moriah, the place which God had appointed for that dreadful scene. Here, leaving his servants behind, that they might not disturb him with their intercessions or lamentations, he goes up to the mount without betraying any sign of grief or concern that might raise a suspicion in his son. His son, on the other hand, laden with the wood, and the other materials for a burnt-offering, but perceiving nothing proper for a victim, could not forbear asking his father, where it was? Such a question, at such a time, was enough to have staggered any heart less firm than Abraham's, who only answered calmly, 'That God would provide himself with one,' little thinking how prophetically he spake: for he had no sooner bound his son upon the wood, ^c and stretched out his hand to give the fatal blow, ^d but God was pleased to stop him short by a voice from heaven, forbidding him to do it, ^e and

^a The better to explain how Abraham came to know the place which God had appointed, the Jews have a tradition, that when God bade him go thither, and offer his son, he asked how he should know it? To which the answer was, that wheresoever he should see the glory of the Lord, that should be the place; and that accordingly, when he came within sight of mount Moriah, he beheld a pillar of fire, reaching from the earth to the heavens, whereby he knew that that was the place.—Holtingeri Historia Orient. p. 36.

^b This mountain whereon Abraham was ordered to offer his son Isaac, was certainly the same on which the temple was afterwards built by Solomon, and on part of which, namely, mount Calvary, Christ did afterwards actually offer himself unto God for the redemption of mankind; which offering of his, as it seems to have been designedly prefigured by the intentional offering of Isaac, so it might seem good to Divine reason to assign the same for the typical offering of Isaac, where in due time, the Antitype, our Redeemer, was to be offered. But instead of Moriah, the Samaritans read Moreh, and pretend that God sent Abraham towards Sechem, where certainly was Moreh (Gen. xii. 6: and Deut. xi. 30.); and that it was upon mount Gerizim that Isaac was brought in order to be sacrificed. But this, in all probability, is no more than a contrivance to enhance the glory of their temple.—Wells's Geography; and Cabnet's History.

^c The words of God are, 'Lay not thy hand on the child, neither do thou anything unto him,' Gen. xxii. 12; and yet in Heb. xi. 17, we are told, 'that Abraham offered up Isaac when he was tried.' But this is easily reconciled, if we do but remember that God always takes that for done (whether in the commission of sin, or performance of duty) where there is a will and intention to do it, supposing the person to have an opportunity.—Street's dividing the Hoof.

^d Gen. xxii. 9. 'And bound Isaac his son.' Both his hands and his feet, as it is explained in R. Elieser, c. 31. When the Gentiles offered human sacrifices, they tied both their hands behind their backs.—Ovid. l. 3. De Pont. Elvg. 2. Patrick, in locum.—En.

^e The words in the beginning of the chapter are, 'that God tempted Abraham,' bidding him to go and sacrifice his son; but in ver. 11. it is said, that the angel of the Lord forbade him to do it: from whence some may infer, that Abraham obeyed the angel, who bade him spare his son, against the command of God, who bade him slay him. But to solve this difficulty, (if it be thought any,) we must observe, that whenever the Holy Scriptures tell us, that God said any thing, or that an angel spake, we are always to understand both of them to have been present; for the angels ever attend upon the Divine Majesty, and, being his ministers, do nothing but by his order: so that when he is said to speak, it is by them; and when they are said to speak, it is from him. It is the Lord, therefore, that speaks, whosoever be the minister.—Patrick's Commentary. And the speech which God makes to Abraham, upon this weighty occasion, the Jewish historian comments upon in this manner: "Hold thy declaring a satisfaction in this last test of his obedience. Surprised at the voice, Abraham turns about to see whence it came, and spies a ram caught by the horns in a thick bush, which he immediately took, and offered up for a burnt-offering instead of his son; and, in memory of the whole transaction, called the place where it was done Jehovah-jireh, in allusion to the answer which he gave to his son's question, 'God will provide himself a lamb.'

Thus having performed an act of such perfect and heroic obedience as engaged God to renew his promise with great amplifications, and to confirm it to him with an oath, he went and rejoined his servants; and returning to Beersheba, was no sooner arrived, but he was welcomed with the joyful news of the increase of his family, namely, that Milcah, his brother Nahor's wife, ^f had born him a numerous issue, which ^g determined him, at a proper time, to send thither for a wife for his son Isaac; but ^h before he did that, it happened that his own wife Sarah died, in the 127th year of her age, at Kirjatharba, afterwards called Hebron, in the country of Canaan.

ⁱ Abraham was then probably at Beersheba; but being informed of her death, he came to Hebron, there to mourn, and perform his last offices for her; but what he wanted was a convenient burying-place. He therefore addressed himself to the people, assembled in a body ^j at hand, and spare thy son, for I did not require it of thee, out of any delight I take in human blood, or that I would make a father the assassin of the very child which I myself have given him; but to see how far thou wouldst submit to thy God in a self-denial to thine own inclination and nature: but now, since I find thy piety to be proof against all temptations, I do here confirm over again to thee all my former promises," &c.—Joseph. Antiq. b. 1. c. 14.

^f The children of Nahor by Milcah were Huz, Buz, Kemuel, Cizeed, Hazo, Pildash, Jidaph, and Bethuel, who begat Rebecca, the wife of Isaac; and by his concubine, whose name was Reumah, he had Tebah, Gaham, Thahash, and Maachah, from whom the city of Maachah, or Abel-Beth-Maachah, whose territories are supposed to have been situate between the two Lebanon, might probably receive its name, Gen. xxii. 20, &c.

^g Nahor very probably either removed with his father Terah, as Abraham did, from Ur in Chaldaea, and settled at Haran in Mesopotamia, or not long after followed them thither; because, after that the family left Ur, the first news that we hear of him is, that he was settled at Haran, and there had got a numerous family; and it is upon the account of his brother's residing there, as well as that himself had once lived there, that Abraham calls it his 'own country,' and the place 'where his kindred dwelt,' Gen. xxiv. 4.

^h Some of the Arabian writers tell us, that when Sarah heard that Abraham had taken her only son unto the mountain, to sacrifice to God, she fell into a very great agony, which brought on a fit of sickness whereof she died. Eutychie's Annales, p. 74. Josephus, indeed, informs us that she died soon after this event; but if (as he says) Isaac was five and twenty years old when his father would have sacrificed him, Sarah was ninety years old when she bore him, and 127 when she died, she must (according to his own calculation) have lived eleven or twelve years after it, and this our learned Usher makes the difference between his sacrifice and her death.—Cabnet's Dictionary.

ⁱ There is something of obscurity in this passage of the history. Sarah is said to have died at Hebron; and yet we have no notice of Abraham removing from Beersheba to that place; so that, upon some occasion or other, we must suppose them to have been parted, and that Sarah went to Hebron, while Abraham kept still in his own habitation: for to say that Abraham came from his own tent to that of his wife, to make lamentation for her, is not consistent with the sequel of the text.

^j The gates of the cities in these days, and for many ages after, the gate of the city, entreating them to allow him the liberty of burying his wife among them; for as he was a stranger in the country, and had no land then of his own, he could pretend to no right of giving honourable interment to his dead in the sepulchres of the country, without the consent of the proprietors. He therefore desired Ephron, one of the principal inhabitants,^a to sell him the field called Machpelah,^b with the cave and sepulchre belonging to it. The purchase was made before all the people of Hebron,^c at the price of 400 shekels of silver, that is, about sixty pounds sterling;^d and there he buried Sarah, after that he had mourned for her,^e according to the custom of the country.

were the places of judicature, and common resort. Here the governors and elders of the city met to hear complaints, administer justice, and make conveyances of titles and estates, and, in short, to transact all the public affairs of the place. And from hence is that passage in the Psalmist, 'They shall not be ashamed when they speak to their enemies in the gate,' Ps. cxxvii. ver. ult. that is, when they are accused by them before the court of magistrates. It is probable that the room or hall where these magistrates sat was over the gate, because Boaz is said to go up to the gate; and the reason of having it built there, seems to have been for the conveniency of the inhabitants, who being all husbandmen, and forced to pass and repass every morning and evening, as they went and came from their labour, might be more easily called as they went by, whenever they wanted to appear in any business. So that from the whole it appears that Abraham could not have made his purchase from Ephron, without his having recourse to the city gates.—Universal History, b. I. c. 7.

^a It is an observation of all those who have written about the sepulture of the ancients, that their dormitories or burying-places were never in cities, much less in temples or churches, but always in the fields or gardens. The use of grottos or vaults is certainly very ancient.—Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. 1.

^b The word in Hebrew signifies double, whence it is supposed by some, that there was one cave within another, or two or more contiguous to each other, in one of which Sarah was buried, and afterwards Abraham in another. But those who derive it from the Arabic tell us, that in that language it signifies shut up, or walled up, which, in eastern countries, was a common way of making their tombs, to prevent thieves from harbouring in them, or to hinder them from being in any manner violated or profaned. And if this be the right derivation, then may the cave of Machpelah be translated the cave that was shut up.—Cabnet's Dictionary.

^c Gen. xxiii. 11. 'In the presence of the sons of my people.' Contracts, or grants, were usually made before all the people, or their representatives, till writings were invented.—Patrick, in locum.—Et.

^d Gen. xxiii. 16. 'And Abraham weighed to Ephron the silver.' Ancient nations have discovered a singular coincidence in the management of their money. The Jews appear to have used silver in lumps, perhaps of various dimensions and weights; and certainly, on some occasions at least, impressed with a particular stamp. The Chinese also do the same. For "there is no silver coin in China, notwithstanding payments are made with that metal, in masses of about ten ounces, having the form of the crucibles they were refined in, with the stamp of a single character upon them, denoting their weight."—Macartney, p. 290, vol. 2, p. 266, 8vo edition.—Et.

^e What the rites of mourning for the dead in those days were, it is hard to determine, because we have as yet no particulars of it recorded in Scripture. From the subsequent practice, however, we may infer, that they shut themselves up from company, neglected the care of their bodies, and abstained from their ordinary food. They fasted, and lay upon the ground; they wept, tore their clothes, smote their breasts, went barefoot, and pulled off their hair and beards. The time of mourning was usually for seven days; but it was commonly lengthened or shortened, according to the state or circumstances wherein they found themselves; and, during this period, they did not dress themselves, nor make their beds, nor cover their heads, nor shave themselves, nor cut their nails, nor go into the bath, nor salute any body, nay, nor so

By this time Abraham was well advanced in years; and being desirous to see his son Isaac married, and settled in the world before he died, he called Eliezer, the steward of his household, and J having taking an oath of him g (in case he died first) to procure his son a wife of his own kindred,^h and not of the Canaanites, he sent him into Mesopotamia, with full instructions and authority to conclude the marriage, and with a train suitable to such an embassy.

Eliezer, in coming to Haran, the place where his master's relations dwelt, stopped at the public well (whither it was customary for the young women of the place to come every morning and evening for water) to rest, and refresh his camels;ⁱ and being pensive and solicitous how to perform his message to his master's satisfaction, much as read the book of the law, or say their usual prayers.—Patrick's Commentary, and Cabnet's Dictionary, under the word Mourning.

^f The form in which Eliezer took his oath was, we are told, by putting his hand under his master's thigh. This is the first time we read of that ceremony, which was afterwards used by Jacob and Joseph when they were a dying, and the oddness of it has inclined some judicious authors to think, that it implies a more solemn mystery than men are aware of. Some suppose that it was swearing by the Messias, (who was to come out of Abraham's loins or thigh, Gen. lvi. 26.) others, by the covenant of circumcision, the part circumcised being near the thigh. But the most probable conjecture is, that as it could not well be done but in a kneeling posture, so it was a token of subjection and homage from a servant to his lord, he sitting, and his servant putting his hand under him; and thereby implicitly declaring, I am under your power, and ready to do whatever you shall think fit to command me. The custom, however, afterwards, in swearing, was 'to lift up the hand to heaven,' Gen. xiv. 22, and upon account of both these ceremonies, the Greek word ὄρκος, which signifies an oath, is supposed to be derived from the Hebrew jereck, a thigh, as the word ἵμνω, to swear, is supposed to come from the Hebrew jamîn, which is the right hand.—Ainsworth's Annotations.

^g Gen. xxiv. 2, 3. 'And Abraham said unto his eldest servant of his house, that ruled over all that he had, put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh, and I will make thee swear by the Lord.' The present mode of swearing among the Mohammedan Arabs, that live in tents as the patriarchs did, according to De la Roque—(Voy. dans la Pal. p. 152)—is by laying their hands on the Koran. They cause those who swear to wash their hands before they give them the book; they put their left hand underneath, and the right over it. Whether, among the patriarchs one hand was under, and the other upon the thigh, is not certain; possibly Abraham's servant might swear, with one hand under his master's thigh, and the other stretched out to heaven. As the posterity of the patriarchs are described as coming out of the thigh, it has been supposed this ceremony had some relation to their believing the promise of God, to bless all the nations of the earth, by means of one that was to descend from Abraham.—Harmer, vol. 1, p. 477.—Et.

^h Not but that Laban and his family were idolaters, as well as the Canaanites, but then he was much better than they, because he still retained the worship of the true God, as appears from the sequel of the history, (ch. xxiv. 37.) though blended and corrupted with very gross mixtures and additions of his own; whereas the Canaanites had utterly revolted from it.—Grat. Por.

ⁱ Gen. xxiv. 11. 'At the time of the evening, even the time that women go out to draw water.' Homer mentions the same custom of women being employed in drawing water among the Phœacians and Læstrygonians.—(Odys. vii. 20, et x. 105.; Iliad. vi. 459.)—Dr Shaw, speaking of the occupation of the Moorish women in Barbary, says, "To finish the day, at the time of the evening, even at the time that the women go out to draw water, they are still to fit themselves with a pitcher or goat skin, and their sucking children behind them, trudge it in this manner two or three miles to fetch water."—(Travels, p. 424.)—Mr Forbes (Oriental Memoirs, vol. 1, p. 79) likewise mentions the practice of women drawing water, and tending cattle to the lakes and rivers.—Et.

he made a mental prayer to God, that he would be pleased to give this token of the successfulness of his journey, namely, That the person designed for his young master's wife might discover it by some token of courtesy to him. In the mean time ^a Rebecca came to the well; ^b and when Eliezer desired her to give him a draught of her water, she offered her service, not only to draw for him, but for his camels likewise, which (being the very sign he requested of God) he permitted her to do, for his fuller conviction. ^c

While he saw her thus employed, he took notice that the damsel was exceeding beautiful; and having inquired into her relations and family, he found that she was his master's brother's grand-daughter: whereupon he immediately took out a pair of gold ear-rings, to the weight of two shekels, and a pair of bracelets, which weighed about ten, with which he presented her, desiring, at the same time, that if they had any room at her house he might be permitted to lodge there that night. ^d Her answer was, that that he might do very conveniently; and so accepting of the presents, she made haste home to acquaint the family with this adventure, leaving Eliezer full of contemplations and acknowledgments to the divine favour, for this happy, surprisngly happy incident.

^a Great were the simplicity and humility of those early days, when persons of the best rank, and of the female sex too, did not disdain to be employed in such servile offices. Thus, in the following age, Jacob found his cousin Rachel watering her father's sheep; and several ages after that, the seven daughters of Jethro, who was a prince, as well as a priest of Midian, kept their father's flocks, and used to draw water for the cattle. So well has our author expressed that simplicity of manners, which we may observe in Homer, or Hesiod, or any of the most ancient writers.—Howell's History, b. 1.

^b Gen. xxiv. 15. 'Rebecca came out, with her pitcher upon her shoulder.' The same custom prevailed in ancient Greece. Homer represents Minerva meeting Ulysses as the sun was going down, under the form of a Phœacian virgin, carrying a pitcher of water, that being the time when the maidens went out to draw water.

"When near the fam'd Phœacian walls he drew,
The beautiful city, opening to his view,
His step a virgin met, and stood before;
A polished urn the seeming virgin bore."

Odyssey, b. vii. 25, Pope.

See also Odyssey, b. x. 105.

A similar custom prevailed also in Armenia, as may be seen in Xenophon's Anabasis, b. iv.—Ed.

^c Gen. xxiv. 20. 'And she hastened, and emptied her pitcher into the trough.' In some places where there are wells, there are no conveniences to draw water with. But in other places the wells are furnished with troughs, and suitable contrivances for watering cattle. The M. S. Chardin tells us, that "there are wells in Persia and Arabia in the driest places, and, above all, in the Indies, with troughs and basins of stone by the side of them." Gen. xvi. 14. Exod. ii. 16.—Harmer, vol. 1. p. 431.—Ed.

^d Gen. xxiv. 22. 'And it came to pass as the camels had done drinking, that the man took a golden ear-ring of half a shekel weight, and two bracelets for her hands of ten shekels weight, of gold.' The weight of the ornaments put upon Rebecca appears extraordinary. But Chardin assures us, that even heavier were worn by the women of the east when he was there. He says that the women wear rings and bracelets of as great weight as this, through all Asia, and even heavier. They are rather manacles than bracelets. There are some as large as the finger. The women wear several of them, one above the other, in such a manner as sometimes to leave the arm covered with them from the wrist to the elbow. Poor people wear as many of glass or horn. They hardly ever take them off. They are their riches.—Harmer, vol. 2. p. 500.—Ed.

As soon as Laban had heard what his sister had to tell him, he went immediately, and inviting the stranger into his house, ordered all proper provision to be made for the civil reception both of himself and his retinue. At his first introduction, Eliezer opened to the family the occasion of his coming; acquainted them with the success that had attended him in his journey; and gave them a full account of the circumstances of his master's family; of the wealth and prosperity wherewith God had blessed him; of the son and heir which he had given him in his old age; and of the large expectancies which this heir had, not only from the prerogative of his birth, but from the donation and entail of all his father's possessions. And, having in this manner delivered his credentials, he demanded immediately, even before he did either eat or drink with them, their positive answer.

^e Laban and Bethuel were both of opinion, that the divine providence was very visible in this whole affair; and therefore concluding, that it would be mighty wrong to refuse Rebecca upon this occasion, they consented that he should carry her to her intended husband as soon as he pleased: so that matters being thus far agreed on, he thought it now proper to present her with the jewels of silver and gold, and fine raiment which he had brought for her; ^f and he having at the same time made some considerable presents to her mother, and brethren, the remainder of the day they devoted to feasting and mirth. In the morning Eliezer, who began to think the time long till his master was acquainted with the good success of his negotiation, desired to be dismissed. The request a little startled them. They promised themselves, that at least he would stay ten days longer: but he persisting

^e This Bethuel could not be her father, because, had he been so, it would have been improper to have had Laban, either named before him, or giving answer to Abraham's messenger when his father was by; and, therefore, since Josephus makes the damsel tell Eliezer that her father had been dead long ago, and that she was left to the care of her brother Laban, this Bethuel, who is here named after Laban, and is never more taken notice of during the whole transaction, must have been some younger brother of the family.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 7.

^f Gen. xxiv. 53. "Jewels of gold and raiment." Among the several female ornaments which Abraham sent by his servant, whom he employed to search out a wife for his son Isaac, were 'jewels of silver, and jewels of gold,' exclusive of raiment, which probably was very rich and valuable for the age in which Abraham lived. Rich and splendid apparel, especially such as was adorned with gold, was very general in the eastern nations from the earliest ages; and as the fashions and customs of the Orientals are not subject to much variation, so we find that this propensity to golden ornaments prevails, even in the present age, among the females in the countries bordering on Judea. Thus Mango Park, in the account of his travels in Africa, mentions the following singular circumstance, respecting the ornamental part of the dress of an African lady: "It is evident from the account of the process by which negroes obtain gold in Manding, that the country contains a considerable portion of this precious metal. A great part is converted into ornaments for the women; and, when a lady of consequence is in full dress, the gold about her person may be worth, altogether, from fifty to eighty pound's sterling."

We find also that the same disposition for rich ornamental apparel prevailed in the times of the Apostles; for St Peter cautioned the females of quality in the first ages of Christianity, when they adorned themselves, not to have it consist, 'in the outward adorning, of plaiting the hair, and of wearing gold, or of putting on apparel.' 1 Pet. iii. 3. See also Psalm xlv. 9, 13. 'Upon thy right hand did stand the queen, in gold of Ophir. Her clothing is of wrought gold.—Ed.

in his resolution, the thing was referred to Rebecca, who consented to go with him as soon as he pleased: so that all things being presently made ready, and having ^a the bridal blessing bestowed upon her, she took her leave and departed, with her nurse, ^b (whose name was Deborah,) and other servants appointed to attend her.

Whilst Eliezer was conveying his fair charge to his master's house, Providence had so ordered the matter, that Isaac, taking a solitary walk in the fields that evening, happened to espy his servants and camels upon the road, and thereupon went forwards to meet them. As soon as Rebecca was informed who he was, she alighted, and ^c throwing her veil over her face (as the manner of women then was) she waited to receive his first compliments. ^d Isaac, with great respect, addressed himself to her, and conducted her into his mother's tent, which was fitted up for her apartment. Not long after they were married together, and Isaac grew so fond of her, that the love he had for his wife helped to alleviate

^a The blessing is comprised in these words: 'Be thou a mother of thousands of millions, and let thy seed possess the gate of those that hate them;' which was afterwards made a solemn form of benediction in leading the bride to the bridegroom.

Gen. xxiv. 60. 'And they blessed Rebecca.' Nuptial benedictions were used both by the Jews, Greeks, and Romans. That of the Jews was in this form—"Blessed be thou, O Lord, who hast created man and woman, and created marriage," &c. This was repeated every day during the marriage week, provided there were new guests.—Ed.

^b Gen. xxiv. 59. 'And they sent away Rebecca their sister, and her nurse.' Nurses were formerly held in very high esteem, and considered as being entitled to constant and lasting regard. "The nurse in an eastern family is always an important personage. Modern travellers inform us, that in Syria she is considered as a sort of second parent, whether she has been foster-mother or otherwise. She always accompanies the bride to her husband's house, and ever remains there, an honoured character. Thus it was in ancient Greece."—Siege of Acre, b. 2. p. 35, note.

In Hindostan the nurse "is not looked upon as a stranger, but becomes one of the family, and passes the remainder of her life in the midst of the children she has suckled, by whom she is honoured and cherished as a second mother."—Forbes's Oriental Memoirs, vol. 3. p. 134.

"In many parts of Hindostan are mosques and mausoleums, built by the Mahomedan princes, near the sepulchres of their nurses. They are excited by a grateful affection to erect these structures, in memory of those who, with maternal anxiety, watched over their helpless infancy; thus it has been from time immemorial. How interesting is the interview which Homer has described between Ulysses and Euryeia."—Id. 3. p. 141.—Ed.

^c The use of the veil was the universal practice among all nations, as far as history can inform us, except the Spartans, who are reported to have been singular, in that their virgins were permitted to appear without a veil, but after they were married, they were never to be seen in public without it. It was from this practice of veiling the bride, when she was brought to the bridegroom, in token both of modesty and subjection, that the presents which he made her upon this occasion, were by the Greeks called ἀνακαλυπτήρια; and thus the poets, in celebrating the marriage of Proserpine to Pluto, have this fiction—That, upon unveiling his bride, he presented her with the island of Sicily, in lieu of her veil, which he took from her.—Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. 1.

^d It may seem a little strange, that upon so singular an occasion no mention should be made of Abraham, who was a principal party concerned herein; but for this some account by supposing that Abraham, before this, had married Keturah (though, not to break in with the account of his son's marriage, the history relates it later) and resigned his estate, and the government of his family, into the hands of Isaac, choosing to live the remainder of his days in retirement with his new consort.

the grief he had long conceived for the loss of his mother.

After this happy marriage of his son, Abraham still finding himself strong enough to make a new addition to his family, took another wife, ^a whose name was Keturah, by whom he had six sons; but lest they should interfere with Isaac in his inheritance of Canaan, as they grew up, he portioned them off, and sent them away towards the east, where, settling in Arabia and Syria, they became in time heads of different nations; whereof we have footsteps both in sacred and profane history.

This is the substance of what the sacred history relates concerning the great patriarch Abraham. ^g At length, laden with honours and outworn with age, after he had lived the space of an hundred and seventy-five years, he took leave of this world; and by his two sons, Ishmael and Isaac, was buried in the cave of Machpelah (where, above forty years before, he had reposed the remains of his beloved wife Sarah), leaving a name famous to all posterity behind him.

^e Keturah is supposed, by some Jewish interpreters, to be the same with Hagar, whom Abraham, after his wife's death, sent for again, and by her had all the six sons here mentioned: but, besides that Hagar must by this time have been above eighty years of age, and consequently too old to bear so many children, the text itself seems to be against this supposition; for it informs us, that Abraham added, or proceeded to take another wife, which is a different thing to his recalling the old one. The more probable opinion therefore is, that this Keturah was a domestic of his own, a Canaanite perhaps, whom he had converted to the true religion; but then the difficulty is, how Abraham could dispose of so many sons, in so short a space as that which intervened between his wife's and his own death. To solve this, some have supposed that this Keturah became his wife, that is, wife of the second order, long before the death of Sarah, even immediately after he parted with Hagar; but then this supposition is contrary to the sense of the original; and therefore, if we are minded to adhere to that, we must say, that Abraham's living almost forty years after Sarah's death gave him time enough to dispose of the sons begotten of Keturah, as the renovation of his strength, which was certainly miraculous, (for forty years before he is said to have been dead to all such purposes, Rom. vi. 19.) enabled him to beget them.—Calmet's Dictionary, Ainsworth's Annotations, and Universal History, b. 1. c. 7.

^f His sons were, Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah, whereof Jokshan had Sheba and Dedan; Dedan had Asshurim, Letushim, and Leummim; and Midian had Ephlah, Epher, Hanoeh, Abidah, and Eldaah, Gen. xxv. 2, &c. And the footsteps we find of these in history, according to the best conjectures, are such as follow. From Zimran, in all probability, were descended the Zamarens, a people mentioned by Pliny (Natural History, b. 6. c. 28.) From Sheba, the Sabæans, mentioned in Job i. 15. From Dedan, the Dedanim, mentioned in Isaiah xxi. 13. From Midian, the Midianites, mentioned in several places. From Shuah, the Shuities, mentioned in Job ii. 11. From Ephlah, was a town of the same name, mentioned by Isaiah ix. 6. From Hanoeh, a country called Canaana, mentioned by Pliny (Natural History, b. 6. c. 28.) And, to name no more, from Medan, a country called Mediana, in which is the famous city of Mecca, where Mahomet was born.—Bedford's Chronology, b. 3. c. 4. and Wells's Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 1.

^g This account of Abraham's death is given by way of anticipation: for when the text has recited his sons and their settlement, it brings him and Ishmael to their graves; not that they died before the birth of his two grandsons, Jacob and Esau, as the text has placed things (for Abraham lived till they were fifteen years old, and Ishmael till they were sixty-three), but having no more to say of the father and the son, Moses here concludes their history at once.—Lightfoot.

CHAP. 11.—Difficulties Obviated, and Objections Answered.

BUT we certainly judge wrong of the merits of any author, when we suffer our prejudice to blind our understanding, and to hinder it from attending to its chief drift and design. The great end which Moses had in writing this part of his history was, to instruct the Jews in their rise and original, their election and separation from the rest of mankind; and therefore fit it was, when he entered upon the history of their great founder Abraham, in whom they became a peculiar people, a chosen generation, and a royal priesthood, as the apostle¹ styles them, that he should lay aside his usual conciseness, and endeavour to expatiate a little upon so useful and so agreeable a subject.

The Spirit of God very well foresaw that Abraham's character would become renowned in future generations; that not only the Jews, but several other nations, would lay claim to him as their progenitor; that not only the saints and prophets in the Old Testament would make him the chief pattern of faith and obedience to God's commands, but that, even under the New, his example would be propounded for our imitation, and ² 'his bosom' be made the happy receptacle of the souls of the righteous between their death and their resurrection; and therefore it is no wonder that he led the holy penman into a longer recital of the life and adventures of a person who is styled 'the friend of God,' and 'father of the faithful;^a who was the great founder of the very nation he was now writing to; whose sons were to be kings and princes in their several distant countries, and 'in whose seed all the nations of the earth were to be blessed.'

We must observe, however, that one great error in those that have undertaken to vindicate the Holy Scrip-

^a The Jewish writers tell us that Abraham was bred up in the religion of the Zabii, who in those early times made images or representations of the sun, moon, and stars to worship, and that his father Terah was a maker and seller of these images; that Abraham, being well skilled in the astronomy of those times, learned from thence that the celestial bodies could neither make nor move themselves by their own power, but that there was one only God, who created, preserved, and governed all other things, and that therefore they ought to worship him alone; that his father Terah going from home about particular business, and leaving Abraham in the shop to sell the images, he in his absence broke them all, except the largest of them; that upon this Terah, being angry, brought Abraham before the chief king of the Assyrian monarchy, to be punished for this crime: that the king, being one of the Magi, commanded Abraham to worship the fire; and upon his refusal, ordered him to be thrown into a hot burning furnace: but that Abraham came out unhurt, in the presence, and to the admiration of them all. Maimonides in Mor. Nevoc. b. 2. c. 29; Jad. Chaz. de Idololatria, c. 1.; Shalsheloth, p. 8.; Inchasin, part 9. fol. 1.—But some think that this whole story rose from taking the word Ur to signify the fire, as it is in the Hebrew, and thence interpreting the saying of God to Abraham in this manner:—'I am the Lord, that brought thee out of the fire of the Chaldeans, to give thee this land to inherit it.' Since it is expressly said, however, (Gen. xi. 31.) that Terah, Lot, Abraham, and Sarah his wife, came all forth together out of Ur of the Chaldees, it may therefore very properly be taken for a city dedicated to the fire, which was there principally worshipped, and from thence it might take its name.

tures is, their unwillingness to suppose any faults in the lives of the ancient patriarchs; and therefore they study to apologize for every thing they did, and sometimes labour even to consecrate their very vices. Their opinion is, that the Holy Spirit has prescribed them as patterns every way worthy of our imitation; and therefore they think it a disparagement to the Scriptures themselves if any blemish or defect should occur in these men's characters, whereas the Scriptures have no manner of concern in any such thing. Their purpose is to represent mankind as they are, clothed with infirmities, and beset with temptations to sin; and it is a glorious instance of their truth and veracity, when we find the faults and failings of some of their greatest worthies related as they really happened, and set in a true light, without extenuation or excuse. "The most celebrated of the saints of God,"³ says St Austin, "are not impeccable; and from their faults there is no arguing to the prejudice of the book in which, as we find them recorded as matter of history, so we find them condemned as matter of morality. God has informed us," says he, "of what passed, but not authorized it, and set the example before us, not for a pattern, but for a warning."

Abraham, in the age wherein he lived, was certainly accounted a man of great piety and worth. ⁴ We have the testimony of several heathen authors in his favour;^b and Berosus in particular;⁵ as he is quoted by Josephus, gives us this character of him, namely, that in the tenth generation after the flood there was a man among the Chaldeans who was very just, and great, and sought after heavenly things. But notwithstanding this, it must be acknowledged, that in this instance of denying his wife Sarah, he was guilty at least of a manifest dissimulation.

It is in vain to say, ⁶ that she was really his sister by another wife, whom his father Terah might marry after the death of his mother; for this brings upon him the charge of incest. It is in vain to say, ⁷ that as he was a prophet, he was directed by the Holy Spirit to make use of this subterfuge, in order to preserve his life; for this is making God the author of sin. It is in vain to say, ⁸ that what he declared was truth, though not the whole truth; that he concealed what was proper, and told nothing that was false; because his declaring her to be his sister was in effect denying her to be his wife, which was a direct falsehood. Men certainly have a right to conceal their sentiments, upon several occasions, by a prudent silence; but whenever they make use of words, and pretend thereby to discover their thoughts, they impose upon their hearers, if they do not really express what they pretend; and in this the very formality of lying does consist, namely, in a settled intention to deceive others. ¹ "For whatever is said, whether in itself it be true or false, whether it agrees with the thoughts of the speaker or not, yet if it plainly tends to deceive the hearer; if he who says it perceives the tendency, and accordingly uses it to this end, however disguised it is, under whatever forms it is expressed, it is, to all intents and purposes, a lie."

^b Profane authors, if possible, say more in the praise and commendation of Abraham than do the sacred; but there is reason enough to believe that their accounts are loaded with fictions. Some have averred that he reigned at Damascus; others, that he dwelt a long time in Egypt, and taught the Egyptians astronomy and arithmetic. Some say that he invented letters and the Hebrew language; that he was author of several works, and, among others, of a famous book entitled "Jezira;" or "the Creation;" and among the Persians, so great a man was he accounted, that the Magi, or worshippers of fire, believe Zoroastres, who was their prophet, to be the same with the patriarch Abraham.—Colmet's Dictionary.

It is in vain, then, to pretend to assail the patriarch from the imputation of lying or dissimulation in this case; but then this may be said in extenuation of his fault, that it proceeded from a weakness of faith, and a prevalency of fear, which are sometimes found to be incident to the best of men. He considered himself as a stranger among a licentious sort of people, and exposed to the power of an arbitrary government; and, from a principle of worldly caution, both to preserve his own life and his wife's modesty, he concluded that this would be the best expedient; but much more wisely had he done, had he committed the whole matter to God's management, in reliance on his promises, and in confidence of his protection.

It cannot, however, with any tolerable construction be charged upon him, that he went about to betray his wife's chastity, since, according to his present sentiments, he took the most effectual method to prevent it. ² For, in declaring her to be his sister, he made it known that she was committed to his care and disposal; and from hence he supposed it would come to pass, that if any of the country was minded to make his addresses to the sister, he would, of course, come and apply himself to the brother. The first motions of love he knew were most impetuous, and apt to hurry men into violence and outrage; and therefore he thought with himself, that if he should pass for her husband, such as were in love with her would have no other way of accomplishing their desires but at the expense of his life; whereas, if he passed for her brother, time might be gained, the treaty of marriage prolonged, and several unforeseen accidents happen, that might give the divine providence a seasonable opportunity to interpose in his favour, as we find it did.

Nor can the presents which both Pharaoh and Abimelech gave Abraham, upon the delivery of his wife, with any justice, be imputed to his management; since they were voluntary acknowledgments for his interceding for them; oblations of gratitude for their recovery from the sore plagues wherewith God had afflicted them; and a kind of commutation for the injury and affront they had put upon persons so highly favoured by God, that ³ "at what time they went from one nation to another, from one kingdom to another people, he suffered no man to do them wrong, but reprov'd even kings for their sakes."

Hagar, according to the opinion of some of the rabbins, who love to magnify every matter, was one of the daughters of Pharaoh king of Egypt, whom he sent along with Abraham, when he dismissed him so honourably. She was an Egyptian indeed, very probably one of those servants that were given to Abraham, and was employed about Sarah's person as her waiting-maid: but we have no grounds to think, that a woman of her extraction (had she been Pharaoh's daughter) would have condescended to serve in any capacity. However this be, Sarah seeing herself now grown old and barren, and knowing that God had promised a numerous posterity to Abraham, believed that, in order to contribute to the accomplishment of these promises, she ought to give her servant to him for a wife; and accordingly she is introduced as making the first offer: ⁴ "Behold now the Lord hath restrained me from bearing, I pray thee go in unto my maid; it may be, that I may obtain children by her." This proposal (as St Chrysostom ⁵ observes,) and the soft manner of making it, discovered a very uncommon love and respect to her husband; that she herself should persuade and urge him to this expedient, in order to make him easy in that particular, which gave him so much disturbance, the want of issue, the default of which she supposed to be owing to herself: ⁶ and it was purely in compliance to this solicitation of hers, that he took Hagar to his bed. Sarah, undoubtedly, was by far the more beautiful woman, at least if so good judges as the king of Egypt and his subjects may be depended on. Abraham had now lived many years, without giving any occasion to have his modesty and continence suspected. Hagar too was no more than his wife's servant, and inferior to her in person as much as in condition. In a short time after, when, upon her conception, she grew undutiful to her mistress, Abraham never interposed in her favour, but left her entirely to her lady's discretion: from all which circumstances it appears that his taking Hagar to be his concubinary wife, was not from any motive of sensuality, but from a true principle of conjugal affection to Sarah.

⁶ God had indeed promised him the land of Canaan, and a numerous issue to succeed him; but whether the son, from whom that issue was to spring, was properly to be his own, or only adoptive; or if his own, whether begotten of Sarah or of some other woman, was not revealed to him. Seeing, therefore, he had no children of his own, and yet stedfastly believed the promises of God, the only way that he could devise whereby to have these promises accomplished, was by way of adoption; and therefore he says, ⁷ "Lo! one born in my house is my heir;" upon which God clears the first of these doubts to him, namely, whether his seed was to be natural or adoptive; ⁸ "This shall not be thine heir, but one that shall come forth out of thine own bowels, shall be thine heir:’ but still the second doubt remained, whether he was to be his heir by Sarah, or by some other woman, which, for the farther trial of his patience, God thought proper to conceal. No wonder then if Abraham, (having no longer hope of issue by his wife, finding her indeed as impatient for a child as himself, and desirous to have such a child as she might account her own, being begotten by her husband and her maid,) yielded to her importunity, not so much to please himself as to gratify her desire. And this seems to be the reason why Sarah made choice of a slave (as Hagar is called in the text) rather than a free woman, to bring to her husband’s bed, namely, ¹ that the child which the former might happen to bear, might, imputatively at least, be accounted hers; whereas one conceived by a woman that was free, would properly belong to the mother herself.

^a The words of St Austin upon this occasion are very nervous and very significant. — "Abraham used Hagar to rear an off-spring for him, not to gratify his lust: he did not insult but rather complied with the wishes of his wife, who believed that it would be a comfort for her barrenness, if he should go in unto her maid, since she herself was incapacitated by old age. There is here no desire of wantonness—no disgraceful criminality; for the sake of off-spring the maid is given by the wife to the husband, and, for the same reason, is she received by him."—De Civit. Dei, b. 16. c. 25; where he concludes with these exclamatory words, "O virum viriliter utentem feminis, conjugē temperanter, ancilla obtemperanter, nulla intemperanter."

Whether polygamy, in the age of the patriarchs, was innocent or no, is a question that has much employed the pens of the learned. ^a Most of the ancient fathers of the church maintain its lawfulness, and ² some of our latter divines can hardly persuade themselves, that a practice which the most holy and venerable men ordinarily engaged in, and during that engagement continued an intimate conversation and familiarity with God; a practice which God never blamed in them, even when he sharply reprov’d other vices, and for which they themselves never showed the least remorse or tokens of repentance, should be detestable in the sight of God. Our blessed Saviour, who has restored matrimony to its primitive institution, has certainly declared it to be criminal; but whether it was so, under a less perfect dispensation, is not so well agreed. At present, if we suppose it only tolerated by God in the time of the patriarchs, we shall soon perceive another inducement for Abraham’s complying with his wife’s request; and that is, namely, the passionate desire for a numerous progeny, which, in those days, was very prevalent; so very prevalent that we find men accounting of their children as their riches, their strength, their glory, and several families reckoning them up with a sort of pride, and placing the chief of their renown in the multitude of them; ³ ‘For children, and the fruit of the womb, are an heritage and gift that cometh of the Lord; like as arrows in the hand of a giant, so are young children. Happy is the man that has a quiver full of them; he shall not be ashamed when he speaketh with enemies in the gate.’

^a The words of St Ambrose, b. 1. c. 4, concerning the patriarch Abraham, are very remarkable, and comprehend indeed the sentiments of most of the rest:—‘Let us consider, in the first place, that before the existence of the law of Moses and the gospel, no interdict was laid on adultery. The punishment of a crime begins with the promulgation of a law prohibiting that crime. It is not before but after the existence of a law, that there is any condemnation of a culprit. Therefore Abraham did not sin against a law, he only anticipated it. Although the Almighty applauded the married state in paradise, yet he did not condemn adultery.’ Durandus, Tostatus, Selden, Grotius, and others, are clearly of opinion, that before the promulgation of the law, polygamy was no sin; but as their error turns upon this, that the first institution of marriage between one pair in paradise was not designed by God for a law, so have they received an ample confutation from the learned Heidegger, in his Historia Patriar. vol. 1. Essay 1, and Essay 7. and vol. 2. Essay 6.

Thus the desire of a numerous issue, the entreaty of a beloved wife, and the supposed innocence of concubinage in that age, may, in some measure, plead Abraham’s excuse in assuming Hagar to his bed. But then, what shall we say for his turning her away so abruptly, and in a starving condition, after she had lived so long with him in the capacity of a wife, and had borne him a son? To clear up this matter, we must inquire a little into the time and occasion, as well as the manner and consequence of this her dismissal.

The whole account of this transaction is thus related by the sacred historian. ⁴ ‘And the child (meaning the child Isaac) grew, and was weaned, and Abraham made a great feast the same day that Isaac was weaned. And Sarah saw the son of Hagar the Egyptian, which she had born unto Abraham, mocking; wherefore she said unto Abraham, cast out this bond-woman and her son, for the son of the bond-woman shall not be heir with my son, even with Isaac. And the thing was very grievous in Abraham’s sight, because of his son. And God said unto Abraham, Let it not be grievous in thy sight, because of the lad, and because of thy bond-woman; in all that Sarah hath said unto thee, hearken unto her voice; for in Isaac shall thy seed be called: and also of the son of the bond-woman will I make a nation, because he is thy seed. And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and took bread, and a bottle of water, and gave it unto Hagar (putting it on her shoulder) and the child, and sent her away, and she departed, and wandered in the wilderness of Beersheba.’

What the manner of celebrating this weaning feast, or feast of initiation was, we can only conjecture from certain circumstances, and some parallel passages and customs. There are no more than the weaning of Isaac, and the weaning of Samuel, (two very extraordinary persons, both foretold by the spirit of prophecy, and both miraculously born,) which are taken notice of in the sacred history. And (if we may be allowed to suppose a parallel between them) as the feast at the weaning of Samuel was a sacred feast, and kept ⁵ before the Lord, (for the child was brought by his mother to the sanctuary, there presented, and there initiated, or dedicated by the high-priest, wherupon a sacrifice first, and then a feast did ensue); so we may suppose, ⁶ 1. That at the weaning feast of Isaac, there was a burnt sacrifice, which Abraham, as priest and prophet, might early in the morning offer, in order to sanctify both the feast and those that were to communicate in it: 2. That there were changes of raiment given to all the guests, and to all the servants, to keep the feast in, and that, without the festival robes, no one was allowed to sit down at the table: 3. That a new sort of vesture was given to Isaac, as an habit of distinction, by which he was declared heir of the family, and the most honourable, next to his father: 4. That there was a dedication of the child, or an holy initiation of him, in a very religious and solemn manner, performed by both the parents: 5. That there was probably a commemoration of the entertainment of angels in pilgrim’s habit, and of the joyful message then brought, together with the killing of the fatted calf, and other provisions made for them: and, 6. That upon this occasion, there was certainly a sumptuous entertainment made for their guests, suitable to the character of the master of the feast, who was a prince as well as a prophet, and answerable to the end and design of it, which was to commemorate the highest divine blessing that could be given, not to one family only, but to all the generations of the world.

On this festival occasion, it was very probable, that Sarah perceived Ishmael treating her son with contempt and derision. The initiation of Isaac, and his father's declaration concerning him, which Ishmael, who thought he had a prior right, was not able to bear, was enough to exasperate his rough nature to commit such rudeness, as could not but break the merriment of the feast, and thereupon provoke Sarah to exert her authority, by showing the difference between the son of a bond-woman, and the heir apparent of the family. I say, to exert her authority; ¹ for as Hagar was Sarah's dotal maid-servant, she was entirely at her disposal. Abraham had no cognisance of her; from his jurisdiction she was exempt, and by marriage-articles (as we call it) reserved to her mistress in property; and therefore we find God interposing in the affair, and advising Abraham, in all that 'Sarah should say unto him, ² to hearken to her voice.'

The expulsion of Hagar and her son is represented indeed, by our translation, under circumstances somewhat dolorous; but if we inquire into particulars, we shall find them not near so full of distress as this representation seems to make them. Abraham is said to have sent them away early in the morning; but this might be done on purpose to prevent what might pass between them, at so sorrowful a parting, from being observed by too many eyes. He is said to have 'given them bread and a bottle of water;' but as bread and water include eatables and drinkables of all kinds; so there is no doubt to be made but that Ishmael was able enough to carry a handsome competency of provision for a few days, or that his mother might very well carry a large bottle of water, or other liquid, to support them for a week or so, while they were travelling through the wilderness. Their whole misfortune was, in mistaking their way, and wandering about in the desert until their water was consumed; but this was a mere accident, wherein Abraham had not the least concern.

Ishmael indeed is, in several places, called a child, and from thence we may suppose, that he was a burden and incumbrance to his mother: but if we look into his age, we shall find that when Isaac was born, he was fourteen; and therefore, allowing two years between Isaac's birth and his weaning, he could not be less than sixteen when Abraham sent him and his mother away, and was consequently a youth capable of being a support and assistance to her. ³ For the circumstances of the world we may observe, at this time, were such, that it was an easy matter for any person to find a sufficient and comfortable livelihood in it. Mankind were so few, that there was in every country ground to spare; so that any one who had flocks or a family might be permitted to settle any where to feed and maintain them, and so grow, and increase, and become wealthy; or creatures in the world were so numerous, that a person who had no flocks or herds might, in the wilderness and uncultivated grounds (as Ishmael we find became an archer) find game enough of all sorts whereby to maintain himself and his dependants, without doing any injury, or being molested for so doing.

Ishmael indeed had for sixteen years continued in Abraham's family, and at first perhaps it might be disputed, whether he or his brother Isaac should succeed to their father's inheritance: but after that this point was determined, and God himself had declared in the favour of Isaac, he must of course have become Isaac's bond-man or servant, had he continued in Abraham's family. So that it was both kindly and prudently done of his father, to take occasion, from Sarah's disgust against him, to emancipate and set him free, by sending him abroad to acquire an independent settlement, which was all the provision that parents in those days could make for their younger children. It was the same provision that his father Abraham made for the sons which he afterwards had by his wife Keturah; for so we are told, that ⁴ 'he gave all that he had unto Isaac, but unto the sons of his concubines he gave gifts, and sent them away from Isaac his son, eastward, unto the east country.' Nay, it was the same provision which Isaac made for his son Jacob, though he was the heir of the blessing. When he went from his father's house to Padan-Aram, we read of no servants or equipage attending him, nor any accommodations prepared for his journey. He was sent (as we call it now-a-days) to seek his fortune, ⁵ only instructed to seek it among his kinsfolk and relations, and he went to seek it upon so uncertain a foundation, that we find him most earnestly praying to God to be with him in the way he was to go, not to suffer him to want the necessaries of life, but to 'give him bread to eat, and raiment to put on;' and yet we see, that by becoming an hired servant to Laban, ⁶ he both married his daughters, and in a few years became master of a very considerable substance.

It is our mistake, in the customs of the times therefore, that makes us imagine that Hagar and Ishmael had any hard usage in their ejection. Whatever the nature of their offence might be, or whatever grounds Sarah might have for her indignation against them, there is no reason to accuse Abraham's conduct in this affair, since what he did was pursuant to a divine direction, which he durst not disobey; was agreeable to the practice of the times wherein he lived; and no more than what all other fathers, in those days, imposed upon their younger sons: since the hardships they suffered were accidental, but the benefits which accrued to them were designed: since Abraham, by this means, rescued them from a state of servitude for ever; and, according to the divine prediction, was persuaded that this would be the only expedient to make of Ishmael a flourishing nation.

Abraham's great readiness to sacrifice his son, upon the first signification of the divine pleasure, is an instance of duty and obedience, not to be equalled in all the records of history. Sauchoniatho indeed, (as he is quoted by ⁷ Eusebius) tells us of one Chronus, king of Phœnicia, who, in a time of great distress, and extreme peril of war, took his son Jeud (which, according to the Phœnician language, means only-begotten,) and with his own hand, sacrificed him on an altar of his own erecting. But as ^a this action was certainly subsequent to the times we are now speaking of, there are good reasons to believe, that the whole account of it is no more than a relation of Abraham's intended sacrifice of Isaac, bating some additions and mistakes. ¹ For whereas it is said of this Chronus, that he was the son of a father who had three children; that himself had one son only by his wife, but more by other women; that he circumcised himself and his family; and that he sacrificed his only son with his own hands; all these circumstances concur in the case of Abraham: the chief difference is, that Chronus is by the Phœnicians called Israel, which was properly the name of Abraham's grandson; but this is a small mistake, considering that most of the heathen writers had a general notion, that Israel was the name of some one famous ancestor of the Israelites, but were not exact in fixing it upon the right person.

² The only instance which seems any way to come near the case before us, is that of Agamemnon's consenting that his daughter Iphigenia should be sacrificed; but the disparity soon appears, if we consider that Agamemnon, in all probability, had other children, and a queen neither barren nor old, and yet, sore against his will, did he comply, and perhaps for fear of provoking his subjects in arms; nor could he bear the sight of his daughter's last minutes, though he attained thereby his end, namely, the gratification of his ambitious views in the war wherein he was embarked. Whereas Abraham had no other, nor could expect any other children by his wife, but this son, who was a pledge from heaven of all the glorious blessings that God had promised him; and yet, upon this harsh command, we find him in no uneasiness or confusion, but perfectly composed and easy, fixed and resolved to put it in execution, and waving the weapon in his own arm, stretched out to take away his own child's life; though he could not but foresee, that by such an inhuman act, he would not only exasperate his own family against him, but expose himself likewise to the hatred and indignation of all the nations round about him.

The truth is, several examples there have been, especially of persons of a public character, who have sacrificed themselves, or their nearest relations: but what has it been to? even to desperation, or the apprehension of human force and power; to a wicked and superstitious custom; to pride and vainglory; or to the hopes of preventing or stopping some dreadful and public calamity; but the case of Abraham is so singularly circumstantiated, that none of all these can be imputed to it: the only motive we can possibly imagine, must have been his earnest desire to testify his obedience to God in all, even his most arduous commands.

How he could certainly know that such a command came from God will best appear, by inquiring a little ^b into the several ways wherein we find God revealing himself to this beloved patriarch. And to this purpose we must observe, that at first he left his own country and kindred by the express command of God, and went into a strange land which God had promised to give his posterity. We are not told, indeed, in what manner God appeared to him, when he gave him this command; but we can hardly think that a person of his gravity and years would incline to seek unnecessary adventures; nor can we imagine why his aged father should accompany him in them, unless there was a manifest conviction that the call was from God.

After he had been for some time settled in Haran, long enough to have his family and fortune increased in it, and probably long enough to like it, and be contented with it, God commands him thence into another strange country, in all appearance no better than that where he then was, and consequently none of his own option; and there he appeared to him the second time, and renewed his former promise of giving him the land whereunto he had thus conducted him.³

After this, when he was driven by famine into Egypt, God sufficiently manifested his signal protection of him, ² Revelation Examined, vol. 2. Dissertation 8.

^b The usual ways recorded in the Old Testament, of God's revealing himself to his servants, were by dreams, by voices, and by apparitions. 1. Dreams are, in some places, called visions, and visions of the night; because persons, under this form of revelation, saw things, and heard voices, as plainly, to all imagination, as if they had been awake; but what sort of ideas and images affected their minds at such a time, and how they distinguished divine dreams from such as were purely natural, we are nowhere told; only, if we may be allowed to conjecture, 1st, Such dreams as were divine had none of those confused and idle phantoms which are found in other dreams, but distinctly represented to their minds whatever things or beings God was pleased to send, without any mixture of foreign images or words: 2dly, They were more lively than any other dreams; their images were strong and vigorous, and fixed deeply in the soul; and, 3dly, They were either attended with the voices of God, or angels speaking distinctly to them, or had some particular instinct always accompanying them. 2. Voices were frequently heard, without any appearance or representation, and proceeded sometimes from the clouds, from out of the fire, out of the whirlwind, &c., in which cases, to judge of the veracity of a revelation, it was generally thought that when the voice was greater than any human voice, (as it was on the top of the mountain when God delivered the law,) or proceeded from a place where no human creature was, (as in the instance before,) that it came either from God himself, or from some messenger sent from heaven. 3. At other times, a figure, or resemblance has appeared to persons awake, talked with them, and done several things in their company, as if it had been a human creature; and yet the event has shown, that it was either God himself, or an angel concealed in human shape. And in this case, the way of discerning them seems to have been, either by the air and majesty of their looks, (as in the angel that appeared to Manoah's wife,) or by some miraculous actions that were above the power of human performance (as in that which appeared to Gideon.) In any of these methods of revelation, where these several circumstances concurred, it was always presumed, that the dream, or voice, or vision, was from God; since it is not to be supposed that He, who sees and hears all things, and himself is a lover of truth, would ever suffer those that love and fear him, to be imposed upon by evil spirits, or even perplexed by the fantastical operations of nature itself.—See my Body of Divinity, part 2. c. 3.—Ed.

^a A learned author, in his 'Connection of Sacred and Profane History,' having by two different ways of computation, proved that Abraham was older than Chronus, subjoins these words: "And thus, by both these accounts, Chronus cannot be more ancient than Abraham, rather Abraham appears to be more ancient than he: and this must be allowed to be more evidently true, if we consider that it was not Chronus the son of Uranus, who made this sacrifice of his only son, but rather Chronus who was called Israel, and was the son of Chronus called Ilus; and therefore still later by one generation."—Vol. 2. b. 6.

by plaguing Pharaoh and his house upon his account. Upon his return to Canaan, he renewed his assurance of giving him the promised land; and then it is said, that 'the word of the Lord came to him in a vision,' wherein the promise of an heir, and a numerous posterity, is added to that of Canaan; and as Abraham requested a sign in confirmation of all this, so God was pleased to comply with his request; and accordingly again he appears to him in a vision, repeats again the promise to him, supports the promise by a miracle, and confirms a covenant by fire from heaven, to consume the sacrifice which he had commanded him to offer.

Again, when Abraham was ninety-nine years old, God appeared to him; and that his appearance was in some visible form or figure, is sufficiently clear from the text; which tells us, 'that Abraham fell upon his face while God conversed with him.' Here Isaac is promised, and circumcision instituted, a painful, hazardous rite, which the patriarch would never have complied with, but from a full conviction of a divine command.

After this he appeared unto him under the tree of Mamre, in the shape of a pilgrim; and by his whole conversation with him, concerning the fate and iniquity of Sodom, discovered himself to be God, or (to speak more properly) the Messiah in human shape. Soon after this he appeared to Abimelech in Abraham's behalf, and inflicted a distemper upon his whole house, which was removed upon Abraham's prayer; and, soon after this, God's promise of an heir was fulfilled, in the birth of a son from a barren woman, which was a proof equivalent to a thousand miracles.

Once more, God commanded Abraham to comply with his wife's request, in casting out Hagar and her son, though the text implies that he loved them both very tenderly. This was a command so seemingly cruel and severe, that nothing but a full conviction of its coming from God could have exacted Abraham's submission to it: and now, after all these manifestations of himself to the patriarch, God commands him to offer up his son Isaac; and will any one say that Abraham, by this time, had not sufficient evidence that this command was of the same original with the rest? God had, some way or other, appeared and manifested himself to him nine times before this command. Twice in vision, twice in miracle, twice under some sensible appearance, thrice in some manner not explained. He had given him three preceding commands, which no man in his senses could obey, without full assurance that they were enjoined from above. He had often before this time called to him, spoken to him, conversed with him, and, on one occasion, very familiarly and long; and, as we may reasonably suppose, that he always spoke with the same voice, there is no doubt to be made, but that he certainly knew that it was God who spake to him upon this occasion. For why should Abraham suspect that God Almighty would suffer an evil spirit to delude him into the greatest and most irremediable calamity, acting in the honesty and sincerity of his heart, and from a principle of the most exalted obedience to the divine will? In so long a succession of miracles, discourses, and appearances, he must have acquired as certain and perfect a knowledge of the Deity, whenever he vouchsafed to reveal himself to him, as another man has of his friend, when he hears his voice, and converses in his presence. And if Abraham was fully satisfied in this, his obedience could not fail of being built upon a good foundation.

It is allowed, indeed, that there is something shocking, at first sight, in the idea of a parent's taking away the life of his own child; but then an express command from a competent authority alters the case, and makes that, which otherwise would be a sin, become a duty. It may justly be said, that he is a barbarous parent, who commands his children to be beat to death with rods before his eyes.—This position is undoubtedly true in the general; but does it follow, from hence, that the first Brutus was either a bad man or a bad parent, for commanding his sons to be served in this manner, when the duty he owed to his country required it? And did Abraham owe less duty to God than Brutus owed to his country? A captain, who would command his valiant and victorious son to be put to death, for exerting his prowess upon the enemies of his country, must surely be a monster among men. This position, laid down without any limitation, is undeniably true: but will it therefore follow, that Manlius was a monster, though he put his son to death for killing Geminius, general of the Latins, contrary to the discipline of the war? And yet it would badly become us to say, that the discipline of war is a stronger obligation than an express, positive, unerring command, from the great Ruler of the world, the sovereign Arbitrer of life and death.

So good a man as Abraham is represented could not but antecedently be satisfied, that a Being of infinite wisdom and goodness could give no command that would ultimately terminate in calamity upon innocence and obedience; and, therefore, when a command of an intricate and mysterious nature was given him, what had he to do but to obey? He knew this son whom God now demanded was given him in an extraordinary manner, and why might he not be taken away in a manner as extraordinary? And when he was taken away, he very well knew that God could again restore him in a manner yet more extraordinary; and that raising him from the grave had no more difficulty with infinite power than raising him from the womb of a woman barren at first, and now, by the course of nature, long past the power of conception; which makes St Paul's reflection a lively comment upon the principles of Abraham's obedience on this occasion: 'By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac, and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son, of whom it was said, that in Isaac shall thy seed be called, accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead, from whence also he received him in a figure.'

And this, by the bye, suggests a reason why the holy patriarch, who, in other cases, was charitable enough to intercede for the wicked, does not so much as offer up one petition for the life of his innocent son. He had that true sense of the power and veracity of God, that he was fully persuaded, that the fate of his child, and the tenor of God's promises, would, one way or other, be made consistent; and, therefore, he left it upon his infinite wisdom to find out the means of unravelling this intricate affair, without ever once murmuring, or making the least remonstrance. But, supposing that Abraham had taken upon him to expostulate with God upon this hard injunction; yet¹ what could he have urged, but that the person whom he ordered him to slay was his son, his only son, his son whom he tenderly loved, and that he could not, without the greatest force upon paternal affection, lay violent hands upon him. But now, all pleas of this kind were fully anticipated by the divine command, 'Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah, and offer him there for a burnt-offering upon one of the mountains, which I will tell thee of;' that is, "notwithstanding he is thy son, thine only son, and a son thou hast set thine heart upon, yet must thou sacrifice him unto me."

In the case of Sodom, Almighty God is represented as deliberating and undetermined; and there Abraham's humanity and the rectitude of his mind were at liberty, nay, were engaged to interpose; but in the case of his own son, God appeared fixed and determined, and there his humility, and the deference due to his God, forbade him to expostulate. Not to say, that if he erred in the first case, he knew it was the error of an upright, a humane, and a generous spirit; but an error in the latter would be the effect of partiality and self-interest; and Abraham's heart was too honest, and too enlarged, to allow him in a conduct that could any way fall under the suspicion of such mean and sordid principles. This seems to vindicate the conduct of Abraham in paying a ready obedience to the divine command; but then, what shall we say to the goodness and justice of God in imposing it?

God indeed governs himself by the eternal rules of reason; and can give no command in contradiction to them; but then common sense tells us, that these are rules not of human reason, but divine; and consequently such rules as must result from the relation which the whole universe, and all the parts thereof, have to one another; an immense compass and variety of things, which nothing but infinite wisdom can comprehend! And therefore we take quite wrong measures, when we estimate the nature and perfections of God from what we find in ourselves; for 'as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are his ways higher than our ways, and his thoughts higher than our thoughts.'

Upon the supposition, however, that God really intended that Abraham should have taken away his son's life, there could have been no injustice in the injunction; since God, who is the author and giver of life, has an undoubted right to resume it, when, and in what manner he thinks fit; and his infinite wisdom and goodness secure us from all suspicion of his taking it away arbitrarily or unlawfully: so that had the command been actually executed, we must have supposed it to have been wise, just, and good; because a divine command necessarily implies wisdom, and justice, and goodness, in the highest degree, though the reason of that command should not not appear to such limited, short-sighted creatures as we are.

But this was not the case. God never intended that this command should be put in execution. His only purpose was, to make a trial of Abraham's obedience, not to inform himself, in any thing, who was omniscient, and knew beforehand, both what was in Abraham's heart, and how he would acquit himself in this important junction; but to make him more perfect by suffering, and his example more conspicuous,² 'that the trial of his faith,' as the apostle words it, 'being much more precious than of gold, that perisheth, (though it be tried by fire,) might be found unto praise, and honour, and glory;' and that all future generations, reading the history of his patience and perseverance, his courage and constancy, his faith and hope, and magnanimity, might glorify God in him, and look upon his example as a shining light, which the hand of Providence has set up in the firmament of his church, to guide succeeding saints in the intricate and arduous paths of their duty.

Those who would gladly find any flaw in our patriarch's character, are apt to suggest, that his desiring of God a sign concerning the land of Canaan, which had been so lately promised to him, ('whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it?') proceeded from a defect of faith, for which, as some pretend, he was so renowned. But without straining any point to get over this difficulty, we may fairly own, that Abraham is here doing no more than what many worthies of old are known to have done after him, when they were put upon any difficult services; namely, requesting of God some outward token or representation, to strengthen and confirm his faith concerning the divine promises, which is an argument of modesty, not of any diffidence in the divine veracity; and therefore the words are very properly paraphrased by St Chrysostom: "I firmly believe, that what thou hast promised shall come to pass; and therefore I ask no questions out of distrust; but I shall be glad to be favoured with some such token or anticipation of it, as may strongly affect my senses, and raise my poor weak ideas and imaginations about it."

Those that are disposed to find faults are always provided with an handle; otherwise one would wonder that Abraham's making groves the constant place of divine worship, should be ever brought as an accusation against him, merely because, in after ages, they came to be perverted into scenes of the grossest superstition and idolatry: or that, because his intention to offer up his son gave umbrage to human sacrifices afterwards, he should be thought chargeable with the event. The groves of Moreh and Manre, which were the principal ones that he planted, were⁴ (as we hinted before) certain oratories or sanctuaries, exposed to the open air,⁵ but planted with trees for the benefit of their shade, and for the more solemn composure of the mind, and recollection of the thoughts for heavenly contemplation. Before the institution of more commodious receptacles for divine worship, these, and such like places, were usually frequented for that purpose; and therefore they had sometimes the name given of 'the houses of God,' 'the courts of God,' and their trees were called 'the trees of God.' In these places it was that Abraham offered up his morning and evening sacrifice with acceptance; and if, in after ages, they came to be applied to abominable purposes, he is no more to be blamed for that abuse, than Moses was for setting up a brazen serpent in the wilderness, which was afterwards perverted to idolatry, though in its primary intendment, it was sanative and medicinal.

And in like manner, if the custom of sacrificing children took its origin from some tradition founded on the history of Isaac's being offered, wherein, I pray, is either Abraham to be blamed, or God, for appointing him to this office; since, whether the custom was prior or subsequent to this transaction, God has herein taken an effectual care to discountenance it?

¹ For if, as some imagine, this impious and abominable rite obtained at this time, it is evident that nothing could be better calculated to abolish it than this command to Abraham, which was a plain document to the whole world, that human sacrifices were not acceptable to God: for if they could be acceptable from any hand, they must certainly have been so from his, who, of all men in the world, stood highest in the favour of Almighty God. And therefore, when it appears in the event, that this command was only in trial of obedience; and that when it came to the point of execution, Abraham was expressly forbid to execute it by a voice from heaven; and (to show God's aversion to human sacrifices) by his appointment, a brute animal was substituted in the place of Isaac; when all this is considered, I say, we can hardly think of a clearer monition to mankind upon this head, than God's own prohibition of that practice by a command from heaven, and a miraculous interposition of a vicarious oblation.

On the other hand, if this impious custom had not yet obtained, but God, in his great knowledge, foresaw that superstition would soon introduce it; what could be a more effectual means, either to prevent or repress it, than the attestation of all Abraham's dispersed servants and descendants, vouching every where with one voice, that God himself had prohibited their master from practising it. And it is not improbable (from the fable of the goddess Diana's substituting a deer in the room of Iphigenia, who was to be offered,) that the memory of God's prohibiting all human sacrifices was handed down to late posterity.

Thus we have endeavoured to vindicate some passages in Abraham's life which seemed most liable to exception; and come now to inquire into the obnoxious part of the conduct of his nephew Lot.

² It is not to be doubted, but that Lot, who, by the assistance of his uncle Abraham, had done such signal services to the Sodomites, was by this time become a person of some eminence among them; had probably married a woman of a principal family, and was admitted into some considerable post of honour and authority. The Jewish doctors will needs persuade us, that he was now one of the judges in Sodom, and, as such, sat at the gate of the city, where the courts of judicature were usually held. His sitting at the gate, however, seems rather to have been (according to the hospitality of those days) with an intent to invite strangers into his house, the better to secure them from the libidinous outrage of his neighbours.

Two strangers (who afterwards proved two angels) he had now under his roof, when the inhabitants, from all parts of the city, flocking together, stormed the house, and demanded the two strangers to be brought out to them, that they might abuse their bodies: whereupon Lot, deeply concerned lest the right of hospitality should be violated, is resolved to expose both himself and his, to the utmost peril, rather than those whom he had taken under his protection should come to any harm. Upon this principle he ventures out of doors alone among this lewd, licentious rabble, that he might calmly expostulate the matter with some of the chief of them, and divert them, if possible, from the violence they intended against his guests.

The offer which he made them upon this occasion, namely, to give up his two daughters to their lust, seems to be a strange one; but then we are to consider, that as it was made in the utmost perplexity of mind, and out of a vehement desire to secure his guests; so may it, after all, imply no more than this,—“God forbid, my friends, that you should make yourselves guilty of a crime of so high a nature, as to offer the least indignity to these noble strangers whom I have received into my house, and whom I therefore cannot put in your power upon any terms whatever. Much rather had I part even with my own dear daughters, who are in my power, and who are also marriageable, than with those whom I am not authorized to dispose of. Wherefore, I beseech you, brethren, deal not so foolishly in this matter, but consider what you are now going to do: and since, of two evils, it is better to commit the less than the greater, are there not women among you whom ye may choose for the satisfying the desires of your flesh, and not sin against the order of nature? But if there are none found that can please you, and you will nevertheless persist, I protest to you, sirs, I will sooner lose my own children, with all that I have in the world, than even once consent to depart from my word, which I have given to these worthy persons. Therefore do as you please with me and mine, seeing that I am in your hand; only touch not these.” “This seems to be, in a great measure, the purport of Lot's proposal to the men of Sodom; and yet, with all this mollification, it has not unjustly incurred the censure of ³ St Austin. “We must not consider,” says he, “the offer which Lot made to the inhabitants of Sodom, as proceeding from a wise, sober, and a premeditated design, but rather as a speech which dropped from a man struck with horror at the thoughts of the abominable sin they were going to commit, and who, by the surprise and trouble that he was in, had lost the use of his reason and discretion. For if once we lay it down for a rule, that there may be a compensation of sin (as he calls it), that is, that we may commit less sins, in order to prevent others from running into greater, we shall in a short time lay waste all bounds, and see every manner of wickedness come rushing in upon us without control.”

a Le Clerc, in his commentaries upon the place, assigns another reason why Lot might, with better courage, make an offer of his daughters to the Sodomites. For, supposing him to be a considerable man in the city, and his daughters both betrothed (as we find they were betrothed, Gen. xix. 11.) to two young gentlemen of eminence, he might safely propose the thing, as knowing very well that they neither durst, nor would accept of it. That they durst not, for fear of punishment from persons of their rank and authority; and that they would not, because brothers in iniquity (however outrageous they may be against others) affect always to maintain some form of decency between themselves. But it is hard to say what persons of their complexion would either have been afraid, or ashamed to do, had the bent of their inclination tended that way.

After the destruction of Sodom, and Lot's departure from Zoar, he retired, we are told, into a cave, where his two daughters betrayed him into the double sin of drunkenness and incest; and with what design they did it,¹ the authors who would fain apologize for their conduct do generally run into this strain, namely, that these two maids having some notions of a general conflagration of the world, and seeing their own city and country consumed by fire, were fully persuaded that the divine indignation, which had consumed the Sodomites, had fallen over the face of the whole earth, and that their father was the only man left from whose body mankind was to be repropagated. They were young and inexperienced, say they, and might therefore very well be ignorant that several parts of the earth were inhabited, as well as the plain of Sodom had been. As far as their eye would reach, they saw nothing but sulphureous flames, and a wide theatre of perdition; and this they looked upon as the final catastrophe which, as they had been told, was to put a period to nature. They had unaccountably lost their mother too; so that they concluded that they and their father were the only survivors of human nature (as Noah and his family had been after the flood), and that therefore it was their duty to take care to prevent the extinction of the species. And though they knew it to be a very grievous sin in itself, to betray their own father into a carnal knowledge of themselves; yet they thought they should be more inexcusable, if they should rate the chasteness of their bodies so high, as not to part with it rather than mankind should be no more.

But all this is no more than a plausible fiction, without any foundation to support it. They had lately left Zoar, and knew that it was well inhabited; and were therefore convinced that they and their father were not the only three persons left alive in the world: but this they knew very well,² that there was not so much as one of all their kindred left, by whom they could raise up seed or successors to their father; those of their father's side being at a vast distance from them; and those of their mother's, every one destroyed in the conflagration of Sodom.

Now, it was at that time an universal law, which became afterwards a particular one of the Jews, that marriages should be contracted within the family, to preserve inheritances, and to avoid the mixture of seeds; so that the two sisters here argued very justly upon the principles then universally admitted, that is, upon the general law of nations. For seeing they had no brother to keep up their name and family, and their father had lost their mother, by whom he might have had other children, and they themselves their husbands, before consummation, in the common destruction, there was no apparent possibility of preserving their father's family from utter extinction after their three lives, or of averting the sad curse of excision, but by the very method which at last they concerted between them. So that they had the plea of necessity on their side, to excuse, if not to justify them; and that they were not led by any spirit of uncleanness to this action, we have these presumptions to believe;—that in the midst of all the impurities of the most wicked city under heaven, they had preserved their innocence and virginity; that they unanimously joined together in the same contrivance, whereas vicious intrigues are seldom communicated, and whenever they are, always occasion quarrels; that which they did once they never repeated, and so cannot be suspected of having been incited by brutal lust; and, lastly, that they were so far from being conscious to themselves of having acted upon any base and sinful inducement, that in the names of their children they took care to perpetuate the memory of it to posterity, which they never would have done had they thought it a reproach to their father's name.

Their father too, in the matter of incest, may in some measure be excused, forasmuch as he offered no violence to his daughters, but was altogether passive, and imposed upon by them; but then, it must be considered, that had he not allowed himself to drink to excess, it had not been in the power of his daughters to deceive him. The daughters indeed, without this expedient, could not have attained their end; but then the unjustifiableness of the means desecrates the end, even though it were good and laudable before. The short is, both father and daughters, in this whole transaction, were not without sin: and therefore, whatever may be said in mitigation of their faults, we mistake the matter widely if we think that the sacred history, in barely relating them, means either to approve or commend them.

It cannot be denied, indeed, but that sundry difficulties occur in the character of Melchizedek, as he is described in the Holy Scriptures; but there is certainly no incongruity in his being both king and priest in one person. For if we cast our eye into any ancient writer, we shall find that, before the institution of a separate order of men, the regal and sacerdotal offices both went together; and that he who was appointed to govern the affairs of the state, had always a right to minister about holy things. This is an observation that the writings of Homer will verify in almost innumerable instances; but (to mention but one out of each of his poems) after Agamemnon was constituted the head of the Grecian army,³ we find him every where in the public sacrifices performing the priest's office, and the other Grecian kings and heroes bearing their parts under him in the administration: and⁴ when Nestor made a sacrifice to Minerva, Stratius and the noble Echephron led the bull to the altar; Aretus brought the water and canisters of corn; Perseus brought the vessel to receive the blood; Thrasymedes, son of Nestor, knocked down the ox; but Nestor himself acted as priest, and performed the rest of the ceremony.

If we look into some of the best historians, we shall find this point more confirmed. For among the Lacedemonians, whenever they went to battle, the king, according to⁵ Plutarch, always performed the sacrifice; and in the army, as Xenophon⁶ informs us, his chief business was, to have the supreme command of the forces, and to be their priest in the offices of religion. In the time of the heroes, says Aristotle,⁷ the custom was for one and the same person to be general of the forces, judge, and high priest, according to that known verse in ¹Virgil, "Anius, both king of men and priest of Apollo." So that, in short, from any thing that appears in history, we have no reason to think that until some ages after Homer, mankind had any other public ministers in religion but those who were the kings and governors of the state.

There were indeed, in ancient times, many little islands and small tracts of land where civil government was not set up in form; but the inhabitants lived together in peace and quiet, under the direction of some eminent person, who ruled them by wise admonitions, and by instructing them in the great principles of religion; and the governors of these countries affected ^a to be called priests rather than kings. But if, at any time, they and their people came to form a political society, upon more express terms and conditions, then we find these sort of persons called both priests and kings. These small states, indeed, could have but little power to support themselves against the encroachment of their neighbours. Their religion was their greatest strength: and therefore it was their happiest circumstance that their kings or governors were reputed sacred by their neighbours, and so highly favoured by God for their great and singular piety, that it was thought a dangerous thing to violate their rights, or injure the people under their protection.

Such a king as this was the great Melchizedek, who came out to congratulate the patriarch Abraham; and it is no bad conjecture of some, that he was called the king of Salem, not so much upon account of Salem's being the proper name of any determinate place, the seat of his dominion, as that in general it signified peace; and that therefore Melchizedek was 'the king of peace,' or 'the peaceable king;' because the sacredness of his character secured him from being invaded by his neighbours, and his wise administration kept all things in good order, so that he was never molested by his subjects.

This, however, is no more than a conjecture; because it is certain that there were two places in Palestine which went under that name; the one, the same with that which was afterwards called Jerusalem, and the other, a town lying upon the banks of the river Jordan, not far from the place ² where John (our Saviour's forerunner) is said to have baptized. Here formerly were seen the ruins of the palace of this Melchizedek, which in the time of St Jerome, as he tells us, discovered the magnificence of its structure; and, upon that father's authority, several modern authors have gone into the opinion that this place was the metropolis of that prince. But since that city, even according to the testimony of the same St Jerome, was quite demolished by Abimelech, it is hardly conceivable how such remarkable remains should be of so long continuance, and yet escape the observation of Josephus, who was no indigent inquirer into the antiquities of the Jewish nation; and yet his express declaration is, that Melchizedek ³ was king of Solyma, which is now called Jerusalem.

It is the much more probable opinion, therefore, ⁴ that this palace was built by Jeroboam, when he repaired Salem, and that the inhabitants (possibly the Samaritans) in after ages, either devised or promoted a false tradition, that it originally belonged to Melchizedek. For the general consent of the ancients give it clearly for Jerusalem, as duly considering that Abraham's route, in returning from the territories of Damascus to Hebron, was directly through its coasts, (whereas the other Salem lay devious to the north,) and that there was a kind of propriety in the mystery, and what the analogy of the thing seemed to require, that Melchizedek should be king of that very place in which the true Prince of Peace (whereof he was a type and representation) was in future ages to make his appearance.

Who this Melchizedek was, is still an hard question that has puzzled most interpreters. The author to the Hebrews indeed has recorded a description of him; but this is so far from giving us any light, that it has, in a great measure, been the occasion of leading some into a persuasion, ⁵ that the person here called Melchizedek was an angel; others, that he was the Son of God; and others, that he was the Holy Ghost, in the shape and appearance of man; because they cannot conceive how the qualities ascribed to this excellent personage can comport with any human creature. The phrase, however, made use of by the apostle, ἀγενεαλόγητος, without descent, or without genealogy, explains what the apostle means by, 'without father, and without mother,' that is, ⁶ without any father or mother mentioned in the genealogies of Moses, where the parents of all pious worthies are generally set down with great exactness; ⁷ so that there being no genealogy at all of Melchizedek recorded in Scripture, he is introduced at once; even like a man dropped down from heaven, for so the description goes on, 'having neither beginning of days, nor end of life,' that is, in the history of Moses, which (contrary to its common usage when it makes mention of great men) takes no notice at all of the time either of his birth or death; and herein 'he is made like unto the Son of God,' that is, by the history of Moses, which mentions him appearing and acting upon the stage, without either entrance or exit, as if, like the Son of God, he had abode a priest continually.

This is the common, and ^c the best approved interpre-

^c The learned Heidegger, in my opinion, has taken the right method to explain this difficult passage of St Paul to the Hebrews. He supposes (as there really is) a twofold Melchizedek, the one historical, whereof Moses gives us an account in the 14th chapter of Genesis, as that he was the king as well as priest of Jerusalem; the other allegorical, whom St Paul describes in the words now under consideration, and this allegorical person is Christ. The word Melchizedek, simply considered, means the king of righteousness; and from this sense of the word, in its applicative acceptance, and the remembrance of this person's being a priest tation of the apostle's words; but still the question returns upon us, to whom can this character, even with this comment, belong.

The Jews are generally of opinion, and herein are followed by some Christians, that Melchizedek was the same with Shem, one of the sons of Noah, whom they suppose alive in the days of Abraham, the only person upon earth, say they, who could, with justice, be called his superior, and whom the description of the apostle could, in any tolerable manner, besit, as being a person of many singularities, born before the deluge, having no ancestors then alive, and whose life had been of an immense duration in comparison of those who came after him. But not to dispute the fact, whether Shem was at that time alive or no,¹ it seems very incongruous to think that Moses, who all along mentions him in his proper name, should, upon this occasion, disguise his sense with a fictitious one: and very incompatible it is with what we know of Shem, that he should be said to be 'without father,' and 'without mother,' when his family is so plainly recorded in Scripture, and all his progenitors may, in a moment, be traced to their fountain-head in Adam. Besides, had Melchizedek and Shem been the same person, the apostle would hardly have made him of a family different from Abraham, much less would he have set him in such an eminence above the patriarch, or thereupon broke out into this exclamation concerning him:—'Consider how great this man was, unto whom even the patriarch Abraham gave the tenth of his spoils!'

These arguments seem to evince, that Melchizedek and Shem were different persons; and much more reason have we to suppose that he and Ham, that wicked son of Noah, were so. For who, upon deliberate thoughts, can believe, that this cursed person was the priest of the most high God, from whom Abraham so joyfully received the sacerdotal benediction, that he returned it with the

as well as a king, the apostle took occasion to draw the comparison between him and Christ, in order to show the pre-eminence of the Christian above the Aaraonic priesthood; and what he ascribes to the historical Melchizedek, upon this account, is only to be understood in an imperfect and improper sense, that is really and literally true only in the person of Christ. The apostle was minded, in short, to illustrate his argument with some comparison; and writing at this time to the Jews, (who were well acquainted with this allegorical way of arguing,) he could meet with none, in the whole compass of their law, so commodious for this purpose, as this Melchizedek; and therefore as Christ, the heavenly Melchizedek, was 'without father, without mother, without descent' here on earth, in respect of his divinity, 'having neither beginning of days, nor end of life;' so the like properties may, in some measure, be applied to the earthly Melchizedek; forasmuch as, in the book of Genesis, wherein all great men's genealogies are supposed to be recorded, there is no mention made, either of his birth, family, or death: only he was invested with a royal priesthood, which assimilates him to Christ. He had a father and mother, no doubt, and was born, and died like other men; but because these things are not related by Moses, the apostle looks upon them as though they had never been: so that the whole hinge of comparison turns upon the silence of the sacred historian, who, in a book (wherein it might be expected otherwise) makes no manner of mention, either of the beginning or ending of Melchizedek's life or priesthood; and it is for this reason, that he who wrote by the guidance of the blessed Spirit was directed to conceal these matters; that, in this situation, this same Melchizedek might be a more proper type of so sublime a thing as that of the priesthood of Jesus Christ.—Hist. Patriar. vol. 2. Essay 2.

payment of his tithes? And much less can we believe, that one of his ill character was the type of the blessed Jesus. Jesus, indeed, himself, if he be taken for Melchizedek, appearing to Abraham in an human shape, (as he is often supposed to do in Scripture,) will answer all the character which the apostle gives of this extraordinary person: but then the wonder is, that the historian should never give us the least intimation of this; that Abraham should express no manner of surprise upon such an interview; and (what is more) how the type and the antitype can possibly be represented the same.² For this is the case: here Melchizedek was a representative of our Saviour, according to that of the apostle, 'Jesus was a priest after the order of Melchizedek,' which he explains in another place, 'after the similitude of Melchizedek there ariseth another priest;' as much as to say, Melchizedek and Christ were like one another in several things, and thereupon one was designed to be a fit type of the other; but as it is unreasonable and absurd to say, that a person is like himself, so we cannot rationally imagine that Christ, who, as St Paul says, was 'after the similitude of Melchizedek,' was in reality the same person with him.

Thus we have looked into^a some of the chief conjectures concerning this great man, which seem to have any plausibility in them; and after all must content ourselves with what the Scriptures nakedly report of him, namely, that this Melchizedek was both a king and a priest (for these two offices were anciently united) in the land of Palestine, in the city of Jerusalem, descended, not improbably,^b from wicked and idolatrous parents, but

^a The sole question concerning the person of Melchizedek would supply matter for a whole volume, even though one should do no more than recite the catalogue of the different opinions to which it has given rise, and the reason upon which each conjecturer has endeavoured to establish his own. The Melchizedekians, a sect in the early times of the church, maintained that he was a certain divine power superior to Christ; Hierax the Egyptian, that he was the Holy Ghost, because compared to the Son of God; the Samaritians, and many Jews, that he was Shem, the son of Noah; M. Jurieu, (in his Hist. Critique des Dogmes, &c. b. 1.) of late, that he was Ham, another son of his; Origen, that he was an angel; Athanasius, that he was the son of Melchi, the grandson of Salaad; Patricides, that he was the son of Phaleg; Irenæus, that he was king of Jerusalem; St Jerome, that he was king of Salem in Scythopolis; and a certain anonymous author, that he was a man immediately created by God, as was Adam. And because he is said to have had no relations, some have given out, that the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them all up; whilst others, because he is said to have no end of life, suppose that he was translated, and is now with Enoch and Elias, in a state of paradise.—Heidegger's Hist. Patriar. vol. 2. Essay 2. But all these opinions are at present reduced to these two: whether this Melchizedek was a mere mortal man, or the Son of God in human shape; which the reader may find supported with arguments on both sides, in both Saurin's and Calmet's dissertations upon this subject.

^b Those who make him to be the son of Melchi, an idolatrous king, and of a queen named Salem, have an ancient tradition, that Melchi, having resolved to offer a sacrifice to his gods, sent his son Melchizedek to fetch him seven calves, that he might sacrifice them; but that, as he was going, he was enlightened by God, and immediately returned to his father to remonstrate to him the vanity of idols. His father in wrath sent him back to fetch the victims, and while he was gone, offered up to his gods his own son, who was the elder brother of Melchizedek, with a great number of other children. Melchizedek returning, and conceiving a great horror at this butchery, retired to mount himself a person of singular virtue and piety, 'the priest of the most high God,' but perhaps the first and the last of his race who was so, which might give occasion to the apostle to describe him under such ambiguous terms: for the whole of these (according to the judgment of a learned author) ^a may not improperly be reduced to this single proposition, ¹ that Melchizedek was the most illustrious of his family, and had neither predecessor nor successor in his empire.

We readily grant indeed, that there is something very strange and uncommon in the prophecy relating to Ishmael; but the question is not concerning the singularity, but the reality rather, of the matters contained in it. If these are explicable in themselves, and upon examination found to be true, then is the prophecy so far from losing its credit upon the account of its strangeness, that for this very reason it demonstrates its divine origin; because nothing but an omniscient mind could foresee things so strange and unaccountable; and nothing but an almighty power and providence could bring these things to pass, and make the event exactly agree with the prediction.

Now, in order to explain the prophecy itself, and thence to observe how perfectly it has all along been fulfilled, it must be remembered, that (according to the known style of the Old Testament) what is here said of Ishmael must be chiefly understood of his descendants, in the same manner ² as what Jacob predicts of Judah and the rest of his sons, was to relate to their posterity, and be indeed the characteristic of their several tribes. And therefore (to take notice of two of the most odd and

Tabor, where he lived for seven years without clothes, and without any other food but wild fruits, or any other drink but the dew that he sucked up from the plants; till at length Abraham, by the direction of God, went up to the mount, found out Melchizedek, clothed him, and brought him down with him. But those who would have him be the son of Phaleg, relate a still stranger story, namely, that Noah, upon his deathbed, charged his son Seth to take Melchizedek, the son of Phaleg, with him, and go to a place which the angel of the Lord should show them, and there bury the body of Adam, which he had preserved in the ark during the flood: that in that place Melchizedek should fix his habitation, lead a single life, and entirely addict himself to the practice of piety, because God had made choice of him for his priest, but allowed him not to shed the blood of any animal, nor to offer any other oblation to him, but that of bread and wine only; that Seth and Melchizedek did as Noah had enjoined them, and buried Adam in the place which the angel pointed out; that upon their parting, Melchizedek betook himself to the monastic course of life which Noah had prescribed him: but that twelve neighbouring kings, hearing of his fame, and desirous of his acquaintance, consulted together, and built a city, whereof they constituted him king and governor, and, in honour to his merit, called it Jerusalem.—See Selden de Jure Nat. b. 3. c. 2.; and Heidegger's Hist. Patriar. vol. 2. Essay.

^a The same learned author, who makes the Melchizedek spoken of in Scripture, in one sense to be historical, and in another allegorical, defines the historical in these words. "He was a real and mere man, descended from Adam and Noah, by his son Ham and grandson Canaan—a king of Jerusalem, priest of the true God, regenerated and sanctified by the grace common to all the faithful—sealed up both to a happy resurrection and an eternal life." And the allegorical in these of St Paul,—"Who was king of righteousness and peace, without father, without mother, without descent, a priest abiding continually and having a testimony of no end of life. All which kings as we have affirmed, says he, agree with Melchizedek in a more minute and allegorical sense, but more emphatically and really correspond with Christ."—Hist. Patriar. vol. 2. Essay 2.

unaccountable branches of his character) 'he will be a wild man,' or a man like 'a wild ass:' this (from the known properties of that creature) several interpreters have resolved into these qualities,—fierce and cruel, loving solitude, and hating confinement of any kind.

How far this part of the character was verified in Ishmael, who lived in the wilderness, and became an expert archer, his very condition of life shows us; and how properly it belongs to his posterity, the Arabians, who in every nation have very justly obtained the appellation of wild, a small inspection into history will inform us.

To this very day (as ³ modern travellers inform us) great numbers of them live in the deserts, and wander about from place to place, without any certain habitation. They neither plough the ground, nor apply themselves to any kind of husbandry, though there are several fruitful places in the wilderness that would repay their pains. Their whole occupation (besides spoiling their neighbours) lies in hunting and killing wild beasts, in which there are but few that make use of fire-arms. The much greater part of them make use of the bow, and do herein imitate their great progenitor, that they are the most exquisite archers in the world.

Before the introduction of Mahometanism, they were as vagrant in their lust, and as little restrained in the use of females, as the brutal herd: and even now, they take as many wives as do the Turks, that is, as many as they can keep, whom they purchase of their parents, use with indifference, and dismiss at pleasure. They rove about like the fiercest beasts of prey, seeking continually whom they may devour; insomuch that the governor of Grand Cairo is forced to keep a guard of four thousand horsemen every night on the side of the city next the wilderness, to secure it against their incursions. Nor is the wilderness only the scene of their depredations. They rove all over the southern and eastern seas, visit every creek, and coast, and island, and (as the ⁴ historian compares them) come sousing like a hawk, with incredible swiftness, upon their prey, and are gone again in an instant. And as they have always thus preyed upon mankind, the necessary consequence is, that they have always been at variance and hostility with them; and therein have made good the other branch of Ismael's character, 'His hand shall be against every man, and every man's hand against him.'

There is not the least hint in Scripture, nor any manner of reason to believe, that Ishmael dwelt in a personal state of hostility with his brethren: nor is it conceivable how he could have maintained himself against their united forces, had he so done: and therefore this prediction can not otherwise be understood, than as it relates to his posterity, the Arabians. Now, that any one nation should be of so singular and perverse a character, as to set themselves in open opposition to the rest of the world, and live in perpetual professed enmity with all mankind; and that they should continue to do so, not for one age or two only, but for four thousand years together, is surely the strangest and most astonishing prediction that ever was read or heard of. And yet, if we attend a little to the history of these people, (as soon as history takes notice of them,) we shall find, in several instances, a full accomplishment of it.

When Alexander and his victorious army overran a great part of the east, the Arabians, (as we are told by Arrian and Strabo,) of all the Asiatics, were the only people who sent him no ambassador, nor made any submission to him; which indignity he intended to have revenged in a particular expedition against them, but was prevented by death.

When the Romans and Parthians were rivals for the empire of the east, the Arabians joined, and opposed each nation as they thought fit, but were never entirely devoted to either; for their character always was, that they were fickle, if not faithless friends, and fierce enemies, who might be repulsed, and repressed for a season, but could never be totally vanquished or subdued.

Men of this character soon became the objects of the Roman enmity and ambition, which could endure nothing that was free and independent; and accordingly several attempts were set on foot by Pompey, Crassus, and other great generals, in order to enslave them; but all proved successful: and though they are sometimes said to have been defeated, yet is there no account that we can properly depend on, until we come to the expedition which Trajan is known to have made against them.

² Trajan was certainly a long experienced and successful warrior. He had subdued the German, humbled the Parthian, and reduced already one part of Arabia into a province; and yet, ³ when he came to besiege the city of the Hagarenes, upon every assault ^a his soldiers were so annoyed with whirlwinds and hail, and so frightened with thunder and lightning, and other apparitions in the air, (whilst their meat was spoiled and corrupted with flies, even as they were eating it,) that he was forced to give over the siege, and was not long after seized with a disease, whereof he died.

About eight years after this, the emperor Severus, a very valiant and prosperous warrior, whom Herodian makes no scruple to prefer even before Caesar, Marius, and Sylla, disdaining, as Trajan had done, that the Hagarenes should stand out still against the Romans, when all the rest about them had yielded, besieged their city, though it was but a small one, twice, and was twice repulsed with shame and great slaughter of his men. In the second assault, indeed, he beat down some of their city wall, and thereupon sounded a retreat, in hopes that they would have capitulated, and surrendered up the hidden treasure, supposed to be consecrated to the sun. But when they continued resolute a whole day, without giving any intimations of a treaty for a peace, on the morning following the Roman army was quite intimidated. The Europeans, who were gallant men before, refused to enter the breach; and the Syrians, who were forced to undertake that service, had a grievous repulse. Whereupon the emperor, ^b without making any fresh attack, decamped from before the city, and departed to Palestine. Thus God delivered the city, says Dio, recalling the soldiers by Severus, when they might have entered, and restraining Severus the second day by the soldiers' backwardness.

There are only these two things more, which we may observe from our historian, worthy our notice upon this occasion. The first is, that the Arabians stood single, in this their extremity, against the whole Roman power; for none of their neighbours would assist them. The other thing is, that the emperor had soldiers of all nations in his army; for "whereas other emperors," ⁴ says our author, "were contented with guards of four different European countries, Severus filled the city with a mixed multitude of soldiers of all kinds, savage to look on, frightful to hear, and rude and wild to converse with." So that, considering all things, I think we may fairly conclude, that every man's hand was at this time against Ishmael, and his hand, his only hand, against every man; and yet he dwelt, and still dwelleth, in the presence of all his brethren: for, not long after this, it is very well known that the Ishmaelites joined the Goths against the Romans, and having afterwards overcome both, "under the name of Saracens, they erected a vast empire upon their ruins; and thus Ishmael, in the full extent of the prophecy, 'became a great nation.'

^b The historian tells us farther, that after the breach was made, the conquest of the city was deemed so easy, that a certain captain of the army undertook to do it himself, if he might have but 550 European soldiers assigned him. But where shall we find so many soldiers? says the emperor, meaning it of the disobedience of the army, to which he imputed his not carrying that place. But now, how a commander, who was at once beloved and revered, almost to adoration, by his soldiers, could not, with all his authority, influence them to assault, when they were in a manner at his mercy, this can be nowise reconciled, without the supposition of that mighty Being occasioning it, 'who poureth,' when he pleases, 'contempt upon princes, and bringeth their counsels to nought.'

^c The Ishmaelites, as some imagine, upon the reproaches of the Jews, who upbraided them with bastardy, became ashamed of their old names, derived from Hagar and Ishmael, which carried an odium in the sound, and took upon them the name of Saracens, desiring to be accounted as the descendants of Abraham by his wife Sarah; but what destroys this etymology is this, that the ancients called them Sara kenoi, and not Saraceni, as they must have been called, if their name had been derived from Sarah; and therefore the learned Scaliger supposes the word to come from the Arabic word sarack, which signifies to steal or plunder.—Calmel's Dictionary.

^a The above recited author, from whom I have compiled this account, assures his reader, that he had, with all the care he could, examined all the accounts of Arabia that came in his way, to see whether the phenomena and calamities here mentioned by Dio to have distressed the Roman army were frequent in that region, and that he had never been able to meet with any instance of one of them, except sometimes storms of wind. If hail, frightful appearances in the air, and food infested with flies, were ordinary calamities in this region, all the accounts of the caravans that travel through the deserts would necessarily be full of them; whereas it is notorious, that the best writers who have left us faithful diaries of these affairs, do not so much as mention any of them; and therefore they must certainly have proceeded from a divine interposition in favour of the Hagarenes, in accomplishment of the prediction concerning Ishmael and his posterity.

Circumcision is the cutting off the foreskin of the member which in every male is the instrument of generation; and whoever considers the nature of this operation, painful if not indecent in those of maturity, and to such as live in hot countries highly inconvenient, if not dangerous;^a an operation wherein we can perceive no footsteps of human invention, as having no foundation either in reason, or nature, or necessity, or the interest of any particular set of men, we must needs conclude, that mankind could never have put such a severity upon themselves, unless they had been enjoined and directed to it by a divine command. Nay, this single instance of Abraham, who, at the advanced age of ninety-nine, underwent this hazardous operation, and the very indecency of it in a man of his years and dignity; these two considerations are in the place of ten thousand proofs, that it was forced upon him; but nothing but the irresistible authority of God could be a force sufficient, in those circumstances. So that the strangeness and singularity of this ordinance is so far from being an argument against it, that it is an evident proof of its divine institution; and what was originally instituted by God cannot, in strictness, be accounted immodest, though we perhaps may have some such conception of it, since¹ 'unto the pure all things are pure, but unto them that are defiled and unbelieving nothing is pure, but even their mind and conscience is defiled.'

The Egyptians indeed, as² Herodotus informs us, pretended to practise this rite, from no other principle but that of cleanliness; and possibly, at that time, they might so far have lost the memorial of its true origin as not to retain any other reason for their observation of it. But since it is evident, to a demonstration, that they might, to all intents and purposes, be as clean without this rite as with it, it is absurd to suppose that any man of common sense should undergo pain, and hazard himself, and force the same inconveniences upon his posterity,

^a The manner of this ceremony's being performed, whether in the public synagogue or in private houses, is this:—The person who is appointed to be the godfather sits down upon a seat, with a silk cushion provided for that purpose, and settles the child in a proper posture on his knees, when he who is to circumcise him (which, by the bye, is accounted a great honour among the Jews) opens the blankets. Some make use of silver tweezers, to take up so much of the prepuce as they design to cut off, but others take it up with their fingers. Then he who circumcises the child, holding the razor in his hand, says, "Blessed be thou, O Lord, who hast commanded us to be circumcised;" and while he is saying this, cuts off the thick skin of the prepuce, and then, with his thumb nails, tears off a finer skin still remaining. After this he sucks the blood, which flows plentifully upon this occasion, and spits it out into a cup full of wine; then he puts some dragon's blood upon the wound, some coral powder, and other things to stop the bleeding, and so covers up the part affected. When this is done, he takes up the cup wherein he had spit the blood, moistens his lips therewith, and then blessing both that and the child, gives him the name which his father had appointed, and at the same time pronounces these words of Ezekiel, 'I said unto thee, when thou wast in thy blood, live,' Ezek. xvi. 6.; after which the whole congregation repeats the 128th Psalm, 'Blessed is every man that leareth the Lord,' &c.; and so the ceremony concludes. Only we must observe, that besides the seat appointed for the godfather, there is always another left empty, and is designed, some say, for the prophet Elias, who, as they imagine, is invisibly present at all circumcisions.—Calnet's Dictionary, under the word Circumcision.

merely for the attainment of an end which could as fully and perfectly have been accomplished without it.

There is a passage, indeed, in the same Herodotus, wherein he tells us, "That the Colchians, the Egyptians, and the Ethiopians, were the only nations that circumcised from the beginning, and that the Syrians and Phœnicians, who lived in Palestine, acknowledged they borrowed that rite from them." But here the historian is less to be blamed for having run into this error, since the Egyptians were a people naturally so vain and conceited of their antiquity, that they chose rather to impose upon him by a false information (for all this account he had but from information) than confess that they received circumcision from any other people. In the other part of the story, it is manifest that they did impose upon him, when they told him that the inhabitants of Palestine, whom he calls Syrians and Phœnicians, confessed that they received circumcision from them; whereas there were no inhabitants in Palestine circumcised but the Jews, and these always professed to have received it directly from Abraham.

It was twenty years after his return from that country that God enjoined him the rite of circumcision; and then it is said, that⁴ 'Abraham took Ishmael his son, and all that were born in his house, and all that were bought with his money, and circumcised the flesh of their foreskin.' Now it is evident, that when he came out of Egypt he brought men-servants and maid-servants with him in abundance; and therefore, unless we can suppose that all these Egyptian men-servants died within twenty years, when the ordinary period of life was at least an hundred: or that, when they died, none of them left any male issue behind them: we cannot but conclude, that circumcision was not known in Egypt in Abraham's time, because it is expressly said, that 'every male among the men of Abraham's house was circumcised' at the same time that he was, which could never have been, had they undergone that operation before.

At what time the rite of circumcision obtained in Egypt, is not so easy a matter to determine: there is a passage, however, in the prophet Jeremiah, which, if taken in a literal sense, is far from encouraging any high pretensions to antiquity: 'Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will punish all them that are circumcised with the uncircumcised; Egypt, and Judah, and Edom, and the children of Ammon, and Moab, &c., for all these nations are uncircumcised, and all the house of Israel are uncircumcised in their heart—the plain sense of which word is this,—that God would visit the house of Israel like strange nations; because, as the latter were uncircumcised in the flesh, so the former were in the heart. Not but that, in the days of Jeremiah, the rite of circumcision was known and practised among the Egyptians, as well as among other nations; but then it was not so common and general, nor was it at all used any where till long after Abraham's days.

One probable opinion therefore is, that the Arabians received it from the Ishmaelites; that the Egyptians received it from the Arabians, or perhaps from Abraham's children by Keturah; and that from the Egyptians the people of Colchis, knowing themselves to be of Egyptian extract, embraced it, in imitation of their illustrious ancestors. But even suppose that this custom was not established in Egypt by the posterity either of Hagar or Keturah; yet why might not Joseph, in the course of a most absolute ministry for fourscore years together, be able to introduce it? ² It is the practice, we know, nay, it is the pride of slaves, to imitate their master's manners, especially if he seems solicitous to have them do so; and therefore we need not doubt, but that, upon the least intimation of his pleasure, the Egyptians would readily embrace the religious rites of so great, so wise, so powerful a minister, who had preserved every one of their lives, who had saved the whole kingdom from ruin, and was himself so visibly and so remarkably guided by the Spirit of God. But whensoever, or from whomsoever it was, that the Egyptians learned this rite, it is certain, that the reason of its institution was not with them the same that it was among the Jews; and therefore the circumcision itself must not be accounted the same.

Whoever looks into the life of Abraham, will soon perceive, that God did all along design him for a pattern of faith and perfect obedience to all succeeding generations. ³ The more his faith was tried, the more illustrious it became, and the more obstacles there were raised in the accomplishment of the divine promises, the more the good patriarch showed (in surmounting these obstacles) the high conception he had entertained of him from whom these promises came. For after a promise of a numerous posterity, why was it so long before he gave him any son at all? After the birth of Ishmael, why so long before the promise of an heir by his wife Sarah? And after that promise was given, who so long, even till the thing was impossible, in the ordinary course of nature, before the promise was accomplished, and the child sent? All this was to exercise his faith, and to give him an opportunity of showing to the world, how fully he was convinced, that, notwithstanding all these impediments and delays, God would certainly, by one means or other, effectually make good his promises. The like may be said of the command of circumcision. God did not only defer, for the space of twenty whole years, the birth of that son, who was so solemnly promised, and so impatiently desired, but even when that time was expired, and Abraham might now justly hope to see the promise accomplished, and his faith crowned, God was pleased to cross it again, by requiring of him the performance of an act, which, in all appearance, would be a total defeat to all his hopes. For this injunction, 'My covenant shall be in your flesh,' to a man of advanced age, seems as opposite to the promise of having a son, as that other of 'taking his son, his only son Isaac, and offering him up for a burnt-sacrifice,' was to the promise of his being the father of a numerous posterity.

But Abraham's faith triumphed over this, as well as all other obstacles. He immediately performed the operation, notwithstanding its oddness, its danger, its seeming indecency, and the apparent opposition it had to the divine promises; and it is to preserve the remembrance of the faith of their great ancestor, who, in so many discouraging circumstances, 'waited patiently on God, and against hope believed in hope,' (as the apostle expresses it,) that God prescribed to the Jewish nation the sacrament of circumcision. For this was a farther end of its institution, not only to be a mark of distinction between the posterity of Abraham and all other nations, but a token likewise of God's covenant made with him, and his posterity, and a note of commemoration to put those who bore it continually in mind whose offspring they were, and what advantages entitled to upon that account, provided they took care not to degenerate from the glories of that stock from whence they sprang.

And indeed, considering that Abraham was the first we read of whom God rescued from the general corruption of faith and manners, which the world had now a second time relapsed into; and considering, withal, that this person and his posterity were singled out for a chosen generation, the repository of truth, and the receptacle of God incarnate; there was reason in abundance, why this remembrance should be very grateful to them; and apt enough, it is plain, upon all occasions, they were to value themselves, and despise others, upon the account of so particular an honour. ⁴ But the misfortune was, the most useful part of the reflection, namely, the eminent faith and ready obedience of so renowned an ancestor, and the noble emulation of his virtues, which such a pattern ought to have inspired; this they were too apt to overlook, though any considering man (as the apostle ⁵ excellently argues) could not but perceive that the only valuable relation to Abraham is not that of consanguinity and natural descent, but the resemblance of his virtues, and claiming under him as the 'father of the faithful.'

And this suggests another, and indeed none of the least considerable ends for which circumcision was instituted, namely, to be a sign of inward virtue, and to figure out to us some particular dispositions of mind which bore resemblance to the outward ceremony, and were required to render it effectual; for which reason it is that we read so much in the old law ¹ of circumcising the foreskin of the heart, ² and hear the apostle so frequently telling us in the new, ³ of putting off the body of the sins of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ; ⁴ for he is not a Jew, who is one outwardly, neither is that circumcision which is outward in the flesh: but he is a Jew who is one inwardly: and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God.⁵

It may seem a little strange at first, perhaps, that Abraham, whose course of life was retired and philosophical, should all on a sudden commence so great a warrior, as to be able to defeat four kings at once, and their victorious armies, with a small number of his domestics, and some assistance that was given him by his neighbours. His own men were 318; and what force his confederates, the three Phœnician princes, brought to his assistance, we do not find mentioned. We may probably enough suppose, that they did not exceed his own domestics; but then we are not obliged to affirm, that he fell upon the whole body of the Assyrian army with this small retinue. This certainly would have been too bold an attempt for the little company which he commanded; and therefore the more likely supposition is, that coming up with them by night, he divided his men into two or three parties, the better to make a diversion, and conceal his strength; that with one party himself might attack the headquarters of king Chedorlaomer, where the chief feasting and revelling was kept for joy of their late victories; that with another he might fall upon those who were appointed to guard the captives and the spoil; and with a third might be beating up other quarters; so that the Assyrians, being fatigued in their late battle, surprised at finding a new enemy, and not knowing what their number or strength might be, or where their principal attack was to begin, might endeavour to save themselves by flight; which Abraham perceiving, might take the advantage of their fright, and pursue them, until he had made himself master of the prisoners and the spoil, and then retire himself, as not thinking it advisable to follow them until the daylight might discover the weakness of his forces.

All this might well enough be done by a common stratagem in war, without any miraculous interposition of providence: but it is much more likely, that the same God, ⁴ who in after ages instructed one of his posterity, even with such another little handful of men, not only to break an army of about 200,000 or 300,000, but to kill of them upon the spot, no fewer than 120,000; to disperse at least as many more; to vanquish after this a party of 15,000 that had retired in a body; and at last to take all the four kings, who were the leaders of this numerous, or rather numberless army; ⁵ it is much more likely, I say, that the God of Abraham would not be wanting to his servant in his counsels and suggestions upon this important occasion; and if a party of 300 men, under the conduct of a person every way inferior to Abraham, was by a stratagem in the night, and by the help of a sudden panic which God injected, enabled to defeat four mighty princes, and to make such a prodigious slaughter in their camp; I cannot see, why a person of that consummate wisdom, and so highly favoured by God with extraordinary monitions upon all remarkable emergencies, as Abraham was, might not, by God's advice, make use of some such stratagem as Gideon did, though the Scripture is herein silent, that the success might be imputed to the operation of faith in him, and not to the agency of second causes, or what some call the chance of war.

Of what age Isaac was, when Abraham was ordered to offer him up, is nowhere declared in Scripture. The opinion of some learned Jews, that he was but twelve years old, is ridiculous; since at that age, it would have been impossible for him to have carried such a load of wood, as was requisite upon that occasion; and others run into a contrary extreme, by supposing that he was then seven and thirty years of age, which must have been the year wherein his mother died; and yet she is said to have been alive when this transaction happened. Josephus indeed makes him five and twenty, and some Christian (both ancient and modern) commentators suppose that he was past thirty; but whatever his age might be, it is acknowledged, that he was capable of making resistance, and would certainly have done it, had he not been very well satisfied that the command came from God. To this purpose the ^a Jewish historian introduces Abraham as making a very tender and pathetic speech to his son; inspiring him with a just contempt of life; and exhorting him to a due submission to the divine order and decree; to all which Isaac attended, says our author, with a constancy and resignation becoming the son of such a father: and upon this their mutual behaviour, ⁶ a very elegant father of the Greek church has made this beautiful reflection:—"All the strength of reluctant love could not withhold the father's hands; and all the horror of a dissolution could not tempt the son to move for his own preservation. Which of the two, shall we say, deserves the precedence in our wonder and veneration? For there seems to be a religious emulation or contest between them, which should most remarkably signalize himself; the father, in loving God more than ^a The words wherein Josephus makes Abraham address his son upon this occasion are these:—"My dear son, thou hast been the child of my prayers to me, and since thy coming into the world, I have spared for nothing in thy nurture and education. There is not any happiness I have more wished for, than to see thee settled in a consummated state of age and reason; and whenever God shall take me to himself, to leave thee in possession of my authority and dominions. But since it has been the will of God, first to bestow thee upon me, and now to call thee back again, my dear son, acquit thyself generously under so pious a necessity. It is to God that thou art dedicated and delivered up on this occasion, and it is the same God that now requires thee of me, in return for all the blessings and favours he hath showered down upon us, both in war and peace. It is agreeable to the law of nature, for every one that is born, to die; and a more glorious end thou canst never have, than to fall by the hand of thy own father, a sacrifice to the God and Father of the universe, who hath rather chosen to receive thy soul into a blessed eternity, upon the wings of prayer and ardent ejaculations, than to suffer thee to be taken away in sickness, war, passion, or any other of the common chances of mankind. Consider it well, and thou wilt find, that in that heavenly station, to which thou art now called, thou mayest make thyself the support of thy aged father, and that instead of my son Isaac, I shall have God himself for my guardian."—Antiquities, b. 1. c. 14.

his own child, and the son, in the love of duty above his own life.”

This is a gallant instance of a profound submission to the divine will; and yet (not to detract from the merit of it) if we consider the matter coolly, it was no more than what many martyrs, even under the Jewish economy, equally have performed. They have given themselves up, in testimony of their love to God, to deaths as cruel as terrible, as this which Isaac was to suffer: ¹ They were stoned, were sawed asunder, were tortured; and yet they accepted not deliverance, that they might inherit a joyful resurrection.²

The metamorphosis of Lot's wife is one of the most wonderful events in Scripture; and therefore those who are unwilling, as they say, to multiply miracles without a cause, from the different senses which the words in the text are capable of, have endeavoured to affix another interpretation to them. Thus the word which we render pillar, or statue, besides its obvious signification, may, in a metaphorical sense, be applied to denote any thing that, like a pillar or stone, is immovable and hard; and according to this acceptation, these interpreters suppose that Moses might intend no more than that Lot's wife was struck dead with fear or surprise, or any other cause, and so remain motionless, like a stone.

In like manner, ² the word which we render salt, besides its common signification, does sometimes denote a dry and barren soil, such as is found about the asphaltic lake; and thus the sense of the words, applied to Lot's wife, intimates, that the place of her death was in a barren country, or in a land of salt. At other times it signifies a long space, or continuance of time, because ³ we find an everlasting covenant called a covenant of salt, (salt being therefore an emblem of eternity, because the things that are seasoned therewith continue incorrupt for many years,) and in this sense Lot's wife may be said to become an ⁴ everlasting monument of the divine displeasure, without any consideration either of the form or matter whereinto she was changed; and from these significations of the words, they draw this explication of the passage:—“That Lot's wife, either looking back upon the city when she saw it all in smoke, and fire from heaven pouring down upon it, was struck dead with the frightful sight, in a country that was afterwards barren and unfruitful: or that, not only stopping, but returning towards the city, (when the angel was gone,) she was suffocated by some poisonous vapour, and perished in the common conflagration.” And this, as they say, saves a miracle, and answers the end of providence full as well as if the woman had actually been turned into a pillar of salt, which never was, and never will be proved by any authentic testimony.

All this is plausible enough; and yet those who adhere to the literal sense of the words, have this to say in their vindication—That the vale of Siddim, where Sodom, and the other cities stood; was originally a very fruitful soil, (as most bituminous countries are,) which induced Lot to make choice of it for the pasturage of his cattle; but is at present the very reverse, a poor barren land, full of sulphur and salt-pits: and hence they infer, that all the sulphureous and saline matter, which is found in this tract of ground now, was the effect of divine vengeance, and showered down upon it, when God destroyed Sodom, and its neighbouring cities. They therefore suppose, that the woman standing still too long to behold the destruction of her country, some of that dreadful shower, in the manner of great flakes of snow, fell upon her, and clinging to her body, wrapped it all over, as it were in a sheet of nitrosulphureous matter, which congealed into a crust as hard as a stone, and made her appear like a statue or pillar of a metallic salt, having her body enclosed, and, as it were, candied all over with it. And to maintain this their hypothesis, they assert, that all indurated bodies (as chemists well know) are, as they speak, highly saturated with a saline principle, and all coagulations and concretions, in the mixture of bodies, are effected by this means: so that it was not possible to express such a transmutation as Lot's wife underwent, whether it was simply by incrustation, or by a total penetration, more properly than Moses has done. They produce instances from the best historians of several petrifications, both of men and cattle, (almost as wonderful as this of Lot's wife,) standing in the very same posture wherein they were found at the instant of their transmutation, for several generations afterwards; and, for the confirmation of this in particular, they vouch the testimony of the author of the book of Wisdom, who makes mention of a standing pillar of salt, as a monument of an unbelieving soul, and the authority of the Seventy interpreters, who expressly render it so. Among Jewish writers, they cite the words ⁵ of Josephus, who tells us, that Lot's wife, casting her eye perpetually back upon the city, and being too much concerned about it, contrary to what God had forbidden her, was turned into a pillar of salt, which I myself (as he tells us) have seen. They cite the words of Philo, who frequently takes notice of this metamorphosis, and, in his allegories of the law more particularly, declares, that for the love of Sodom, Lot's wife was turned into a stone. And among Christian writers, they produce that passage of Clemens, in his epistle to the Corinthians; ‘Lot's wife went along with him, but being of a different spirit, and not persisting in concord with him, she was therefore placed for a sign, and continues a statue of salt to this very day;’ together with the testimony of Irenæus, and several other fathers of the church.

The accounts which modern historians and travellers give us of this matter are so very different and uncertain, that we cannot so well tell where to fix our belief. Bochart, in his description of the Holy Land, tells us, that he gave himself the fatigue of a very troublesome journey to behold this statue, but was not so happy as a Most of the interpreters have observed to us, that we must not take the salt here mentioned for common salt, which water soon dissolves, and could not possibly continue long, being exposed to the wind and rain; but for metallic salt, which was hewn out of the rock like marble, and made use of in building houses, according to the testimony of several authors. Watsius, Miscell. vol. 1. and Pliny, b. 31. c. 7, tell us, that in Africa, not far from Utica, there are vast heaps of salt, like mountains, which, when once hardened by the sun and moon, cannot be dissolved with rain or any other liquor, nor penetrated with any kind of instrument made with iron.—*Heidegger's Hist. to satisfy his curiosity; for the inhabitants assured him the place was inaccessible, and could not be visited without apparent danger of death, because of the prodigious beasts and serpents that abounded there, but more especially, because of the Biduini, a very savage and inhuman sort of people, that dwelt near it; and yet, if we will believe other writers of this kind, they will tell us expressly, that there is some part of it remaining, and to be seen between Engaddi and the Dead Sea.

We will suppose however for once, that the long duration of this monument is an imposition of the inhabitants upon the credulity of strangers; yet it will not therefore follow, that there never was any such thing in being, unless we can think it inconsistent with the nature of God to work a miracle for the punishment of a wicked woman. Miracles indeed are not to be multiplied, unless there be occasion for them; but when the plain sense of the words leads us to such a construction, it is a niceness, I think, no way commendable, to endeavour to find out another, merely for the sake of avoiding the miraculousness of the fact; as if the Scriptures were more valuable for containing nothing but obvious matters, and the majesty of God any way magnified by seeming to exert as little of its omnipotent power as possible.

The short of the matter is this.—We have a clear account in a book full of wonders, of a woman confessedly guilty of disobedience and ingratitude, struck dead by the hand of God, and turned into a statue of salt, for a monument of terror to future generations. And is there any thing in this so repugnant to reason, or so incongruous for God to do, that we must immediately fly to another interpretation, and to make the matter easy, resolutely maintain that the whole purport of the thing is only this.—That the poor woman either suddenly died of a fright, or indiscreetly fell into the fire? God certainly may work a miracle when he pleases, and punish any wicked person in what manner he thinks fit; nor is there any more wonder in the metamorphosis of Lot's wife, than there was in changing the rod of Moses into a serpent. The same power might do both; and since the same history has recorded both, there is the same reason for the credibility of both. Nay, of the two, the transformation of Lot's wife seems more familiar to our conceptions,^a since we want not instances, as I said before,

^a Bisselius (in his Argon. Americ. b. 14. c. 2.) has a very remarkable story to this purpose. He tells us, that Badius Almagrus, who was the first man that ever marched an army over the mountains between Peru and Chili, by the extremity of the cold, and unwholesomeness of the air, lost in that expedition a great many men. Being obliged, however, some few months after, to return the same way, what the historian tells us upon this occasion is very wonderful. The horsemen and infantry, who five months ago were frozen to death, were still standing untouched, uncorrupted, in the same condition and shape that they were in when they were laid hold of by the sudden grasp of death, one lay flat with his face on the ground, another stood erect, a third seemed to shake the bridle, which he still retained in his hand. In a word, he found them exactly as he left them; they had no fulsome odour, and their colour was altogether different from that of corpses. In fine, unless that the soul had been long ago in another world, they were in other respects more like the living than the dead. To the like purpose it is related by Aventinus (Annor. Bavar. b. 7.), a credible historian, that in his time above fifty country people, with their cows and calves, in Carinthia, were all destroyed at once by a strong sulfoleating exhalation, which immediately after an earthquake (in the year 1348) ascended out of the earth, and reduced them to saline of persons struck with lightning, and killed with cold vapours, that have immediately petrified in the same manner.

Why she was turned into a body of salt rather than any other substance, is only resolvable into the good pleasure of God. The conjectures of Jewish writers upon this head, we acknowledge, are trifling; nor are we responsible for the reveries of such Christian commentators as would crowd in a multitude of palpable absurdities, merely to make the miracle more portentous: but why God exacted so severe a penalty for an offence so seemingly small, is not so hard to be resolved; because, according to the light wherein we are to consider this woman, her disobedience to the divine command had in it all the malignity of an obstinate and perverse mind, unthankful to God for his preservation of her, and too closely attached, if not to the wicked customs, at least to the persons and things which she had left behind her in that sink of sin and sensuality.

But there is another observation which we may draw¹ from our Saviour's application of this story, as well as² the angel's expression to Lot, namely, that she loitered by the way, if not returned to the city; and if so, it is no wonder that she suffered when she was found within the compass of the sulphureous streams from heaven; nor can God be blamed for his exemplary punishment of her, unless we think it reasonable for his providence, in this case, to have interposed, and wrought a miracle for her preservation, who had so little deserved it, and had run herself voluntarily into the jaws of destruction.

Thus we have endeavoured to vindicate the character of the patriarch Abraham, and to account for several transactions and passages in Scripture, which seem to give umbrage to infidelity during the compass of his life. And for the confirmation of all this, we might now produce the testimony of profane authors, and make it appear, that Abraham's fame for a just, virtuous, and religious man, is spoken of by Berosus in a fragment preserved³ by Josephus: that his being born in Ur of the Chaldees, his removal into Canaan, and afterwards sojourning in Egypt, is related by Eupolemus, as he is quoted⁴ by Eusebius: that the captivity of his nephew Lot, his victory over the four kings, and honourable reception by Melchizedek, king of the sacred city of Argarize, and priest of God, are recorded by the same author: that his marrying two wives, one an Egyptian, by whom he had a son, who was the father of twelve kings in Arabia, and the other a woman of his own kindred, by whom he had likewise one son, whose name in Greek was Ἰσαακ, which answers exactly to the Hebrew word Isaac; and that this Isaac he was commanded to sacrifice, but when he was going to kill him, was stopped by an angel, and offered a ram in his stead; all this is related by Antipannus, as he is quoted⁵ by the same Eusebius: that the ancient custom of circumcision is taken notice of⁶ by Herodotus, Diodorus, Strabo, and others: that the burning of Sodom and Gomorrah, and statues, such as that of Lot's wife, which he tells us were seen both by himself and by the chancellor of Austria.—Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. 1. Occasional Annotation, p. 22.

the strange waste it has made in a once most beautiful country, is described¹ by Strabo, Tacitus, and Solinus: that² Isaac's being born to a father when old, and to a mother incapable of conception, gave occasion of the story of the miraculous birth of Orion, by the help of the gods, even when his father Hyreus had no wife at all: that Lot's kind reception of the two angels in Sodom, his protecting them from the insults of the people, and escaping thereupon the destruction that befell them, are all well delineated in the common fable of Baucis and Philemon: and (to mention no more) that the fate of his wife, for her looking back upon Sodom, and her being thereupon changed into a statue of metallic salt, gave rise to the poet's fiction of the loss of Eurydice, and her remission into hell for her husband's turning to look upon her, and of Niobe's being changed into a stone for resenting the death of her children. So well has infinite wisdom provided, that the sacred truths of divine revelation should not only be supported by the attestation of all ancient history, but preserved likewise even in the vanity and extravagance of fables; for even 'they, O Lord, shew the glory of thy kingdom, and talk of thy power; that thy power, thy glory, and the mightiness of thy kingdom, might be known unto men.'

CHAP. II.—Of the Destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah.

OF all God's judgments upon the wicked, next to that of the universal deluge, the destruction of Sodom, and the neighbouring cities in the plain of Jordan, seems to be one of the most remarkable, and the most dreadful interpositions of providence; and may therefore in this place deserve a particular consideration.

That this catastrophe (as³ the apostle calls it) did really happen, according to the account which Moses gives us of it, we have the concurring testimony of all historians, both ancient and modern, to convince us.⁴ Diodorus Siculus, after having given us a description of the lake Asphaltites, (which now fills the place where these cities once stood,) acquaints us, that the adjacent country was then on fire, and sent forth a grievous smell, to which he imputes the sickly and short lives of the neighbouring inhabitants.⁵ Strabo, having made mention of the same lake, pursues his account, and tells us, that the craggy and burnt rocks, the caverns broken in, and the soil all about it adust, and turned to ashes, give credit to a report among the people, that formerly several cities stood there, (whereof Sodom was the chief,) but that by earthquakes, and fire breaking out, there were some of them entirely swallowed up, and others forsaken by the inhabitants that could make their escape.⁶ Tacitus describes the lake much in the same manner with these other historians; and then adds, that not far from it are fields, now barren, which were reported formerly to have been very fruitful, adorned with large cities which were burned by lightning, and do still retain the traces of their destruction.⁷ Solinus is clearly of opinion, that the blackness of the soil, and its being turned into dust and ashes, is a sure token of its having suffered by fire from heaven; and if we may believe the report, of⁸ a late traveller, according to the account which he had from the inhabitants themselves, some of the ruins of these ancient cities do still appear whenever the water is low and shallow.

What the number of these cities were, is a matter wherein we can have no absolute certainty. Moses, in the text, makes no mention but of two, Sodom and Gomorrah; but in another place he enumerates four, and gives this description of their dreadful punishment.⁹ 'When the generations to come shall see the plague of that land, and the sicknesses which the Lord hath laid upon it, and that the whole land thereof is brimstone, and salt, and burning like the overthrow of Sodom, and Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboim, (which the Lord overthrew in his anger, and in his wrath,) even all the nations shall say, Wherefore hath the Lord done this unto the land? Nay, if we will believe¹⁰ the historian above cited, and who perhaps might have an account of the thing from some Phœnician writer, the number of the cities which at this time were destroyed were thirteen; and to this there is a passage in the prophet, which seems to give some countenance, though not as to the precise number of them: 'As I live,' saith the Lord God to Jerusalem, 'Sodom, thy sister, has not done, she nor her daughters' (that is, the cities which were built round it, and were tributary to it) 'have not done, as thou and thy daughters have done. But whatever the number of the cities might be, it will be proper for us, before we come to inquire in what manner they were destroyed, to give some account of their situation.

¹² The plain of Jordan includes the greatest part of the flat country, through which the river Jordan runs, from its coming out of the sea of Galilee, to its falling into the Asphaltite lake, or Salt Sea. But we are not to imagine, that this plain was once a continued level, without any risings or descents. The greatest part of it indeed was champaigne country, (and for this reason was commonly called 'the great field,') but therein we read¹³ of the valley of Jericho, and¹⁴ of the vale of Siddim; in the latter of which these cities stood, in a situation so very advantageous, that we find it compared¹⁵ to the land of Egypt, even to the garden of paradise, upon account of its being so well watered. And well it might, seeing it had (as the Lacus Asphaltites has to this day) not only the streams of the river Jordan running quite through it, but¹⁶ the river Arnon from the east,¹⁷ the brook Zered, and the¹⁸ famous fountain Callirrhoe from the south, falling into it. Now, since all this water had no direct passage into the sea, it must necessarily follow, either that it was conveyed away by some subterraneous passage, or was swallowed up in the sands, that every where encompassed it; which might the more easily be done, because the inhabitants of those hot countries used to divide their rivers into several small branches, for the benefit of watering their fields.

And as this plenty of water gave great riches to the soil, and fertility to the country, so wealth and abundance of all things (as mankind are too apt to abuse God's gifts) made Sodom and the neighbouring cities very infamous for their wickedness and impiety. The prophet Ezekiel gives us a description of them: ¹ 'Behold this was the iniquity of thy sister Sodom; pride, fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness, was in her and in her daughters; neither did she strengthen the hand of the poor and needy, but was haughty, and committed abomination before me;' which ² Josephus might have in his eye when he gave us this account of them. "The Sodomites (says he) waxed proud, and, by reason of their riches and wealth, grew contumelious towards men, and impious towards God; so that they were wholly unmindful of the favours they received from him. They were inhospitable to strangers, and too proud and arrogant to be rebuked. They burned in unnatural lusts towards one another, and took pleasure in none but such as ran to the same excess of riot with themselves."

These, and other abominable enormities, provoked the Divine Ruler of the world to destroy their cities, whose cry was now grown great for vengeance; and the manner wherein it was effected, Moses has recorded in these words: ³ 'Then the Lord rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven, and he overthrew the cities, and all the plain, and all the inhabitants of the cities, and that which grew upon the ground;' and for the better understanding of this, we must observe, 1st, ⁴ That in the vale of Siddim (the tract of ground which was now destroyed) there were a great many pits of bitumen, which being a very combustible matter, ⁵ is in some places liquid, in others solid; and not only found near the surface of the earth, but lies sometimes very deep, and is dug from the very bowels of it. 2dly, We must observe, that the brimstone and fire which the Lord is said to rain upon Sodom and Gomorrah, means brimstone inflamed; that, in the Hebrew style, brimstone inflamed signifies lightning; and that the reason why lightning is thus described, no one can be ignorant of, that has either smelt the places which have been struck with thunder, or read what learned men have wrote upon the subject. 3dly, We must observe further, that God is not only said to have 'rained down brimstone and fire,' but brimstone and fire from the Lord; where the addition of 'from the Lord,' which at first sight may appear to be superfluous, or to denote a plurality of persons in the Deity, (as most Christian interpreters would have it,) does more particularly describe the thunderbolt, ^b which by the Hebrews, as well as other nations, is frequently called the fire of God, the fire from God, &c.; and the reason is,—Because, men having no power over this kind of meteor, and it being impossible for them, by any kind of contrivance, to ascend up to the clouds, God is therefore supposed to dwell there, and to cast down his bolts from thence.

Now, from these observations put together, we may, in some measure, form a notion to ourselves, how this destruction came to be effected. For though Moses does not inform us, after what manner the lightning and thunderbolts from above subverted these cities and their adjacent territories; yet, since he plainly makes mention of them, we cannot comprehend how it could happen any otherwise than that the lightning and thunderbolts, falling in great abundance upon some pits of bitumen, ^c the veins of that combustible matter took fire immediately, and as the fire penetrated into the lowermost bowels of the bituminous soil, these wicked cities were subverted by a dreadful earthquake, which was followed with a subsiding of the ground; and that, ^d as soon as the earth was sunk, it would unavoidably fall out, that the waters running to this place in so great an abundance, and mixing with the bitumen, which they found in great plenty, would make a lake of what was a valley before, and a lake of the same quality with what ^e the Scripture calls the Salt Sea.

This lake, according to the account we have of it, is enclosed to the east and west with exceedingly high mountains; on the north it is bounded by the plain of Jericho, on which side it receives the waters of Jordan;

uses the same expression, ch. lxvi. 16. 'He shall be punished with the fire of the Lord;' to which the passage in the Latin poet exactly agrees.—'He, swifter than the bolt of Jove and the speed of falling stars, leaped from the dreary banks,' Stat. Theb. l. 1. Some however have remarked it, as a peculiar elegance in the Hebrew tongue, that it very often makes use of the antecedent instead of the relative, or the noun instead of the pronoun, especially when it means to express a thing with great vehemence, or to denote any action to be supernatural or miraculous.—Heidegger's Hist. Patriar. vol. 2. Essay 8.

^c In Lycia, the Hephæstian mountains, says Pliny (b. 2. c. 106) if you do but touch them with a lighted torch, immediately take fire; nay, the very stones in the rivers and sands in the waters burn. If you take a stick out of these waters, and draw furrows upon the ground with it (according to the common report) a tract of fire follows it.—Le Clerc's Dissertation.

^d Strabo in his first, and Pliny in his second book, will furnish us with several examples of this kind. Strabo, out of Posidonius, tells us, (p. 40.) that "in Phœnicia, a certain city situated above Sidon, was absorbed by an earthquake; and out of Demetrius Scepsius, that several earthquakes have happened in Asia Minor, by which whole towns have been devoured, the mountain Siphylis overthrown, and the marshes turned into standing lakes;" and Pliny (b. 2. c. 88) testifies, that "by a fire which suddenly broke out of it, the mountain Eppos was levelled to the ground, and a town buried in the deep; for the arch that supported the ground, breaking in, the matter underneath being wholly consumed, the soil above must of necessity sink and be swallowed up in these caverns, if they were of any large extent.—Le Clerc's Dissertation.

^e The account given in the text of the Salt or Dead Sea differs somewhat, though not much, from the descriptions of modern travellers. According to the analysis of Dr Marceet, the specific gravity of the water is 1.211, that of fresh water being 1.000. Thus it is able to support bodies that would sink elsewhere. It is impregnated with mineral substances, and a fetid air often exhales from the water. Recent travellers may have found a few shellfish on the shore, or seen a few birds cross its waves; but these form only exceptions to the general absence of animal life. Every thing around bears that dreary and fearful character that marks the malediction of Heaven.

^a Thus thunder and lightning, says Pliny, (b. 25. c. 15.) have the smell of brimstone, and the very light and flame of them is sulphurous. And Seneca (Quæst. Nat. b. 2. c. 21.) tells us, that all things which are struck by lightning have a sulphurous smell; as indeed our natural philosophers have plainly demonstrated, that what we call the thunderbolt, is nothing else but a sulphurous exhalation. Persius, in his second satire, calls it sulphur sacrum.—"When it thunders, the oak is not more rapidly rent asunder by the sacred sulphury flame than you and your house." And for this reason the Greeks, in their language, call brimstone divine, because the thunderbolt, which it assimilates, is supposed to come from God.—Le Clerc's Dissertation.

^b Thus, in the second book of Kings, 'THE FIRE OF GOD came down from heaven and devoured them,' ch. i. 12. And Isaiah on the south it is open, and extends beyond the reach of the eye, being twenty-four leagues long, and six or seven broad. Its water is extremely deep and heavy; so heavy, that a man cannot, without difficulty, sink in it; but of so nauseous a taste, and noisome smell, that neither fish nor fowl, unaccustomed to the water, can live in it. It is full of bitumen, which at uncertain seasons boils up from the bottom in bubbles, at which time the superficies of the lake swells, and resembles the rising of a hill. Adjoining to the lake are fields, which formerly (as we showed from Tacitus) were fruitful, but are now so parched, and burned up, that they have lost their fertility, inasmuch, that every thing, whether it grow spontaneously, or be planted by man, whether it be herb, fruit, or flower, ^a as soon as it is compressed, moulders away immediately into dust; and to this ¹ the author of the book of Wisdom seems to allude, when he tells us, that ‘of the wickedness of those cities, the waste land that smoketh to this day is a testimony, and the plants bearing fruit, that never come to ripeness.’

“The cinders, brimstone, and smoke,” ² says Philo, “and a certain obscure flame, as it were of a fire burning, still perceivable in some parts of the country, are memorials of the perpetual evil which happened to it:” and, as ³ Josephus adds, “the things that are said of Sodom are confirmed by ocular inspection, there being some relics of the fire, which came down from heaven, and some resemblance of the five cities, still to be seen.” And it is the duration of these monuments of divine wrath perhaps, which gave occasion to St Jude to say, that the wicked inhabitants of these cities were ‘set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of an eternal fire,’ that is, of a fire, whose marks were to be perpetuated unto the end of the world: ^b for it is a common thing in Scripture, to express a great and irreparable vastation, whose effects and signs shall be permanent to the latest ages, by the word αἰώνιος, which we here render eternal.

Thus, in all probability, were the cities of the plain of Jordan overthrow; nor is there any doubt to be made but that the miraculous hand of God was employed in sending down this heavy judgment. For ‘though in a soil impregnated with bitumen, the cities which are built thereupon may be shaken with an earthquake, and swallowed up by a sudden hiatus; though thunderbolts may fall, and set the veins of sulphur and bitumen on fire, which afterwards breaking out, and mingling with the water, may, in a low valley, easily cause a lake, full of asphaltus: though these things, I say, in process of time might have come to pass in an ordinary course of nature; yet, if they were done before their natural causes were in a disposition to produce them; if they would not have been done that instant, unless it had been for some extraordinary interposition of God or his blessed angels; it ought to be reputed no less a miracle than if every particular in the transaction had plainly surpassed the usual operations of nature. And that the judgment now before us happened in this manner, ⁵ the two angels despatched by Almighty God, upon this important occasion, ⁶ God’s foretelling Abraham his design, the angel’s acquainting Lot with the errand about which they came, and their urging and instigating him to be gone, ⁷ to make haste and ‘escape to Zoar, because they could do nothing until he was come thither,’ are arguments sufficiently convincing, that the thunder and lightning, or (as ⁸ others will have it), the showers of liquid fire, or rather ⁹ storms of nitre and sulphur, mingled with fire, which fell upon these wicked places, were immediately sent down by the appointment of God, and by the ministry of his angels, who, knowing all the meteors of the air, and their repugnant qualities, did collect, commix, and employ them, as they thought fit, in the execution of God’s just judgment upon a people devoted to destruction.

Thus we have considered the manner of the destruction of the cities of the plain, how far natural causes might be concerned, and wherein the miraculous hand of God did intervene. Whether a deluge or a conflagration be the more formidable judgment of the two, we cannot tell; our imaginations will hardly reach the dreadfulness of either; and to enter into the comparison, is a task too shocking. As the history, however, of those who suffered these punishments, is recorded in Scripture for our admonition, ¹⁰ ‘that we should not lust after evil things even as they lusted;’ so the apostle has set both their examples before us, and laid it down for a sure proposition,—That ¹¹ ‘if God spared not the old world, but brought in a flood upon the ungodly, and if he, turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes, condemned them with an overthrow,’ or (according to ¹² St Jude) condemned them to ‘the vengeance of eternal fire;’ we need not doubt, but that, as he is in all ages the same, a God of justice, as well as mercy, no iniquity can ultimately escape. For though, upon every occasion, he does not lay bare his vindictive arm, though ¹³ ‘he is strong and patient, so that he seldom whetteth his sword, and prepareth the instruments of death;’ yet a few of these remarkable, these monumental instances of his severity against sin, are enough to convince us, that ‘he hath reserved the unjust (however they may escape now) unto the day of judgment to be punished.’

³ De Bello Jud. b. 5. c. 27.

^a Whether there be any truth in this part of the account of Tacitus, it is hard to tell. As for the apples of Sodom (to which he seems to allude) Mr Maundrell tells us, that he never saw nor heard of any thereabouts, nor was there any tree to be seen near the lake from which one might expect such kind of fruit; and therefore he supposes the being, as well as the beauty of that fruit, a mere fiction, and only kept up because it served for a good allusion, and now and then helped poets to a pat similitude.—Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem.

^b Thus God threatens to make the people of Israel ‘a perpetual desolation,’ Ezek. xxxv. 9; ‘a perpetual hissing,’ Jer. xviii. 16; and ‘an everlasting reproach,’ Jer. xxiii. 40; and this more especially is threatened where the destruction of a city or nation is compared to the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah; ‘it shall never be inhabited,’ Isa. xlii. 20. Whether Sodom really underwent this fate or sometime after was rebuilt, is a question that has exercised the learned. It is certain, that in the Notitia, express mention is made of Sodom, as an episcopal city; and among the bishops of Arabia, there is found one Severus, a bishop of Sodom, who subscribed to the first council of Nice; Mr Renaud, however, cannot persuade himself that this impious place was ever rebuilt; and therefore he believes that the word Sodom, which is read among the subscriptions of that council, must be a fault of the copiers.—Calmet’s Dictionary on the word Sodom.

CHAP. I.—Of the Life of Isaac from his Marriage to his Death.

THE HISTORY.

ISAAC was forty years old ^a when he married Rebecca, the daughter of Bethuel; but his mother Sarah's misfortune attended his wife, namely, that she was without issue for almost twenty years together, till God at last was pleased to hear ^b his earnest prayers, and grant him the blessing he so much longed for. Rebecca, however, had not many months conceived before the struggles of the two children (for she had twins) in her womb, gave her such pain and uneasiness, that she began, in a manner, to wish herself not with child again; and when she went ^c to consult the divine oracle, what the meaning of this uncommon conflict might be, she had it returned for answer, that the two children which she then bore, were

^a How old Rebecca was when she was married to Isaac, the Scripture does nowhere inform us; but the conjectures of most of the Jewish commentators make her to be extremely young. The oldest that they will allow her to be, is not above fourteen, which was a thing hardly customary in those days; and yet, considering her absolute management of all affairs, even when Isaac was alive, we cannot but suppose, that although she lived not so long, she was a considerable deal younger than he.—Heidegger's Hist. Patriar. vol. 2. Essay 11.

^b The word in the original signifies to pray with constancy, vehemence, and importunity; and the Jews hereupon have a traditional explication, which is preserved in Jonathan's Targum, namely, that he carried his wife to the place of the altar, upon mount Moriah, where he himself was once bound to be sacrificed, and there made a most solemn invocation, by the faith of his father Abraham, and by the oath of God, that she, though barren by nature, might conceive by virtue of the covenant and supernatural blessing; and accordingly he prevailed with God to grant him his request. What we render 'for his wife,' may likewise signify in the presence of his wife; and so the import of the words will be, that besides their more private devotions, they did oftentimes, in a more solemn manner, and with united force, pray for the mercy wherein they were equally concerned: nor could there be any presumption in their thus petitioning what at present was denied them, because they knew very well, that God's purpose and promise did not exclude, but rather require the use of all convenient means for their accomplishment.—Pool's Annotations, and Bibliotheca Biblica in locum.

^c The most early and common method of inquiring of the Lord, was, by going to some one of his prophets, and consulting him; but then the question is, who the prophet was whom Rebecca, upon this occasion, consulted? Some of the Jewish doctors are of opinion, that she went to the school, or oratory of Shem, (whom they suppose then alive,) or to some other person, constituted by him, and called of God to that ministration. Some Christian commentators imagine, it was Melchizedek 'the priest of the Most High God' whom she consulted; but if it were any priest or prophet, that then she applied to, her father-in-law, Abraham, who was certainly then alive, and is expressly called 'a prophet,' Gen. xx. 7, seems to have been the most proper person, not only because he was highly interested in her concerns, but had likewise the Sherhinah, or Divine appearance (as most imagine) continually resident with him. But as there was another manner besides that of answering by prophets, customary in those days, namely, by dreams and visions, their opinion seems to be most probable, who suppose, that Rebecca retired into some secret place, and there having poured out her soul before God in ardent prayers, received an answer, not long after, either in a dream or vision, by a voice from heaven, or by the information of an angel sent for that purpose.—See Le Clerc's Commentary, Bibliotheca Biblica in locum, and Heidegger's Hist. Patriar. vol. 2. Essay 11.

to be the heads of two different nations, should long contest it for superiority, but that at length the younger should get the dominion over the elder.

When the appointed time for their birth was come, the child which Rebecca was first delivered of, was all covered over with red hair, for which reason his parents ^d called him Esau; and the other came after him so very close, that he took hold of his heel with his hand, and was therefore called Jacob, to denote (what he afterwards proved) the supplanter of his brother; and as they advanced in years, their tempers and occupations were quite different. Esau was a strong and active person, who delighted much in hunting, and thereby supplying his father with venison very frequently, won his particular affection; while Jacob, who was of a more gentle and courteous disposition, by staying at home in the tent, and employing himself in family offices, became his mother's darling.

One day, when Jacob had made him some lentil pottage, Esau, returning from his sport, quite spent with hunger and fatigue, was so taken with the looks of it, that he earnestly desired his brother ^e to let him eat with him; but his brother, it seems, being well instructed by his mother, refused to do it, unless he would make him an immediate deduction of his birthright. Esau, considering to what a multitude of dangers his manner of life, in encountering wild beasts, did daily expose him, made no great esteem of what Jacob required; and Jacob, perceiving his disposition to comply, (that he might have the right more firmly conveyed to him) ^f proposed his doing it by way of oath, which the other never scrupled, and after the bargain was made, fell to eating very greedily, never once reflecting on what a vile and scandalous thing it needs must be, to sell his birthright, and ^g all the great privileges thereunto belonging, for a mess of pottage.

^d The meaning of the word Esau is somewhat obscure, unless we derive it from Hassoh, to make or be perfect; because he was of a stronger constitution than ordinary infants, as having hair all over him, which is an indication of manhood, whereas other children are born with hair only on their heads; and as for Jacob, it is derived from an Hebrew word, which signifieth supplant, and by the addition of the letter Jod, one of the formatives of nouns, it denotes a supplanter, or one that taketh hold of, and trippeeth up his brother's heel.—Pool's Annotations, and Universal History, c. 7.

^e Lentils were a kind of pulse, somewhat like our vetches, or coarser sort of pease. St Austin, upon Psalm lxxi. says, that these were Egyptian lentils, which were in great esteem, and very probably gave the pottage a red tincture.—The inhabitants of Barbary still make use of lentils boiled and stewed with oil and garlic, a pottage of a chocolate colour; this was the red pottage for which Esau, from thence called Edom, sold his birthright.—Shaw's Travels, p. 110.—Ed.

^f Some imagine that Esau did not know what this lentil soup was, and therefore he only called it by its colour, 'give me of that red, that same red,' as it is in the Hebrew; for which reason he was likewise called Edom, which signifies red. But there is no occasion to suppose, that he was ignorant of what lentils were, only his repeating the word red, without adding the name of a thing, denoted his great hunger, and eagerness of appetite, which was probably still more irritated by the colour of the soup.—Bibliotheca Biblica.

^g The birthright, or right of primogeniture, had many privileges annexed to it. The first-born was consecrated to the Lord, Exod. xxii. 29; had a double portion of the estate allotted him, Dent. xxi. 17; had a dignity and authority over his brethren, Gen. xlix. 3; succeeded in the government of the family or kingdom, 2 Chron. xxi. 3; and as some with good reason

In Abraham's time the famine was so severe in Canaan, that he was forced to remove into Egypt; and upon the same account his son Isaac had now left his habitation, near the well Lahairoi, and was come as far as Gerar, ^a where Abimelech at this time was king, in order to proceed in his journey; but while he was deliberating what to do, God admonished him in a dream not go down into Egypt, but to tarry in the country where he then was; and at the same time assured him, that he would not only secure him from the danger of the famine, but, in performance of the oath which he had sworn to his father Abraham, his faithful and obedient servant, would cause his family (to which he would give the whole land of Canaan in possession, and from which the Messias, the desire of all nations, should descend) to multiply exceedingly.

Isaac, according to the divine direction, went no farther than Gerar; and here it was that he fell into the same weakness that his father had formerly done in the same place, namely, his making his wife pass for his sister, for fear that some wicked man or other might be tempted to destroy him, in order to enjoy her. But so it was, that the king, from his window, observing some familiarities pass between them that did not so well comport with the character of a brother, sent for him immediately, complained of his dissimulation, charged him with being married, and (not unmindful, very probably, of what had befallen the nation upon the account of Sarah) with a design of entailing guilt, and therewith a judgment of God upon his subjects, in case any attempt had been made upon her virtue. Fear of death, and the desire of self-preservation, were the only apology that Isaac made for his conduct; which Abimelech was pleased to accept, and accordingly issued out an edict that none, upon pain of death, should dare to offer any injury, either to Isaac or his wife.

The great accession of wealth, however, wherewith God had blessed him during his stay in Gerar, raised the envy and indignation of the Philistines. That very year wherein he thought of going down into Egypt for fear of the famine, he sowed a piece of ground, and to the great surprise of his neighbours, received ^b an hundredfold imagine, succeeded to the priesthood, or chief government in matters ecclesiastical. He had a right to challenge the particular blessing of his dying parent. He had the covenant which God made with Abraham, that from his loins Christ should come, consigned to him. And, what is more, these prerogatives were not confined to his person only, but descended to his latest posterity, in case they comported themselves so as to deserve them.—Paul's Annotations, and Le Clerc's Commentary.

^a It is not unlikely that this Abimelech might be the son of that Abimelech, king of Gerar, with whom Abraham had formerly made a covenant, supposing Abimelech to be here the proper name of a man. But it is much more probable, that at this time it was a common name for the king of the Philistines, as Caesar was for the Roman emperors, and Pharaoh for the kings of Egypt.

^b This hundredfold increase in one year was given by God unto Isaac for a sign of his purpose to fulfil the covenant made with his father, and lately renewed to him; particularly for the confirmation of the truth and reason of the warning against his going down to Egypt, as he was inclined, according to the natural prospect of things. Such an increase was at this time a singular blessing of God, after there had been a considerable dearth; and the soil perhaps that afforded so large a crop not so rich; otherwise we may learn from Varro (De Re Rustica, l. 1. c. 41.) that in Syria, near Gadera, and in Africa, about Byzacium, they produce from it; so that Abimelech's subjects began all to malign him, and, to oblige him to depart the country, filled up the wells which his father's servants had digged.^c Nay, the very king himself, to satisfy the resentment of his people, desired of him to leave the city of Gerar, and to find him out another habitation; for that, in his opinion, ^d he had improved his fortune sufficiently while he had been among them: so that, to secure himself, as well as make the king easy, he retired into the valley of Gerar, where his father had formerly fed his cattle, and there began to open the wells which his father had caused to be dug, but the Philistines had filled up, and called them by their ancient names. But the people of the country, thinking him too well situated there, quarrelled with his shepherds, took away their wells, and put him to many inconveniences; so that being quite tired with their repeated insults, he removed farther from them, and went and lived in the most distant parts of their country.

Here it was that he dug another well; and meeting with no opposition, called it Rehoboth, that is, room, or enlargement, because God had now delivered him from the straits and difficulties he had lately been in, by reason reaped an hundred bushels from one; nay, Bochart (in Canaan, b. 1. c. 25.) shows from several good authors, that some places in Africa are so very fruitful, that they produce two or three hundred fold, which makes this account of Moses far from being incredible. (Bibliotheca Biblica, and Patrick's Commentary.) The author of the history of the piratical state of Barbary observes, that the Moors of that country are divided into tribes like the Arabians, and like them dwell in tents, formed into itinerant villages: that "these wanderers farm lands of the inhabitants of the towns, sow and cultivate them, paying their rent with the produce, such as fruits, corn, wax, &c. They are very skilful in choosing the most advantageous soils for every season, and very careful to avoid the Turkish troops, the violence of the one little suiting the simplicity of the other," p. 44. It is natural to suppose that Isaac possessed the like sagacity when he sowed in the land of Gerar, and received that year an hundredfold. His lands appear to have been hired of the fixed inhabitants of the country. On this account the king of the country might, after the reaping of the crop, refuse his permission a second time, and desire him to depart.—Harmer, vol. 1. p. 85.—Ed.

^c The same mode of taking vengeance which is here mentioned, has been practised in ages subsequent to the time here referred to. Niebuhr (Travels, p. 302.) tells us, that the Turkish emperors pretend to a right to that part of Arabia that lies between Mecca and the countries of Syria and Egypt, but that their power amounts to very little. That they have, however, garrisons in divers little citadels built in that desert, near the wells that are made on the old road from Egypt and Syria to Mecca, which are intended for the greater safety of their caravans. But in a following page (p. 330) he gives us to understand, that these princes have made it a custom to give annually to every Arab tribe which is near that road, a certain sum of money and a certain number of vestments, to keep them from destroying the wells that lie in that route.—Harmer, vol. 4. p. 247.—Ed.

^d The words of Abimelech, according to our translation, are these, 'Thou art much mightier than we;' but certainly he could not mean that Isaac was more powerful than the whole people of Palestine, or that he had a larger family or more numerous attendants than himself had, and consequently was in a condition, if he had been so minded, to disturb the government. This we can by no means conceive to be possible; and therefore the words in the original (eignatsampta minennu) do not mean, 'because thou art mightier than we,' but 'because thou art increased, and multiplied from us, or by us,' that is, thou hast got a great deal by us; while thou hast continued amongst us, thou hast made a great accession to thy substance, and we do not care to let thee get any more; so that the Philistines did not fear him, but envy him; they grudged that he should get so much among them, and therefore desired him to absent their country.—Shuckford's Connection, vol. 2. b. 8.

of a scarceness of water, and not long after settled his constant abode at Beersheba; where he had no sooner arrived, but that very night God appeared to him in a vision, promising him his favour and protection, and that he would bless him, and multiply his seed for his servant Abraham's sake: so that Isaac, intending to continue here, built him an altar and place of religious worship, and cleared out the well ^a which his father had formerly dug.

Nor had he been long here before Abimelech, conscious of the peculiar manner wherein God had blessed him, sensible of the ill usage he had received from his subjects, and apprehensive, perhaps, that in time he might think of revenging the injuries he had suffered, came attended with ^b the chief of his nobility, and with the captain-general of his forces, either to renew the old league which had formerly been made with his father Abraham, or to enter into a new one.

It was but proper that Isaac, upon this occasion, should in some measure resent the indignities that were offered him: and therefore at first he expostulates the matter with them, and seems to wonder why they came to visit him whom they had so lately expelled their country. Abimelech made the best excuse for their behaviour that the nature of the thing would bear; told him, that he had all along perceived that the divine favour attended him in all his undertakings, and that therefore, that he might not be thought to oppose God, he was come to renew the covenant depending between his people and Abraham's posterity, and was ready to engage in the same conditions and obligations. This speech, so full of submission and acknowledgments, soon pacified Isaac, who was naturally of a quiet and easy disposition; so that, having entertained the king and his attendants in a very respectful and generous manner that night, the next morning ^c they confirmed the league with the usual ceremonies, and Abimelech took leave and returned home: but before he departed, Isaac's servants brought him word, that in the well which they had been clearing out, and which Abraham in former times had bought of the king of Gerar, they had happily found a spring of water, for which reason, in the hearing of Abimelech and all the company, he called it again by the name of Beersheba, the well of the oath, "that is, the well wherein water was discovered on the day that Abimelech and I entered into a treaty of peace, and ratified the same with the solemnity of oaths."

By this time Isaac's two sons were arrived at the age of forty; and Esau, who had contracted an acquaintance with the people of the land, had married two wives, Judith, the daughter of Beeri, and Bethshemath, the daughter of Elon, both Hittites, which was no small affliction to his parents. This in a manner quite alienated his mother's heart from him; but as for his father, his affections continued the same. And therefore, finding himself grow old and feeble, and his eyes quite dim with age, and apprehending his death to be nearer than really it was, he called him one day, and declared to him his purpose of giving him his paternal benediction before he died; but wished him withal to take his hunting instruments, and go into the fields, and kill him a little venison, and dress it to his palate, that when he had eaten thereof, and refreshed nature, he might bless him with a more tender affection, as well as a more becoming pathos.

Rebecca overheard all this discourse; and as soon as Esau was well gone, she called Jacob, and acquainted him with what was transacting; that his father was going to bestow a benediction, which was final and irrevocable, upon his brother; but that, if he would listen to her, and do what she ordered him, she had an expedient, by substituting him in his room, to turn aside the blessing where she desired it. Jacob was willing enough to comply with his mother's request; but if he was to personate his brother, the difference of his skin and voice made him apprehensive that his father might discover the imposture, and thereupon be provoked, instead of his prayers and best wishes, to load him with imprecations. But so confident was his mother of success in this matter, that she took all the curses upon herself, and encouraged him to follow her directions. Hereupon Jacob hastened to the fold, and brought two fat kids from thence, which his mother immediately took, and dressed the choice pieces of them with savoury sauce, like venison: and so having covered his neck and his hands with the skins of the kids, ^d and arrayed him with Esau's best robes, ^e she sent him in trembling with the dish to his father.

^a The reasons that induced Isaac to open the old wells, rather than dig new ones, might be, 1. Because he was sure to find a spring there, which he could not be certain of in other places; 2. Because it was easier, and less liable to censure and envy; 3. Because he had a right to them, as they were his father's purchase and property; and 4. Because he was minded to preserve and do honour to his father's memory, for which reason he called them by the same names that his father had done before him.—Bibliotheca Biblica, in locum.

^b The two that are mentioned here are Phicol and Ahazzah. Phicol is of the same name, and bore the same office which he had who is mentioned ch. xxi. 22; but we must not suppose that he was the same man, any more than Abimelech was the same king. The word properly signifies face or head; and as the captain-general is head of the forces he commands, so some have imagined that it is the appellative name (like that of tribune, or dictator, among the Romans) for every one among them that were advanced to that dignity. And in like manner, though the Septuagint seem to make Ahazzah a proper name, and call him the para-nymph, or bride-man, to Abimelech, which was always accounted a post of the first honour; yet I shall rather choose, with Onkelos, to make the word signify 'a train, or great number of nobility which came in attendance on Abimelech, and to do the patriarch the greater honour upon this occasion.—Le Clerc's Commentary, and Howell's History.

^c The articles were agreed upon over night, and, by a mutual oath, ratified in the morning. And the reason why men took public oaths in the morning fasting, seems to have been ob reverentiam juramenti, as the Jews call it, because they looked upon them as very solemn and sacred things.—Bibliotheca Biblica.

^d Gen. xxvii. 16. 'Put the skin of the kids of the goats.' It is observed by Bochart, that in the eastern countries goat's hair was very like to that of men; so that Isaac might very easily be deceived, when his eyes were dim, and his feeling no less decayed than his sight.

^e The Jews have a fancy, that it was the robe of Adam, which had been transmitted down from father to son, in the line of blessing, as they call it, till it came to Abraham, who left it to Isaac, and he designing Esau, as his eldest, for his successor, gave it to him. Some of them imagine, that it was a sacerdotal habit, wherein Esau, in his father's illness, was supposed to officiate, and for this reason it might be kept in Isaac's tent, near to which, very likely, was the place of religious worship. In all probability it was a vestment of some distinction, which the heir of the family, upon some solemn occasions, was used to put on; and Jacob being at this time to personate his brother, there was a necessity for him to have it. But how his mother should come by it, or why she should have the keeping of it, when Esau had wives of his own, is a question that Musculus raises, and then

A. M. 2148. A. C. 1856; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 3418. A. C. 1903. GEN. CH. XXV. 20—XXVIII. 8.

His father was lying upon the bed when Jacob entered the room, and upon his demanding who he was, he roundly answered, that he was his elder son Esau, who had brought him some venison to eat. Surprised at the great expedition he had made, and not knowing indeed what to think, the old man put several times the question to him, whether he was in reality his son Esau or no? to which he as often answered in the affirmative and desired him, in short, to arise, and taste of what he had prepared for him, since God, who knew his zeal to obey his father, had brought it into his hands much sooner than he could otherwise have expected.

The difference between Jacob's and Esau's voice was so remarkable, that Isaac could not but suspect some delusion in the case; and therefore he desired him to draw nearer, that he might be the better satisfied; and when he had felt the hairy skin on his hands and neck, he owned that 'the hands were the hands of Esau, though the voice was the voice of Jacob.'

Thus satisfied, or rather thus deluded, he arose, and ate heartily of his son's pretended venison; and as soon as he had dined, and drank a a cup or two of wine, he bid him draw near, that he might now bestow upon him his promised blessing. The smell of Jacob's garments contributed not a little to Isaac's cheerfulness. He smelled and praised them. In a kind of ecstasy of pleasure, he embraced and kissed his pretended first-born; and after having b wished him all heavenly and earthly blessings, he at length dismissed him.

Jacob was scarce got out of the tent, when Esau, having returned from hunting, and just made ready his venison, came and invited his father, in the same dutiful manner that his brother had done. Surprised at this address, his father asked who he was? and, when he understood that it was his elder son Esau, he was quite in a maze, and began to inquire who, and where that person was, who had been there before, and taken away the blessing which he neither could nor would revoke. Esau, too well perceiving that it must have been Jacob who had thus supplanted him, complains of his double perfidy: first, in extorting his birthright from him, and now in robbing him of his father's blessing; and then seems to wonder very much that his father's store should be so far exhausted, as (since he would not revoke the other) not to have reserved one blessing for him.

Isaac was willing enough to gratify his son's request; and it grieved him, no doubt, to hear his bitter lamentations; but what could he do? all the choicest of his blessings he had bestowed upon Jacob; and as they were gone he could not recall them. However, that he might in some measure pacify Esau, by the same prophetic spirit he acquaints him, "That though c his posterity should not enjoy a very plentiful country, yet they should become a great people, and mighty warriors, who should live by the dint of their sword; and though they should sometimes become subject to the descendants of Jacob, yet, in process of time, they would d shake off their yoke and erect a dominion of their own.

Esau was now become so sensible of what he had lost by the fraud and deceptions of his brother, that he was resolved, at a proper season, to be revenged on him. His regard to his father would not permit him to express his resentment in any violent act as yet; but as he supposed that he could not live long, he was determined to kill his brother, as soon as his father was dead. Some speeches of this kind had accidentally dropped from him, which were brought to his mother's ears. Whereupon she acquainted her favourite son with the bloody design his brother had conceived against him; told him that the wisest way would be for him to withdraw somewhere, c The words in our translation carry a sense quite different to what we have here suggested; 'Behold thy dwelling shall be of the fatness of the earth, and of the dew of heaven.' But besides that this makes the blessing the same with that which was given to Jacob, ver. 28, which Isaac professes himself incapable of doing; it is manifest, that Idumea, where the descendants of Esau dwelt, was far from being a fat and fruitful country. Had it been so, there had not been that reason for the subsequent words, 'by thy sword thou shalt live;' for a rich and plentiful country would have secured them from living by spoil and plunder, as it is manifest the people of that country did, if we can credit the character which Josephus, both in his history of the Antiquities, b. 13, and of the Wars of the Jews, b. 4, gives us of them.—Le Clerc's Commentary; and Universal History.

d The Edomites, or Idumæans, who were the posterity of Esau, for a considerable time were a people of much more power and authority than the Israelites, till, in the days of David, they were entirely conquered, 2 Sam. viii. 14: they were thereupon governed by deputies or viceroys appointed by the kings of Judah: and whenever they attempted to rebel, were for a long time crushed, and kept under by the Jews. In the days of Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, they expelled their viceroy, and set up a king of their own, 2 Kings viii. 20; and though they were reduced at that time, yet for some generations after this, they seemed to have lived independent on the Jews; and when the Babylonians invaded Judea, they not only took part with them, but violently oppressed them, even when the enemy was withdrawn; so that, remembering what they had suffered under Joab in the days of David, they entered into the like cruel measures against the Jews, and threatened to lay Jerusalem level with the ground. Their animosity against the posterity of Jacob seems indeed to be hereditary; nor did they ever cease, for any considerable time, from broils and contentions, until they were conquered by Hyrcanus, and reduced to the necessity of embracing the Jewish religion, or quitting their country. Hereupon, consenting to the former, they were incorporated with the Jews, and became one nation; so that in the first century after Christ, the name of Idumean was lost, and quite disused.—Le Clerc's Commentary, and Universal History, b. 1. c. 4.

answers it, by saying,—That because Esau had married these wives without the consent of his parents, especially his mother, she, for this reason, refused to give it him, and perhaps reserved it for this very occasion. But, in my opinion, there seems to be no necessity for this supposition, since it was sufficient for her purpose, that she knew where it was in Esau's apartment.—Bibliotheca Biblica, in locum.

a There is a tradition among the Jews, that Jacob having omitted to bring wine for his father, an angel prepared it and brought it into his apartment; that he gave it into Jacob's hands, and Jacob poured it out for his father; that the wine was the same with the wine of paradise, which had been laid up from the beginning; and that his father, having drank of it, kissed him, and blessed him, as one now filled with the Spirit, even with the Spirit of prophecy and blessing. But the custom of the Jewish doctors is to magnify every little matter.

b The prayer which Josephus makes Isaac offer up to God upon this occasion is in words to this effect. "Eternal God, the Creator of all things that are made; thou hast been so gracious and beautiful to my father, to myself, and to our offspring, promising, and possessing us of all things, and giving us assurances of greater blessings to come: Lord, make thy words good to us by effects, and do not despise thy servant for his present infirmities, which make him the more sensible of his need of thy support. Preserve this child from all evil in thy mercy and infinite goodness: give him a long and happy life: bless him with all worldly enjoyments that may be for his good: and make him a terror to his enemies, and an honour and comfort to his friends."—Antiq. b. 7. c. 13.

A. M. 2148. A. C. 1856; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 3418. A. C. 1923. GEN. CH. XXV. 20.—XXVIII. 8.

until his fury was assuaged: and the properest place for that purpose would be his uncle Laban's, in Mesopotamia; that thither he might retire a little while, and as soon as his brother's passion was over, she would not fail to recall him; that to part with him indeed was no small affliction to her, but nothing comparable to the misery that would ensue, if in one day she should be bereaved of them both; of him by the hand of his brother, and of his brother, by the hand of justice.

Jacob, who was of a mild, if not of a timorous temper, readily complied with his mother's proposal; but then his father's consent was to be had; and this Rebecca undertook to obtain by artful insinuations to her husband, that Esau's Hittite wives were a perpetual grief and trouble to her; that the whole comfort of her life would be lost, if Jacob should chance to marry in the like unhappy manner; and therefore, to prevent this disaster, she thought it not amiss, if she might have but his approbation therein, that he should go to her brother Laban's in Mesopotamia, and there see if he could fancy any one of his daughters for a wife.

Isaac was unacquainted with the main drift of her discourse; but being himself a pious man, and knowing that the promise made to Abraham, and renewed in him, was to be completed in the issue of Jacob, called him to him, and upon his blessing, gave him a strict charge not to marry with any Canaanitish woman, but to go to Padan-Aram, to the house of his uncle Laban, and there provide himself with a wife; which if he did, "God would bless him," he said, "and raise him up a numerous posterity, and give that posterity the possession of that very country, where now they were no more than sojourners, according to the promise which he had made to his grandfather Abraham."

With these words he dismissed Jacob to go to his uncle's in Mesopotamia; and of the patriarch Isaac we read no more, only that he was alive at his son's return, and lived three and twenty years longer still; that he had removed from Beersheba, where his son left him, and dwelt now at Mamre, not far from Hebron; where, at the age of 188 years, he died, and was buried in the same sepulchre with his father Abraham, by his two sons Esau and Jacob.

CHAP. II.—Difficulties obviated, and Objections answered.

Nothing can be more obvious, than that the promises which God was pleased to make to the patriarchs, were not to be accomplished in their persons, but in their posterity. Abraham had but one son by his primary wife, and Isaac but two; and therefore the blessing of a numerous offspring could not be verified in them; but in Jacob it began to operate. He had twelve sons; and these, when in Egypt, notwithstanding all lets and impediments to the contrary, mightily increased; and upon their return from thence, made up an army sufficient to expel the old inhabitants, and to take possession of the land of promise, for thus it is that Moses bespeaks the people: 'Thy fathers went down into Egypt, with threescore and ten persons, and now the Lord thy God hath made thee as the stars of heaven for multitude;' wherein he alludes to the very words in which the promise, the original promise was made.

If then the numerous posterity with which God blessed the Jewish patriarchs, did, in a due course of years, though not immediately ensue, there is no foundation for our calling in question his truth and veracity; but then his wisdom and almighty power are much more conspicuous in raising so large an increase from so small a beginning. For besides that the long sterility of these holy matrons gave a proper occasion for the exercise of faith, and patience, and reliance on God,² it tended not a little to illustrate the nobility of the Jewish extraction, when it came to be considered, that their progenitors were descended from women that were complexionaly unfruitful, and brought into the world at no less an expense than that of a miracle. It showed plainly, that the multiplication of the promised seed was not effected by any natural succession, but by the divine favour and benediction. It prepared the way for the coming of the Son of God in the flesh, and, as St Chrysostom³ expresses it, predisposed the world to the belief of the miraculous conception of the Virgin Mary. It administered comfort to such married women as were childless, giving them encouragement still to hope on, and restraining them from murmuring, or being impatient at any retardation; and therefore we find the angel, in his address to the blessed virgin, (both to enforce the credibility of the message he brought her, and to revive the hope of such as were destitute of children,) expressing himself in this manner; 'Behold thy cousin Elizabeth, who was called barren, she also hath conceived a son in her old age, for with God nothing shall be impossible;' and it is a glorious demonstration of the sovereign power of God, when (according to the apostle's manner of expression)⁴ 'he causes the weak things of the world, to confound the things that are mighty, the base things of the world, and the things that are despised, yea and the things that are not, to bring to nought the things that are, that no flesh should glory in his presence.'

The same apostle, in relation to the subject we are now upon, has, by a familiar similitude, evinced the right which the great Ruler of the world has to make a discrimination (as to the temporalities I mean only) between man and man; for 'hath not the potter power over the clay,' says he, 'of the same lump, to make one vessel unto honour and another unto dishonour?' He who has a present intimation of all things future, knows how every person when born into the world, will comport himself; and therefore, as he has the right, so he is the only being that is duly qualified to allot men their different stations in life; but it is their different stations in life that God thus determines, and not any necessity of their happy or unhappy condition in the next.

Esau and Jacob were both in the womb, when God thought fit to declare his choice of the one, rather than the other, to be the founder of the Jewish nation, and of 'whom, according to the flesh, Christ should come;' and as this was a favour of a temporary consideration only, and no way affected their eternal state, I know of no attribute of God that could restrain him in this option. Loving and hating are terms of a strong signification sometimes; but that here they can bear no more than a bare preference of one before another, is plain from the whole tenor of the apostle's discourse. The truth is, ¹ his words, as well as those of Moses, relate, (as we said before) not to the persons, but to the posterity of Jacob and Esau, or not to them personally, but nationally considered. As to their persons, it was never true, that the elder did serve the younger, but only as to their posterity, when the ² Edomites became tributary to David: and therefore the apostle cannot be supposed here to discourse of any personal election to eternal life, or any absolute love or hatred of these two brothers, with respect to their interest in another world, but only of the election of one seed or nation before another, to be accounted and treated as the seed of Abraham, which is all that the apostle's argument drives at.

In a word, the case of these two patriarchs has nothing to do with the election, or reprobation of particular persons. It shows us indeed, that God may make choice of one nation rather than another, to be his peculiar people; but to apply this to particular persons, or to suppose that the condition of men's souls, even before they come into the world, is determined by an irrevocable decree, is foreign to the apostle's meaning, and abhorrent to his word, who has so plainly declared himself to be ³ 'no respecter of persons, but that in every nation he that feareth God, and worketh righteousness, shall be accepted of him.'

⁴ Some are of opinion, that the chief prerogative of the primogeniture was nothing else but a double portion of the father's estate, and that this was all that Esau parted with to his brother: but had this been so, we cannot see wherein he is so mightily to blame, or why the apostle, who certainly understood the meaning of the birthright, as well as any modern commentator, should give him the hard name of a 'profane person,' merely for selling the reversion of a temporal estate, to save his life, in a time of the greatest exigence. Had the birthright, I say, consisted chiefly in this, we cannot see how Jacob could have been reduced to such straits as we afterwards find him in, or Esau, as to his outward fortune, have flourished more prosperously than his brother did. When his father Isaac died, and he came from mount Seir, to assist in his funeral, upon his departure from his brother, he is said to have ⁵ 'carried away with him all the substance which he had gotten in the land of Canaan.'⁶ Now it is plain, that he had no substance in the land of Canaan of his own getting, for he lived at Seir in the land of Edom, beyond the borders of Canaan; and therefore the substance which was gotten in the land of Canaan, must be the substance which Isaac died possessed of, and which Esau, as his heir, took along with him. So that, after the birthright was sold, he was still heir to his father's substance; and therefore a right to this was not the thing which Jacob purchased of him. Others are of opinion, that the birthright was the blessing promised to the seed of Abraham; and this the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews seems, in some measure, to favour;

'Lest there be any fornicator, or profane person, a Esau, who, for a morsel of meat, sold his birthright. For we know how that afterwards, when he would have inherited the blessing, he was rejected:' where, 'not inheriting the blessing,' seems to have been connected with his 'having sold his birthright; as if, having parted with the one, he could not possibly obtain the other: but it is much to be questioned, whether this be the true sense of the passage. Esau himself, when he sold his birthright, did not imagine that he had sold, at the same time, his right to the blessing; for when his father told him, that his brother had come with subtlety, and taken away the blessing, his answer was, 'Is he not rightly named Jacob, for he hath supplanted me these two times; he took away my birthright, and behold now he hath taken away my blessing?' Had he apprehended that the blessing and birthright were things inseparable, having sold the one, he would never have laid any claim to the other; whereas the defrauding him of his blessing is another hardship he complains of, distinct and different and independent on the former: and therefore Esau's birthright was most probably his right of being priest, or sacrificer for his brethren; and parting with this he is justly termed profane, because he hereby showed himself not to have a due value and esteem, for the religious employment that belonged to him.

But though this employment might better comport with Jacob, yet we cannot pretend to justify him in his method of obtaining it. ⁷ Moses, who records the story, does not commend him for it; and therefore we are left at our liberty to pass what censure upon it we think reasonable. God indeed, before he was born, designed and promised this privilege to him; but ⁸ then he should have waited until the divine wisdom had found out the means of executing his promise in his own way, as David did, till God gave him possession of Saul's kingdom, and not have anticipated God, and snatched it by an irregular act of his own. In the whole affair, indeed, Jacob acted with a subtlety not at all becoming an honest man. He knew that delays were dangerous, and that his brother's consideration, or second thoughts, might possibly spoil his bargain; and therefore he required haste, both in the sale and in his oath, and thereby incurred another sin, in hurrying his brother into an oath, by precipitation, which he neither should have taken, nor Jacob have advised him to take, without mature advice and deliberation.

And in like manner, as to his interception of the blessing, which his father designed for his brother Esau; it is in vain to have recourse to ^a forced constructions,

^a Upon Jacob's answering his father, that he was Esau his first-born, the rabbins are put to great perplexity, how to assail the patriarch from the sin of lying; and therefore some of them paraphrase the words thus:—"I am, that is, he, who brings thee something to eat, but Esau is thy eldest son;" while others understand them in this manner rather:—"I am Esau, that is, I am in his stead, because he has sold me his birthright;" for by this sale, as they tell us, a proper permutation being made of persons and titles, the first became really last, and the last first; the elder became the younger, and the younger the elder, as to the style, and all the privileges of eldership; so that Jacob was in reality as much the heir and successor of Isaac, as if Esau had been actually dead. And though Esau was still alive, and had the name of Esau, yet Jacob was properly, what his brother or to plead the lawfulness of mental reservations, in order to excuse him in the lying and dissimulation, wherein he was certainly culpable. The best way is, upon this occasion, to lament the infirmity of human nature, which cannot always stand upright, and to admire the impartiality of the sacred writings, in which the very blemishes and transgressions of such as are designed to make the top-figure therein are not forgotten to be recorded.

done: ³ 'I have blessed him,' says he, 'yea, and he shall be blessed.' Which sudden change of mind can be imputed to nothing else but some divine inspiration, which at that time opened his understanding, and convinced him that he had given the blessing to the right person.

Thus, from the consideration of Jacob's right and Isaac's duty, the goodness of the end, the pre-ordination of God, and his approbation of the thing when done, may be drawn some arguments to alleviate their crime; but still we must ingenuously own, ⁴ that Rebecca was guilty of a fault, in suggesting such dangerous advice to her son; that Jacob committed another, in suffering himself to be seduced by so bad a guide; and that both of them presumed to limit the power of God, by thinking that a complication of frauds was necessary for the accomplishment of a divine prophecy. ⁵ Had Rebecca, indeed, put her husband in remembrance of this prophecy, and shown how Esau had forfeited the blessing by selling his birthright, and by marrying strange wives, this had been a much more honourable proceeding; but therefore she was left to pursue her own indiscreet method, that God might have the honour of serving his own purposes by the follies of men.

But how culpable soever Rebecca may be thought, in this instance, yet there is not the like imputation upon her in hiding from her husband the true reason of her sending away Jacob. ⁶ It is certainly a point of great prudence to conceal truth, when the discovery of it will occasion more harm than good; and therefore, that she might not afflict her husband's old age with the unwelcome news of his son Esau's wicked intent against his brother, and thereby provoke his indignation against him, she covered the dismissal of Jacob with a reason that was true indeed, but not that chief and latent one which gave her the most uneasiness; and which, if communicated to her husband, might have been a means of 'bringing his grey hairs with sorrow to the grave.' So that, in the whole, and according to the proverbs of the wise man, she acted the part both of a careful and a prudent woman; for ⁷ 'the tongue of the wise useth knowledge aright;' and she ⁸ 'that is of a faithful spirit concealeth the matter.'

When Abraham sent his servant into Mesopotamia to negotiate a marriage for his son Isaac, he had an equipage appointed him suitable to the dignity of his master, that God might be more honoured by so fine an appearance, and his veracity publicly justified in the advancement of that Abraham who had quitted all to follow him; but we shall soon perceive, that there was not the like reason for Isaac's sending away his son Jacob with such an honourable retinue, if we do but consider, ⁹ that the family of Nahor was already sufficiently apprized of the divine blessing which had attended Abraham and his family; that as Rebecca was sister to Laban, the head of the family, there was no need of any farther recommendation than that of a letter to her brother: that in this affair it was prudence to make Jacob appear as had been, his first-born Esau, since Esau was reduced to the station of a younger brother only. St Austin (Ad Consentium de Mendacio, c. 10.) pretends, that Jacob's words have a figure in them much in the same nature with that in the gospel, where John the Baptist is called 'the Elias that shall come;' but the misfortune is, that there was a great similitude between Elias and the Baptist, as to their spirit and office; but between Jacob and Esau there was none at all; and therefore some other fathers, seeing the impossibility of explaining the words by any of these subtleties, have boldly asserted that there was no iniquity in the lies which Jacob told, because they did not proceed from any malevolent intent, but from a design of promoting the greatest good; for which end it was as lawful for a wise man to employ officious lies, as it is to make use of physic for the preservation of health. And from such dangerous positions as these the jesuitical doctrine of equivocation and mental reservation has, in a great measure, proceeded. "What shall we do with men of a description so base," says our author, "that they are not afraid to give full scope to all sort of lying and deceit? there will be an end to all fidelity in contracts and treaties, even to the bonds of all human society. And if the holy patriarch should awake from his rest, he would undoubtedly resist, and strongly condemn, the impicity of these most audacious men,—so far is he from making himself an accomplice in their blasphemous foolishness. Though Jacob stumbled, it was through human weakness; and he never in the least employed that artful, affected, and jesuitical kind of lying."—Heidegger's Hist. Patriar. vol. 2, Essay 11.

little as might be, in order to give the less umbrage to his brother, and if possible to appease his resentment; that it was highly expedient for Jacob to tread in the steps of his grandfather Abraham, whose heir he was now become, and should therefore depart from his father's house, and cast himself entirely upon the providence of God for his subsistence, even as he had done; and that it was necessary for him to give a demonstration that it was not merely, as some suppose, an earthly inheritance which he had purchased, or a secular blessing which he had acquired, but that there was something far greater, though not discernible by every common eye, which he had in view in this acquisition: for his confessing in this manner, 'that he was a stranger and pilgrim on earth,' notwithstanding the right of primogeniture in him, declared plainly that, as heir of the promise with Abraham and Isaac, he was seeking a better country than either that from which he departed, or that whereunto he was sent, that is, an heavenly.

From these, and such like considerations, and not from any family poverty, it was, that Jacob was sent into Mesopotamia all alone, and without any attendance. And, in like manner, when Esau, upon his return from hunting, complains of his extreme hunger, we can scarcely suppose that he found nothing at home to eat, except the pottage which his brother had made. Frugality, indeed, was a virtue of much more esteem among the ancients than it is among us; but it is hard to imagine how Isaac, who was a man confessedly of a plentiful estate, and had doubtless a large family to maintain, should keep a house utterly destitute of all manner of eatables. Provision there was, no doubt, enough; but Esau's fancy ran upon something else. He longed, greedily longed, for the soup, and the soup he would have, whatever it cost. Its flavour and colour had enticed him, and every thing he resolved to part with, rather than not gratify the present cravings of an intemperate appetite. And accordingly we may observe, ² that his reasoning upon this occasion was not, that he was ready to die for famine, and therefore would part with his birthright; but that, according to his course of life, and the perils which he every day ran in hunting, in all probability he would not survive his father, and his birthright of consequence would avail him nothing; and therefore, having but a slender opinion of what was to come hereafter, he made his conclusion much in the same form with the epicurean in the prophet, ³ 'Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die.'

Whoever considers the chronology of that transaction, will find that ⁴ Isaac lived about forty years after his parting with his prophetic blessing; and consequently, ⁵ that it was not old age, but some sickness and indisposition of body, that at this time had seized him, and made him apprehensive of his approaching death. In this condition it is no uncommon thing, we know, for men's thoughts to run upon one kind of meat rather than another, and when the stomach is depraved, or anywise out of order, generally to long for such things as are of a savoury taste: and if venison in those countries was more particularly adapted to that purpose, wherein, I pray, is Isaac to be blamed, for loving a son who took such pains, and exposed himself to such dangers, that he might show his respect to his aged father, and procure him now and then some little thing to please his palate, and humour his sickly appetite? Those who think proper to blame the patriarch's kind resentment of such assiduity, seem to have forgot the workings of human nature, and how apt the very wisest of parents are to have their affections won every day more and more, by the sedulity and officiousness of their children.

The dressing of this venison is represented indeed as a province which Esau himself took upon him; and to have the eldest son and heir of a family stand cook, as we call it, seems to portend no great wealth or magnificence in it; but when we urge this, we forget the simplicity of the times wherein Moses wrote, and wherein it was customary for men of the first rank to submit to offices much meaner than this. Herein then do the truth and authority of the sacred history most eminently appear, that all its accounts and descriptions of things agree with the sense of the most ancient writers, and are found conformable to the manners and customs that then prevailed.

And in like manner, we may say, that ⁶ it is our ignorance of the patriarchal manner of living which makes us think it unaccountable to hear, in those early days, of so many contests about wells. For were we to take a nearer inspection into the thing, we should soon find, that in those hot countries, where water was so very scarce, a well or fountain of living water was a possession of inestimable value; and for this reason we find Moses, in magnifying the divine bounty to the children of Israel, among other parts of the inventory, reckoning up, not only ⁷ 'great and goodly cities which they built not, but wells likewise digged which they digged not.'

⁸ Nor was it only for the benefit of the water that these wells were held in so high esteem, but for the memory of the events and transactions likewise which were known to have happened near them. For at these wells angels had appeared, miracles had been wrought, religious assemblies held, treaties transacted, marriages celebrated, and towns and cities built; and therefore no wonder that the ancients, looking upon them as sacred, as well as profitable places, should be so ready to contest their right to them, or that frequent notice should be taken of them in so compendious an history as that of the patriarchs.

The truth is, these, and perhaps some other occurrences in the life of this patriarch, though to us they may seem strange and incongruous, do not argue any want or poverty, but are exactly agreeable to that temperance and simplicity of living, which, in his days, were in vogue. He was in a manner sole heir of his father Abraham, (who was ^a a king in the opinion of some, but in all accounts a person of great affluence of fortune,) and who himself had made additions to it, enough to be envied even by neighbouring princes, could not possibly want any necessary accommodation of life, nor would he concern himself with things of a trifling consideration. But what we call trifles, might, in those times, be matter of the last importance; and what we account indications of poverty, might proceed from no other cause but that of frugality and parsimony,^a which, in the primitive ages, were in high repute, before they came to be discountenanced by the present schemes of expense and studied luxury. And therefore, when we find,¹ in ancient history, the Arcadians feeding upon acorns; the Argives upon apples; the Athenians upon figs, &c.; when we find^b a set of the most renowned heroes in the Grecian army, even in the great Achilles' tent, dining upon a loin of mutton, and an hock of bacon; and the godlike man Patroclus lighting the fire, while the master of the feast was spitting the meat; our wonder may cease, if, in ages before this, we meet with such an homely dish as lentil pottage in a patriarch's house, and the two sons of the family condescending to cook their own victuals. This we must own is not the practice among us; but it is a much more consistent and credible account of things than if Moses had represented Isaac's tent like a royal palace, and every thing served up there in the same splendid manner as when the king and his family dine in public.

CHAP. III.—Of Isaac's Blessing to Jacob.

THE HISTORY.

FROM the time that God made the covenant with Abraham, and promised blessings extraordinary to his seed, it was customary for the father of each family, some time before he died, to call together his children, and to inform them, according to the knowledge which it pleased God then to give him, how, and in what manner the blessing of Abraham was to descend among them. Whence this custom had its original, whether from the immediate appointment of God, or from some secret impulse, wherewith the patriarchs, upon the approach of their departure, found themselves affected, the silence of Scripture will not suffer us to determine; but this we may safely infer,² that this benediction was different from those private blessings which the patriarchs gave their children upon sundry occasions, and different likewise from those public blessings which the priests, and others in authority, were wont to distribute among the people. It proceeded from an extraordinary illumination, and had the prospect of futurity (so far as was necessary for its purpose) submitted to its inspection. The persons upon whom it came had for that time the spirit of divination, and what they uttered under its influence was deemed a prophetic oracle, denoting infallible events, and extending to the utmost period of time.

^a The manner of living in the early ages of the world seems to be very well expressed by the Roman satirist. "When Saturn was king, I believe that chastity dwelt on earth, and was seen for a long time; when the cold grotto gave to men a home, a hearth and place for their household god; when one common shade enclosed both the cattle and their owners, and when the unsophisticated wife stroved for her husband, a woodland couch of leaves and straw and skins of wild beasts."—Juvenal, Sat. 6.

The Jews indeed have a proverbial saying, that the spirit of prophecy does not fall upon the melancholic; and thence they suppose, that as good eating and drinking are known to exhilarate the spirits, the patriarch, by sending his son to take venison, was minded to make use of that expedient, that he might be the better disposed to receive the divine inspiration, and to pronounce the prophetic benediction with cheerfulness, and with a warmth and emotion sufficient to excite that attention which the prophecy he was about to deliver did require.

³ But as no one in his senses can imagine, that a person when perfectly sober, is not as capable of the spirit of prophecy as he that has plentifully dined; others, from the phrase, 'that I may bless thee before the Lord,' suppose⁴ that Isaac's eating, in order to receive the spirit of benediction, was by him designed to be sacramental, and accompanied with some religious rites and solemn invocations, though they happen not to be here mentioned. But this supposition being as precarious as the other, the safest way is to resolve the whole matter into the providence of God,⁵ who put Isaac into the head of sending out Esau for venison, neither to refresh his spirits by eating, nor to perform any religious act, but merely, by his absence, to give Jacob an advantageous opportunity of appropriating the blessing to himself.

Isaac, indeed, meant not this, neither was it in his heart to bless Jacob; and therefore, if we suppose that Rebecca had acquainted him with the prophecy which directed him to transfer the blessing upon Jacob, we must suppose withal,⁶ that he had now forgot it, or never rightly understood it, or apprehended that it was to be accomplished, not in the persons of Esau and Jacob, but in their posterity,⁷ for it is much better to charge the patriarch with want of attention or understanding, than with disobedience and prevarication.

However this be, the blessing which he pronounces over Jacob by mistake, is conceived in these words:—'God give thee of the dew of heaven,' (because, in hot countries, where showers were less frequent, the morning and evening dews were a great refreshment to the earth, and productive of much plenty.) 'and the fatness of the earth,' (because Canaan, the lot of his inheritance, was a fruitful, and therefore⁸ by the prophet called 'a fat land,') 'and plenty of corn and wine,' (abundance of every product of the earth.) 'Let people serve thee,' (that is, the Idumeans, who shall descend from thy brother Esau, as they did in the days of David.) 'and nations bow down unto thee,' (the kingdoms of Arabia and Syria, who are sprung from Hagar and Keturah:) 'be lord over thy brethren, and let thy mother's son bow down unto thee,' (have thou the dominion and prerogative in thine own family.) 'Cursed be every one that curseth thee, and blessed be every one that blesseth thee; for God shall so far interest himself in thy cause, as to esteem those his friends or foes, who shall behave themselves as such to thee. So that the blessing consists properly of three branches: in the first is contained worldly plenty and prosperity; in the second, dominion and empire; and in the third, family pre-eminence, as well as the divine protection: but then the question is, in what sense is all this to be understood, and to what branch may the peculiar blessing of Abraham, which is doubtless comprised herein, be supposed to belong?

If we look back¹ to the call of Abraham, and the promises which attended it, there we shall find,² that after enumerating the temporal blessings which were to descend from Abraham to his posterity, one blessing is added, in which all the world has an interest, and which was conveyed to them through Abraham and his seed. 'In thee,' says God, 'shall all the families of the earth be blessed.'

If we proceed to the blessing which he was pleased to give to his son Isaac, we shall find a recital of the same kinds of temporal prosperity; a numerous progeny promised; the grant of the land of Canaan renewed; the oath given unto Abraham confirmed; and then follows the great and distinguishing promise,³ 'in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed.' And in like manner we cannot but imagine, that in this great and solemn blessing which Isaac is giving his son Jacob, there must be something of a spiritual nature comprised, though couched under terms which seem to denote worldly felicity only.

The author of the Hebrews tells us, that⁴ 'by faith Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau concerning things to come;' and what we are to understand 'by faith,' he instructs us in the conclusion of his discourse; 'and these all' (meaning the patriarchs he had mentioned before)⁵ having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise, God having provided some better things for us, that they, without us, should not be made perfect.' So that this faith did chiefly relate to the blessed seed which was promised in the beginning, and from continued tradition and divine revelation, in every succeeding age, embraced by the faithful; and therefore we can hardly suppose, but that, in this great prophetic benediction, there must be something concerning this seed implied at least, if not expressed.

Whoever takes but a cursory view of some of the chief passages of Jacob's life, will soon perceive that had his father's blessing consisted of worldly advantages only, it was in a manner quite lost upon him, since few men enjoyed a less share of that than he, who was forced from his home, into a far country, for fear of his brother; deceived and oppressed by his uncle; and⁶ after a servitude of above twenty years, compelled to flee from him; while, at the same time, he was in imminent danger, either of being pursued and brought back by Laban, or fallen upon, and murdered by Esau. These fears were no sooner over, but the baseness of his eldest son, in defiling his couch; the treachery and cruelty of the two next in relation to the Shechemites; the loss of his beloved wife, and the supposed untimely death of his son Joseph; to say nothing of his being compelled by famine to go down into Egypt, and there die: these, and many more instances, are proofs sufficient, that his father's blessing was of a different nature. For supposing it to relate to temporal prosperity and dominion only, wherein can we say that Jacob had the pre-eminence above his brother?⁶ If Jacob was 'blessed with the dew of heaven, and the fatness of the earth,' Esau's blessing (at least according to our translation) in this respect, is not inferior: 'Thy dwelling,' says his father, 'shall be the fatness of the earth, and of the dew of heaven from above.' If 'nations were to bow down to Jacob,' Esau likewise 'was to live and prevail by his sword.' If Jacob's brethren were to 'bow down to him;' yet the time would come, when 'Esau should have dominion, and break even this yoke from off his neck.' Thus, if we interpret the whole blessing of temporal prosperity only, the two brothers seem to stand upon an equality, and yet it is evident, from the whole story, that the chief blessing which their father had to bestow, was fallen upon Jacob; and therefore he tells Esau, when he pressed him for a blessing upon himself likewise, 'Behold I have made him thy lord, and all his brethren have I given unto him for servants, and with corn and wine have I sustained him, and what shall I do now unto thee, my son?' And when Esau still urges his father, and his father thereupon blesses him, we may observe, that of corn and wine, and temporal power, he gives him a full and an equal share; but then there is this limitation in the blessing, 'Thou shalt serve thy brother:' so that whatever was peculiarly given to Jacob, was contained in the grant of 'being lord over his brethren;' and yet the history of the two brothers will not allow us to expound it of any temporal dominion; for if we should, see how the case will stand. 'Jacob is to rule over Esau;' and yet no sooner is the blessing given, but he flies his country for fear of Esau; he lives abroad for many years; and when he returns, the fear and dread of his brother returns with him; so that his only refuge, in this his distress, was to God; 'Deliver me, I pray thee, from the hand of my brother, from the hand of Esau.' When he sends a message to him, he styles himself,⁹ 'Thy servant Jacob:' when he meets him,¹⁰ 'he bows himself to the ground seven times, until he comes near to Esau;' when he speaks to him, he calls him 'lord;' and when he is kindly received by him, he says,¹¹ 'I have seen thy face, as though I had seen the face of all this, and thou wert pleased with me.' What is there in all this that shows any rule and dominion given to Jacob over his brother Esau?

And, in like manner, if we imagine the prophecy relates to temporal dominion only, and yet was fulfilled in the posterity of these two brothers, the question will be, how the case, upon this supposition, stands? ¹² The family of Esau was settled in power and dominion many years before Jacob's family had any certain dwelling-place. The dukes and kings of Esau's house are reckoned up; and the historian tells us, that ¹³ 'these are the kings who reigned in the land of Edom, before there reigned any king over the children of Israel.' When the appointed time was come for establishing the house of Israel, and giving them the land and possessions of their enemies, the family of Esau were, by a particular decree, exempted from the dominion of Israel; for so the Lord commanded Moses, ¹ 'Ye are to pass through the coast of your brethren, the children of Esau. Take ye good heed unto yourselves therefore; meddle not with them; for I will not give you of their land; no, not so much as a foot-breadth.' In the time of David, indeed, ² 'they of Edom became his servants:' but in the days of Jehoram they recovered again, ³ and made a king over themselves; and in the time of Ahaz they revenged the affront, ⁴ 'by smiting Judah, and leading them away captives.' So that this variety of fortune, between the children of Jacob and Esau, could never be the thing intended or meant to be described, when the promise was given to Jacob, 'that his mother's children should bow down unto him.'

What then is the hidden purpose of the words, and in what sense are they to be taken? Why it seems pretty evident, that the blessing given to Jacob, and expressed in words implying a rule over his brethren, was a conveyance of his birthright to him, in the family of Abraham; that the birthright in Abraham's family, besides the promise of the land of Canaan, respected the special blessing given to Abraham by God, and that this special blessing denoted no other than that person in whom all families of the earth were to be blessed, and that is Christ. For ⁵ that the regard of all nations to the seed, in which they were all to be blessed, should be expressed by their 'bowing down to him,' is no hard figure of speech; and that the superiority of Jacob's family should one day be broken (as the promise to Esau sets forth) when Jews and Gentiles should equally become the people of God, and all nations be equally blessed, is no more than what the original covenant contains. Upon the whole, then, we may observe, that this prediction had its full accomplishment, neither in the person of Jacob, nor in his posterity in general, but only in one, who, as to his human nature, in the fulness of time, descended from him, and ⁶ 'who being in the form of God,' as the apostle acquaints us with both his natures, 'and thinking it no robbery to be equal with God, made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men, and being found in fashion as a man, humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name, which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus ever knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in the earth, and things under the earth, and that every tongue shall confess, that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.'

Since this part of the blessing, then, which Isaac bestowed upon Jacob, was of such high import, as to refer ultimately to the person of our blessed Saviour, and his exaltation into glory; this may suggest a reason to us, why, though it was certainly obtained by guile, it was not afterwards revoked, but ratified rather and confirmed, even when his father came to understand the imposture. For if ⁷ 'prophecy came not in old time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost,' ⁸ then is Isaac, in this action to be considered only as the instrumental, and God as the principal cause; the efficacy of the blessing therefore must be supposed to depend, not on his will and intention, but on God's ordination and appointment; and consequently Isaac could have no right or authority to disannul the blessing, had he been minded so to do. ⁹ But it is much more likely, that the remembrance of the prophecy concerning the two children, which Rebecca had vouchsafed her, before they were born, might at this time come to strike him; and seeing he had in his blessing, though not designedly, confirmed the same, he might very well impute it to an overruling providence, and so be concluded by the divine determination; in which sense that passage relating to Esau, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, is most proper to be applied: ¹⁰ 'We know, how that afterwards, when he would have inherited a blessing, he was rejected: for he found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears.' But how was 'Esau rejected from inheriting a blessing,' when we find, that upon his importunity with his father, he obtained one? He obtained a blessing indeed, but not that which, by hereditary right, belonged to the first-born, and abounded with blessings both spiritual and temporal. This his brother Jacob had supplanted him of; and yet he could not prevail with his father to revoke it. He could not bring him to change his mind, (as it is in the margin,) and repent of the blessing he had given to Jacob, (for, ¹¹ it is Isaac's repentance, not Esau's, that is here under consideration,) although he sought it with tears; and the reason is,—because his father knew, both by the conduct of providence in this whole affair, and by a particular inspiration at that time, that the peculiar blessings promised to Abraham and his seed, did not belong to him, but, by the divine appointment, were now consigned to his brother and his posterity; and therefore, to silence all further clamour, he tells him with a more than ordinary emphasis and inflexibility, ¹² 'I have blessed him, yea, and he shall be blessed.'

day's journey, a happening to be benighted, he was forced to take up his lodging in the open air, with the spangled sky to be his canopy, and an hard stone his pillow. However, while he slept, he thought he saw a ladder fixed upon the earth, and reaching up unto heaven, with angels ascending and descending on it; and from the top of this ladder he heard God speaking unto him, and promising him, even as he had done his forefathers, the land of Canaan for his inheritance; a large and numerous posterity; the Messias to descend from his family; a safe return to his native country; and the divine protection and preservation every where to attend him.

This, in all probability, was the first vouchsafement of the kind which Jacob ever had; and his dream had made such impression upon him, that as soon as he awaked, he paid an awful reverence to the place, and after a short contemplation of what had passed, broke out into this rapture of wonder and admiration:—"How venerable is this place, over which are vertically the palace of God, and the gate of heaven, through which the holy angels are continually issuing out, to execute the divine commands!" And when he arose, he erected the stone whereon he slept, and, as the custom of those times was, b poured oil upon it, and then in pious commemoration of the heavenly vision, called the place, which before was called Luz, by the name of Bethel, that is, the house of God. c But before he went from hours, by causing the sun to go down before its time; and yet we are told, that from Beersheba to Luz, where he lodged the first night, were about 48 English miles, which was no inconsiderable day's journey. If there be any meaning therefore in this fiction of theirs, it must consist in this:—That Jacob was sent away with his father's blessing, and, in virtue of that, was filled with a certain divine power, which supported and carried him on with pleasure, so that the day might thence seem shorter to him; and though his father sent no friend or domestic along with him, yet there is no doubt to be made, but that there was a companion and guardian of a far nobler order assigned him, who led him by the hand, as it were, and kept him in all his ways.—Bibliotheca Biblica, in locum.

a The place where Jacob took up his lodging, was near Luz, which signifies an almond, and might very likely have its name from the many groves of almond-trees which were thereabouts; and under some of which it is not unlikely that Jacob might take up his lodging, because the largeness of their leaves, in that country, would afford no incommodious shelter from the weather. Jacob, upon account of the vision which he had in this place, called it Bethel; and the Israelites, when they conquered Canaan, in remembrance of the same, continued the name. It lay to the west of Hai, about eight miles to the north of Jerusalem, in the confines of the tribes of Ephraim and Benjamin. So that upon the revolt of the ten tribes, it belonged to the kingdom of Israel, and was therefore one of the cities where Jeroboam set up his golden calves, whence the prophet Hosea (ch. iv. 15) alluding to the name given to it by Jacob, calls it Bethavan, instead of Bethel, that is 'the house of vanity or idols,' instead of 'the house of God.'—Patrick's Commentary, and Wells's Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 1.

b Hence it seems evident, that Jacob did not leave his father's house, without being first provided for his journey; for it cannot be thought, that if he wanted other necessaries, he would have carried oil along with him, and that in such plenty, as to pour it out, in such a seemingly profuse manner, upon an inanimate subject.—Bibliotheca Biblica.

c Gen. xxviii. 18. 'And Jacob rose up early in the morning, and took the stone that he had set up for his pillar, and poured oil upon the top of it. And he called the name of that place Bethel.' This passage evinces of how great antiquity is the custom of considering stones in a sacred light, as well as the anointing them with consecrated oil. From this conduct of Jacob, and this Hebrew appellation, the learned Bochart, with thence, he made a d solemn vow to God, "That if he would protect and prosper him in his journey, provide him with e common necessaries in his absence, and grant him an happy return to his father's house; to him alone would he direct his religious worship; in that very place where the pillar stood, upon his return, would he make his devout acknowledgments, and offer unto him f the tenth of whatever he should gain in the land of Mesopotamia."

great ingenuity and reason, insists that the name and veneration of the sacred stones, called baetyli, so celebrated in all pagan antiquity, were derived. These baetyli were stones of a round form; they were supposed to be animated with a portion of the Deity: they were consulted on occasions of great and pressing emergency, as a kind of divine oracles. Thus, the setting up of a stone by this holy person, in grateful memory of the celestial vision, probably became the occasion of the idolatry in succeeding ages, to these shapeless masses of unknown stone, of which so many astonishing remains are scattered up and down the Asiatic and the European world.—Maurice's Indian Antiquities, vol. 2. p. 355.

d Several annotators have observed, that this is the first vow that we read of in Scripture; but this is no reason for our supposing that Jacob was the first who worshipped in this manner, but rather, that in this, he did no more than what his fathers, Abraham and Isaac, had done before him, and as they had instructed him both by example and precept. And as for Abraham, though there be no mention made expressly of a vow, yet very certain it is, that in effect he did the same thing. For when the Lord is said to have made a covenant with him, Abraham, on his part, must be supposed to express his consent and acceptance of it, and not only so, but to vow and promise to perform the conditions, in order to attain the benefit of it. And in like manner, when Isaac is said to have entreated the Lord for his wife, it is highly probable, that he vowed a vow to God, that upon his performance of the promise of multiplying his seed, &c., he would, on his part, as an acknowledgment of it, make some or other suitable return; for the word which we render entreat, in its original, has a much stronger signification, and denotes a soliciting of favours, whether from God or man, by gifts, vows, or promises. So that we may justly conclude, that his son did not do this of his own head, or an immediate revelation commanding him so to do, but that he was before taught and instructed by his father in this solemnity, as a part of both natural and positive religion.—Bibliotheca Biblica.

e Jacob's words upon this occasion are, 'If God will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on,' which two articles comprise all the necessaries of life, and therefore we find them, in the writings of the philosophers, always put together. For these are the bounds, says Seneca, (Ep. 4.) which nature has set us, that we should not hunger, nor thirst, nor be cold. For our diet and dress, says Tully, should contribute to our health and strength, not to luxury or pleasure (De Offic. b. 1. c. 13.) We may observe, however, farther, that by the patriarch's covenanting here with God only for food and raiment, does appear the gross mistake of those who pretend that he supplanted his brother for covetous ends; as if his father's estate, and the possession of a rich country for himself and his heirs, were the things which he had only in view.—Le Clerc's Commentary, and Bibliotheca Biblica, in locum.

f This is the second mention of tithes or tenths, and the first dedication of them to God; and from this place we may fairly conclude, that Jacob, the grandchild of Abraham, vowing the tenth of all, (as Abraham had given the tenth of the spoil), was induced to do it by the custom which then prevailed among religious people. How they came to pitch upon this portion, rather than a fifth, a sixth, or any other quantity, is not so easy to be resolved; but they seem to speak with much reason, who observe, that in this number ten, all nations in a manner do end their account, and then begin again with compound numbers, or, as others phrase it, that this is the end of less numbers, and the beginning of the greater, for which reason it was looked on as the most perfect of all other, and accordingly had in great regard; but after all, it seems most likely, that they had some divine precept and direction for it. At this time it is certain that the order of priesthood was not instituted; and therefore the only purposes to Having thus performed his devotions, he ^a proceeded in his journey, and, after some weeks, arrived at Haran. As he came near the town, he saw some shepherds with their flocks, not far from a well which was covered with a large stone; and while he was inquiring of them concerning Laban and his family, he was given to understand, that they were all well, and that it would not be long before his daughter ^b Rachel would be there with her flock. Nor had this discourse long passed before she came; whereupon Jacob, having very obligingly rolled away the stone, and watered her sheep for her, took occasion to let her know who he was; and as he proceeded to salute his cousin, was in a manner ready to weep for joy; while she made what haste she could home, in order to inform her father of what had passed. He immediately came to meet his nephew, and received him with all the kindness, and all the tenderness imaginable, whilst he related to him ^c the occasion of his leaving his father's family, and what adventures he had met with in the way.

Jacob had not been long in his uncle's house before he applied himself to business; and having now served him for the space of a month in the capacity of a shepherd, his uncle one day took an occasion to discourse which Jacob could appropriate the tithes he gave, were either for the maintenance of burnt-sacrifices, and other pious uses, or perhaps for the relief of the poor. But how, and when, he actually performed his vow, does nowhere appear in Scripture, unless it was upon his return from Padan-Aram, (Gen. xxxv. 7—14.) 'when he built an altar at El Bethel, and set up a pillar in the place where God had talked with him, and poured a drink-offering and oil thereon.'—Patrick's Commentary.

^a The words in the text are, 'And came into the land of the people of the east,' Gen. xxix. 1.; which makes some imagine that he travelled eastward. But this is a mistake, because Mesopotamia, and particularly Haran, lay northward from Bethel. Babylon, however, lay eastward from both places; and therefore Mesopotamia being part of the Babylonish dominions, the Babylonians might well be called 'the people of the east,' and Jacob is only said to have gone into a country of which they were lords and masters.—Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 3. c. 4.

^b Rachel, in the Hebrew tongue, signifies a sheep: nor need we wonder at her being called so, since it was a common thing among the ancients to give names, not only to particular persons, but even to considerable families, (as the words Porcius, Ovilivus, Caprilivus, Equilivus, &c., mentioned by Varro, De Re Rustica, l. 2. c. 1. sufficiently shows,) from cattle, both great and small. Much less reason have we to wonder, that we find her keeping her father's sheep, since that employment, in those early days, was accounted very honourable, as from Homer and other ancient writings is sufficiently evident. We need not suppose, however, that the whole drudgery of the work lay upon her; she had those under her who took this off her hands, and her business was only, as the chief shepherdess, to inspect over them.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c The things which Jacob informed his uncle Laban of at this time, may be supposed to be such as related to the occasion of his journey; as particularly all that had passed between his brother and him as to the right of primogeniture; the purchase which he had made of it, and what ensued; their two different manners of living; the design of his father with respect to them; the management of the mother, to procure him the blessing; the resentment of his brother at his disappointment; the prudent dismissal of himself thereupon, both by father and mother; the displeasure they had conceived at his brother's matching himself into strange families; and the strict orders they had therefore given him to take a wife out of his own kindred, and of the house of his mother's father, which was the reason of his coming thither; and, lastly, the wonderful occurrences he had met with on his journey, more especially as to the whole affair of Bethel, and the happy meeting of his daughter at the well, to his great and surprising satisfaction.—Bibliotheca Biblica.

him, and to let him know, that he neither expected, nor thought it reasonable, to have his labour for nothing, and therefore desired him to name what wages he would have. The lovely shepherdess had already captivated Jacob's heart; and therefore he names her for the reward ^d of his seven years' service, which her father readily consented to, and he as readily entered upon, because the love which he had to his Rachel made him account the longest time short. ^e

Laban, we must know, had another daughter, named Leah, older than Rachel, but not so beautiful, having some blemish or soreness in her eyes; and when the time of Jacob's servitude was expired, and he demanded his wife, his father-in-law seemed to solemnize the ^d It was a custom which had prevailed almost in all ages, that in contracting marriages, as the wife brought a portion to the husband, so the husband should be likewise obliged to give her parents money or presents, (which sometimes in Scripture are called the dowry,) in lieu of this portion. But Jacob being destitute of money, offers his uncle seven years' service, which must needs have been equivalent to a large sum; and being so, it is more to be wondered at, that he did not send over to his parents for a supply upon this occasion, rather than bind himself a servant for so long a term. But, from the custom in use among us, there is no judgment to be made what the custom and practice was then.—Bibliotheca Biblica, and Le Clerc's Commentary.

^e Dr Hales states the age of Jacob when he went to Charran at 77 years, which he collects from Scripture thus: When Jacob had been 14 years in Charran, Joseph was born, Gen. xxx. 25; Joseph was 30 years old when made regent of Egypt, Gen. xli. 46; and in the ninth year of his regency, brought his father and family to settle in Egypt, Gen. xli. 53, 54. xlv. 6; the amount of these sums, 14+30+9=53 years from the time Jacob went to Charran; which being subtracted from 130 years, his age when he stood before Pharaoh, Gen. xlvii. 9, leaves 77 years for his age when he went to Charran. And this confirms the account of Abulfaragi and Demetrius. Dr Hales farther agrees with Usher, Lloyd, Clayton, &c., in supposing that Jacob's marriage with Leah took place about a month after his arrival in Charran, at the beginning of the seven years, and his marriage with Rachel the week after, and thinks that Jacob's demand, Gen. xxix. 21, 'Give me my wife, for my days are fulfilled,' relates to the days of courtship, which by a decorous usage were a month, during which a bride, though betrothed, might put off the consummation of her marriage, a privilege which was afterwards extended by the Mosaic law even to a female captive, who was granted this respite to bewail "her father and mother," Deut. xxxi. 13. And further, considering the advanced age of Jacob when he went to Charran, as stated above, it is not probable that he would have waited patiently seven years before he married; and the selfish policy of Laban would prompt him to secure his attachment and services by a speedy connexion with his family. That he married at the beginning of the first seven years, is further demonstrated by Abulfaragi, who dates the birth of his son Levi, in his eighty-second year, or in the fifth year of his service. On this hypothesis, Dr Hales gives the following table of the birth of Jacob's children by his wives and concubines.

The first date is Jacob's age, the second the year before Christ nuptials with great magnificence, but in the evening he put an unfair trick upon him; for instead of the beautiful Rachel, he ^a brought the blind-eyed ^b Leah to his bed; which when Jacob perceived next morning, and thereupon made just remonstrances, the father had his answer ready, and in a magisterial tone told him,—‘That it was an unprecedented thing in that country, and would have been deemed an injury to her sister, to marry the younger before the elder; but (continued he, in a milder tone) if you will ^c fulfil the nuptial week with your wife, and consent to serve another seven years for her sister, I am content to take your word for it, and to give Rachel to you as soon as the seven days are ended.’ Jacob could not but be troubled at such unfair procedure, but he loved Rachel too well not to obtain her at any price; and therefore he consented to these hard conditions, and, at the week’s end, was married to Rachel likewise.

But though he preferred Rachel much before Leah, yet God put quite another difference between them, by making the latter the mother of four sons, Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah, before her sister had one. ^d This was so great a trouble to Rachel, that she came one day, in a fit of melancholy, and told her husband,

^a The modesty of those times made them bring the bride to her husband’s bed veiled, and without lights, which gave Laban an opportunity to impose upon Jacob, and made it a thing almost impossible for him to discern the deception until next morning.—Howell’s History, and Patrick’s Commentary.

^b Dr Clarke thinks that the word רַבֵּת rabbeth, rendered ‘tender-eyed’ in the common version, means soft, delicate, lovely; and that the meaning is just the reverse of the signification usually given to it. The design of the inspired writer is to compare both sisters together, that the balance may appear to be greatly in the favour of Rachel. The chief recommendation of Leah was her soft and beautiful eyes; but Rachel was יָפֶת תָּאָר yepeth thar, beautiful in her shape, person, mien, and gait, and יָפֶת מִרְאֵה yepeth moreh, beautiful in her countenance. The words plainly signify a fine shape and fine features, all that can be considered as essential to personal beauty.—Clarke’s Commentary on Gen. xxxix. 17.—Ed.

^c Some are of opinion, that by ‘her week’ (as it is in the text) we are to understand a week of years, or seven years, and consequently, that to ‘fulfil her week’ was as much as to say, that Jacob was to serve other seven years for Rachel, before he was to marry her. Some old English versions render it thus: but the order of the story seems to gainsay it. For though Jacob lived with Laban twenty years, it is plain, that at the end of the fourteenth year, he proposed to part, and return home; and ^y te may observe, that Rachel (though she had been a good while barren) had born Joseph before that time, which could not have been, had not she been married before the end of his second seven years’ service. Since Laban then (as we read Gen. xxix. 22.) had invited a great deal of company, and the custom in those days was to devote a whole week to the nuptial solemnities, the plain sense of his words to Jacob (according to Selden’s short comment on them, De Jure Nat. l. 5. c. 5.) is this,—‘Since marriages are to be celebrated, according to custom, by a seven days’ feast, complete this marriage thou hast begun with Leah, and then upon condition of another seven years’ service, thou shalt marry Rachel also, and keep her wedding feast seven days.’ And the reason why Laban was so desirous of this, was, that a week’s cohabitation with Leah might be a means, either to knit Jacob’s affection to her, or at least to confirm the marriage so, that it should not be in his power to disannul it.—Le Clerc’s and Patrick’s Commentaries, Howell’s History and Poole’s Annotations.

^d Gen. xxix. 32. ‘And Leah conceived and bare a son, and she called his name Reuben.’ It seems probable that in common the mother gave the name to a child, and this both among the Jews and the Greeks, though perhaps not without the concurrence of the father. In the age of Aristophanes, the giving of a that unless he gave her children also, she should certainly die with grief. Which speech seeming to lay the blame of her sterility upon him, so provoked him, that he sharply rebuked, and told her, ‘That it was not in his power to work miracles; that God, who had shut up her womb, was alone able to open it; but that such uneasy and discontented behaviour was the way to prevent, rather than obtain such a favour.’ This mortifying answer made her bethink herself of supplying the defect of nature by her grandmother Sarah’s expedient, and therefore she desired her husband to take her handmaid Bilhah for a concubinary wife, and by that means to try to make her a mother; which he consenting to, had by her a son, whom Rachel named Dan, and, in a proper space of time, another, whom she called Naphthali. After which Leah, supposing herself to have left off child-bearing, and willing to imitate her sister’s policy, gave her maid Zilpah to her husband, by whom she had likewise two sons, Gad and Ashur.

About this time it so fell out, that Reuben, Jacob’s eldest son, going into the fields about the time of wheat harvest, chanced to meet with some mandrakes, which he gathered, and carried to his mother Leah. Rachel no sooner saw them, but desiring to have some of them, received from Leah a forbidding answer; ‘That having robbed her of her husband’s affections, she could not expect to have any part in her son’s present.’ It was ^e Rachel’s turn that night to have her husband’s company; and therefore, to compromise the matter, she tells her sister, that in case she would oblige her with some of her son’s mandrakes, she would waive her pretensions, and consign the right of his bed to her. Upon Jacob’s coming home, Leah calls upon him to confirm the bargain, which accordingly he did, and the consequence was, that she conceived again, and had a fifth son, whom she called Issachar; after him another named Zebulun; and last of all, a daughter, whose name was Dinah, the feminine of Dan.

Rachel had hitherto no issue of her own body; but now it pleased God to remember her, and to bless her with a son, whom she called ^f Joseph. And it was not long after his birth, that his father Jacob, having now served out his last seven years, began to entertain thoughts of returning into his own country, and accordingly desired of his uncle to dismiss him and his family. But Laban, who had found by experience no small advan-

name to the child seems to have been a divided prerogative between the father and the mother. Homer ascribes it to the mother:—

His on his mother’s knees, when babe he lay,
She nam’d Arneüs on his natal day.

Odyssey, xviii. 6. Pope.

^e The custom of those countries, where polygamy was allowed, was for the husband to take his wives by turns. The kings of Persia (if we believe Herodotus) were not exempt from that rule: which makes it more probable that Rachel sold her turn to her sister for that night, than that she directed her husband which of the four he should lie with.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 7.

^f Joseph signifies increase; and the reason why Rachel named him so, is said to be, because God ‘had taken away her reproach;’ for to be barren was formerly reckoned a disgrace, for these three reasons. 1. Because fruitfulness proceeded from the blessing of God, who said, ‘increase and multiply.’ 2. Because barren people seem to be excluded from the promises of God made to Abraham concerning the vast multiplication of his seed. And, 3. Because the Messiah could not proceed from them.—Poole’s Annotations.

tage by having such a servant, begged him to stay with him a little longer; and promised him upon that condition, to give him whatever wages he should think fit to name. Hereupon Jacob took an occasion of reminding him how much his substance had increased since it was put under his care, but that it was now high time for him to make some provision for his own family; and that therefore he was resolved to return to Canaan, unless he could show him some way of improving his fortune in Mesopotamia. Laban could not bear the thoughts of parting; and therefore he pressed him to stay, and offered him his own terms, which at last were resolved into this agreement,—That in the whole flock, both of sheep and goats, a separation should be made between the speckled and the white; that the spotted cattle should be given to Laban's sons to keep, and that Jacob should have the care of the white; and that whatever ^a spotted or brown sheep or goats should, from that time forward, be produced out of the white flock, which he was to keep, should be accounted his hire. Laban was very well satisfied with these conditions. Accordingly the flocks were parted; the spotted cattle were delivered to Laban's sons; the remainder that were white, were given to Jacob; and, that there might be no possibility of intermixing, they were sent three days' journey apart.

Whether it was from his own observation of the power of fancy in the time of conception, or (what seems more likely) from some private suggestion of the divine wisdom, that the project proceeded; but so it was, that by Jacob's taking twigs of green wood, peeling off the rinds in slips, and so laying them in the watering places, when the flocks came to drink ^b about coupling time, these speckled twigs struck the eyes of the females, and so made them conceive and bring forth party-coloured young ones. But it was not to all the flock that Jacob did this, only to such as were the ablest and strongest; for those that were weak and languid he left to their natural course, that his artifice might be the less suspected, when it appeared that the number of his father-in-law's cattle was not too much diminished.

His father-in-law, however, envying his prosperity, repented of his bargain, and several times altered the agreement, which God, as many times, turned to Jacob's advantage; till at length, observing in his carriage a coldness and indifference, and overhearing, at a certain time, his sons grudging and complaining, that he had raised himself an estate out of their fortunes, he began

^a The sacred historian makes use of four different words to denote the cattle which should properly belong to Jacob. The first is nakod, which we translate speckled, for the word signifies little points or pricks, which the Greeks call σπίγματα. The second is talú, which signifies such broader and larger spots as we frequently see in cattle. The next is akod, which signifies spotted with divers colours, or rather with rings or circles about the feet or legs. And the last is barud, which signifies whitish spots like hail; which seems to take in all the kinds of variegation.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b Several ancient commentators are of opinion, that Jacob laid these streaked rods before the cattle only in spring time, when the sun was ascending, and the cattle lusty and vigorous, but let them alone when the cattle came to couple in September, or the decline of the year. But as there is no certainty in this, our moderns have thought it more reasonable to suppose, that he laid the rods before the young and lusty sheep and goats, but left the old and weak to take their chance, by which means the best lambs and kids came to his share, and the worst to Laban's.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 7. and Patrick's Commentary.

to form a resolution of retiring into his own country with his family and effects, which God in a vision confirmed him in: but before he put it in execution, he thought it proper to advise with his two principal wives, and to endeavour to gain their consent. To this purpose he sent for them into the field, that he might have an opportunity of discoursing the matter with more freedom and privacy; and then told them that for some time he had observed that their father's carriage had been altered, but for what reason he could not devise. He appealed to them concerning his fidelity and diligence, and their father's unworthy requital of him; reminded them of God's goodness in defeating his ^c contrivances against him, and converting them to his great advantage and increase; acquainted them, that the same God who had thus blessed him, had appeared to him, as he did at Bethel, in his passage from Canaan thither, and commanded him to return to his native country, which command he was resolved to obey. They heard him with a willing mind, declared their opinion concerning their father, in the same manner as he had done, and professed themselves ready to attend him, when he pleased to set out. Jacob, therefore, preparing all things for the journey, mounting his wives and children upon camels, and taking the advantage of his father-in-law's absence (which gave Rachel an opportunity likewise of stealing away his gods), himself went along with the cattle, and all the other substance which he had acquired at Haran: he had now passed ^d the Euphrates, and gained ^e the mountains of Gilead, as they were afterward called, before Laban had intelligence of his flight, and was able to overtake him. Laban, no doubt, at his first setting out after Jacob, pursued him with a mind whetted with revenge; but God, who appeared to him that night in a dream, was pleased to avert it, by threatening him severely, if he committed any hostility or violence against him: so that the next morning, when he and the relations he had with him came to

^c In the complaint which Jacob makes to his wives, there is one particular article against their father, namely, that he 'had changed his wages ten times,' Gen. xxxi. 7, and yet he lived in contract with him only six years. But to solve this difficulty, we are to observe, that the cattle in Mesopotamia bred twice every year; and therefore, supposing that for the first year Laban stood to his bargain, but seeing his son-in-law thrive exceedingly, altered the form of it the next, and so continued to do every half year, till the sixth year came about, when Jacob thought proper to leave him, the several times wherein he changed his wages will be exactly ten; though there is no necessity for this exact calculation, when it is so common a figure of speech, to put a certain for an uncertain number.—Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentary.

^d Though the text does not say what river he passed, yet it is plain it could be no other than the Euphrates, which the Scripture sometimes calls the river Perah, sometimes the Great River, and sometimes emphatically the river; either because that and the Nile were the only two considerable ones the Israelites knew, or because it was one of the four rivers of paradise; or, lastly, because it was the boundary of the promised land.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 7.

^e The heap of stones which Laban and Jacob raised in memory of their agreement and covenant was called Gilead, that is, an heap of witnesses; and in after ages gave the name to the whole country therabouts, which lies on the east of the sea of Galilee, being part of that ridge of mountains which ran from mount Lebanon southward on the east of the Holy Land, and included the mountainous region, called in the New Testament Trachonitis.—Wells's Geography, vol. 1. c. 43.

speaking with Jacob, he only expostulated with him, that he had stolen away, without giving him an opportunity to take his leave of his children and grandchildren, or to send them home with an equipage suitable to their rank, or with the usual ceremonies of music and dancing. Jacob, on the other hand, was not without his complaints. The cheat which Laban had put upon him, in making him serve so long for a woman he did not love; the changing his salary so many times, and his late strange behaviour towards him and his family; all these, and many more, he answered him, were but ill requitals for his care and diligence, as well as the blessings which God had heaped upon him for his sake.

Laban had yet another thing to lay to his charge, namely, the stealing of his gods: but Jacob, who knew nothing of Rachel's theft, desired him to make the most diligent search for them throughout his family; assuring him withal, that the person on whom they were found should immediately be put to death. Hereupon Laban went and searched every place; but as he entered into Rachel's tent (who had hid them under the camel's furniture, and set herself down upon them), she kept her sitting, and alleged in excuse that the condition she was in allowed her sex to be excused from the usual ceremonies. Laban, not suspecting the fallacy which his daughter had put upon him, in point of modesty, desisted from any further search, and so went and acquainted his son-in-law with his bad success; whereupon Jacob, appealing to his very friends, sharply upbraided him with his unjust suspicion; and then, recounting the long servitude he had held him in, and the many hardships he had made him undergo, both day and night, together with the cruel and unequal terms he had all along put upon him, he concluded with these words, 'Except the God of my father had been with me, surely thou hadst sent me away empty.'

This charge of Jacob's was so just, that Laban could make no defence for himself; and therefore he thought it best to let fall the debate, and to enter upon a more agreeable subject, which was to make an alliance between them, and to erect a ^a monument as a standing witness of it to all future ages. At the same time, they took mutual oaths that neither of them should, at any time, invade the other; and Jacob in particular, that he would use his wives and children with all becoming tenderness and affection.

When this ceremony was over, and a sacrifice in confirmation of it offered, Jacob feasted the whole company for the rest of the day; ^b and in the morning, Laban

^a This monument Jacob seems to have erected after the same manner as he did that at Bethel. It must not be supposed to have been a heap of loose stones; for then it could not have continued long in the same position, nor given a name to the country around it. It was, doubtless, a regular and permanent building; but then, what the form and figure of it was, it is not so easy to determine. Had it been only for a memorial to posterity, and not for some present transaction also, the figure either of a column or pyramid would have been very proper; but we find that the present use of it was, to eat and sacrifice upon; and therefore we may imagine that it was made in the figure of a table, and have some authority to think of a round table, because the name which Jacob calls it by is taken from a verb which signifies to turn round, as the word Gilal is properly the circumference of a circle.—Bibliotheca Biblica.

^b Gen. xxxi. 46. 'And Jacob said unto his brethren, gather stones; and they took stones, and made an heap, and having embraced and blessed the whole family, returned home to Padan-Aram.

Jacob had no sooner parted with his father-in-law, but the remembrance of his brother's ancient grudge against him began to give him fresh uneasiness; but the vision of a great number of angels, sent from heaven to protect him, which he had in his way to Canaan (at a place which he therefore called ^d Mahanaim, that is, two camps, namely, one of the angels, and the other of his own retinue), did dissipate his anxiety for a while. As he approached to his brother's country, however, his fears and uneasiness returned upon him; and therefore he thought it advisable, before he advanced any farther, to send him a submissive message, in order to discover at least how he stood affected to him. Esau, when Jacob was gone to Haran, understanding how strictly his father had charged his brother not to marry a Canaanitish woman, began to be dissatisfied with his own marriages; and therefore went to Ishmael, and having married one of his daughters, settled in mount ^e Seir, in the land of Edom. Hither it was that Jacob sent some of his ^f chief servants, with instructions to they did eat there upon the heap.' It might be thought to tend more strongly to impress the mind, when this feast of reconciliation was eaten upon that very heap that was designed to be the lasting memorial of this renewed friendship.—Ed.

^c Interpreters are generally of opinion that these were two hosts or armies of angels, whereof one was that of the guardian angel of Mesopotamia, who, with his company, conducted Jacob safe to the confines of Canaan, where the guardian angel of Canaan, with his company, received him into their care; and this is inferred from the necessity of such protection, by Jacob's being exposed to the treachery of Laban, and the cruelty of Esau, which made providence more particularly careful of him to whom the promises were made. But it is sufficient to the purpose of giving the patriarch comfort and encouragement under his uneasy apprehensions, that besides his own family, which was pitched here in order like a camp, a certain number of angels were represented to him, as drawn up like another army, ready and prepared for his defence.—Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

^d This place was situated between mount Gilead and the river Jabbok, not far from the banks of the latter, and very near the confines of Gad, and half tribe of Manasseh, which was on the east of Jordan. It became in time a city of great strength, and for this reason was made choice of by Abner for the seat-royal of Ishbosheth the son of Saul, when he made war against David, and for a retiring place by David himself, during the rebellion of his son Absalom.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 1. c. 13.

^e The mountains of Seir lay on the east and south of the Dead sea, and the country extended itself from thence to the Arabian gulf. It is certain from Gen. xxxvi. 21, 22, that in Abraham's days the Horites, who were the descendants of Seir, had the possession of this region; and therefore we may suppose, that after the departure of Jacob, Esau, who, according to the prediction concerning him, was to 'live by his sword,' expelled the old inhabitants, and made himself prince thereof, before his brother returned from Mesopotamia. From Gen. xxxii. 13, xxxiii. 4, xxxvi. 8, 9, and Deut. ii. 12, we may learn that Esau made war with these people with great success, though we have of it no particulars in the writings of Moses.—Calmet's Dictionary, under the word Seir.

^f Several commentators have taken notice of Jacob's great wisdom and prudence, in the order and disposition of this his embassy to his brother. He sent his servants, and not his sons, though that would have been doing a great deal more honour; but then it would have been running too great a risk. In the present which he sent, he put a space between drove and drove, that the more time was taken up in their passing by Esau, his passion might still grow cooler and cooler; that the present itself might make so much the greater appearance; and that if the acquaint his brother, that after a stay of twenty years in Mesopotamia, and the acquisition of all manner of wealth there, he was now upon his return to his native country; but that he could not pass over Jordan, without notifying his arrival to him, and imploring his favour and friendship.

The messengers went, and soon returned again, but with this melancholy news, that his brother was coming to meet him at the head of four hundred men; which made him to conclude, that this must be with an hostile intent, and in order to destroy both him and all that belonged to him. In this situation what could he do? To fight he was not able, and to fly, his retinue was too cumbersome. At length he came to this resolution, to divide his company into two bands, that if Esau should fall upon one, he might have a possibility of escaping with the other. And having done this, he addressed himself to God in a very humble and submissive prayer; acknowledging "his great mercies to him, and his own unworthiness of them; imploring his future protection against his brother's sword; and that he would be so gracious as to fulfil all his former promises to him."

Jacob had acquainted his brother how God had enriched him; that therefore his first message might not look like an empty piece of formality, he ordered a present of the choice of his flocks and herds to be sent before, in several droves, and charged the drivers, whenever they met his brother, they should tell him, that they were presents sent by Jacob to his lord Esau, in hopes of obtaining his favour and good-will; and after this he sent his wives, and children, and all his substance, over the brook^a Jabbok, early next morning, before it was day, whilst himself, all alone,^b tarried behind for some time. And here it was that an angel, in the shape of a man, appeared to him, and began to wrestle with him. The contest was certainly unequal; but so it was, that the angel did not overcome him; but, to show how easily he might have done it, at one touch he put his thigh out of joint. He then told him the symbolical intent of his wrestling with him; and after he had blessed him, gave him^c the additional name of Israel, which signifies, 'a droves which went first were not well accepted by him, those who came later might be at distance enough to hasten back to their master, and give him intelligence of what he was to expect. In the form of address, he ordered them all to make use of the same words; first, that the repetition of them might strike the deeper, and make the stronger impression upon Esau; secondly, that they might not spoil the compliment, or not speak so properly, if left to their own expression; and, thirdly, that Esau might know, by the very turn and elegance of them, that the words of the message came from Jacob. (Masculus, Ainsworth, Patrick, &c.) The appellation he gives his brother, of being his lord, and himself his servant, we shall take notice of hereafter.

^a This is a small river, which is by all agreed to flow from the adjacent mountains of Gilead; but some make it run into the sea of Galilee, others into the river Jordan, below, or south of that sea.—Wells's Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 1. c. 1.

^b Though the reason which made the patriarch, after he had forded the river, to try if it was passable for his family, return back again, and not go along with them, be not expressed by Moses, it is very natural to suppose, that he stayed some time behind his family in the place of vision, which he afterwards called Peniel, to recommend himself and them in prayer, as the danger approached nearer and nearer, to the protection of Almighty God.—Masculus, Patrick, and Bibliotheca Biblica.

^c The words in the text, according to our translation, are,

man that has prevailed with God; and this occasioned Jacob to call the place where this transaction happened Peniel, or the face of God, because he concluded that it was God, or some of his angels, who had had this conflict with him.

As soon as the angel was gone, Jacob, though lame, made what haste he could to join his company; and it was not long before he saw his brother afar off, coming towards him with a large retinue, which made him betray some fresh tokens of distrust: and therefore, to prepare for the worst, he divided his family into three companies, and placed them at equal distances; the two maids, and their sons went first; Leah and her children next; and Rachel and Joseph, who was then about six years old, as farthest from danger, were the last; whilst himself marched in the front of all, and, as he approached his brother, bowed himself to the ground seven times.

Whatever apprehensions Jacob might conceive of Esau's resentments, he had the happiness to meet him in a much better temper than he expected. At first sight he ran to meet him; he embraced him with the greatest tenderness; he wept over him with tears of joy; and seeing his wives and children prostrate themselves before him one after another, and in the same order wherein Jacob had disposed them, he returned their civilities with the same tenderness that he had his brother's. The presents indeed which Jacob had sent him he kindly acknowledged, but desired to be excused from accepting of them, because they were superfluous to him, who had enough of every thing; but Jacob pressed him so earnestly, that at length he prevailed; and therefore to make him a recompense, Esau invited him to Seir, and proffered his services to accompany him thither. Jacob, however, had no design to accept of the invitation, and yet was afraid directly to refuse it; and therefore he represented the tenderness of his children and flocks, and that they could not travel with expedition. He begged that they might not confine him to their slow movements, but that he would return home at his own pace; and promised withal, that they would follow as fast as they could conveniently. Esau then offered to leave him a sufficient number of his men, that might guard and conduct him into his territories; but this compliment likewise Jacob, in an handsome manner, evaded, and so they^d parted; Esau went to Seir, and expected his

'Thy name shall no more be called Jacob, but Israel;' and yet it is certain, that this patriarch was very frequently, nay, in the very next verse but one, is called Jacob; and therefore this seeming contradiction may be amended, by rendering the word, instead of no more, not only; or, not so much Jacob as Israel; because it is certain, that in his posterity at least (who were called Israelites, but never Jacobites) the latter name abolished the former. Israel is certainly derived from the word Sar, which, as St. Jerome observes, signifies a prince, with the Jod, which is the common note of a proper name; but there is some obscurity in our translation, as to the latter part of the verse, 'as a prince hast thou power with God, and with men, and hast prevailed;' which should rather be translated, 'Thou hast been a prevailer with God, and with men thou shalt also powerfully prevail.' This is the literal version of the words; is consonant to the vulgar Latin, Ukelos, and the Septuagint; and very justly expresses the true sense of the phrase.—Patrick's Commentary, and Shuckford's Connection, vol. 2. b. 7. c. 7.

^d After this, Moses gives us no farther account of Esau and his family, only that he was assisting at his father's funeral, and had three wives, whereof it is proper to take notice, that when he barely mentions these wives, (as in Gen. xxvi. 54, and Gen. xxxvii. 2.) he brother to follow him; but his brother turned another way, and, by easy journeys, came to Succoth, which in Hebrew signifies booths, and there, intending to settle for some time, he built a house for his family, and proper conveniences for the reception of his cattle. But in a short time he removed from hence, and a safely arrived at Shechem, where having purchased a piece of ground of Hamor, the father of Shechem, for an hundred ^b pieces of money, he pitched his tents in the place, and there built an altar to the Lord, whom he called 'El Elohe-Israel,' or 'the mighty God of Israel.'

Here Jacob might have lived peacefully and happily, being beloved by all the people, had not c Dinah's curiosity of visiting the women of the city proved the cause of much mischief, and obliged her father to withdraw. Shechem, the son of Hamor the Hivite, who was prince of that country, saw her, fell in love with gives them quite other names than what he does when he comes to speak of the posterity which Esau had by them, Gen. xxxvi.; which may lead an unwary reader to think that he had more than three, especially when the fathers of the two first are likewise called by different names. Thus his first wife Judith, the daughter of Beeri, is afterwards called Adah, the daughter of Elon the Hittite; the second, namely, Bathsheba, the daughter of Elon, is again called Aholi Bamah, the daughter of Ana, the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite; and the last, called in one place Mahalah, is now called Bathshemah; but what shows these two latter names mean the same person, and that the same thing may be supposed of the other two, is, that in both places she is called 'the daughter of Ishmael, the sister of Nabajoth.' All the account that can therefore be given of this difference is, that they had two names, and that it was usual to call them sometimes by one and sometimes by another; in the like manner, as we find the mother of Abijam, king of Judah, in one place called Maacah, the daughter of Abishalom, (1 Kings xv. 2.) and in another, Michaiah, the daughter of Uriel of Gibeath, (2 Chron. xiii. 2.) with many more instances of the like nature. After having taken this notice of Esau's wives, Moses enumerates his children, and some of their descendants, the princes of the tribes of the Edomites; the kings that succeeded them, and the chiefs who governed after the kings; but as to the order of succession, wherein they are to be placed, there is some dispute among the learned. One remark more that we shall make before we part with Esau, is, that, all things considered, he was not that very bad man which some would make him. His generous and open temper appears in his affectionate deportment towards his brother, and his speedy and utter oblivion of the slights and perfidies he had received from him; and, though St Paul calls him a profane person, and says that he was hated of God, yet all that he means by the word hatred, is no more than a bare postponing. For the apostle's purpose is to show, that God had all along bestowed the favours which lead to the Messiah on whom he pleased: on Abraham, not on Lot; on Jacob, not on Esau; on the Jews, not on the Gentiles. And he therefore calls him profane, not because he was more wicked than other men of his age, but because he seems not to have been so mindful of the promises made to his family as Jacob was, and consequently was not so fit to be the heir of the mercies peculiar to it.—Universal History, b. l. c. 4. and Stuckford's Connection, vol. 2. c. 7.

a The words in our translation are, that 'Jacob came to Shalem, a city of Shechem;' but, besides that there was no such place as Shalem in the confines of Shechem, (which seems itself, at this time, to have been but a small town, without any dependant villages,) since the word Shalem is so frequently taken adjectively, to denote any thing safe and sound, as we call it, and as Onkelos, and some of the best Jewish interpreters have it, it may very properly be rendered so here. And this soundness, as some imagine, may have reference to Jacob's halting, which was perfectly cured before he reached Shechem; as his safety has respect either to his having escaped all danger, at his interview with his brother, or rather to his having met with no evil accident of any sort, since he left Laban: and this observation Moses might rather be induced to make, because he was just going to relate a sad disaster, that not long after his arrival at Shechem, befell his family. Shechem, by the by, otherwise called Sichar, was a city of Samaria, situate among the mountains belonging to the tribe of Benjamin, ten miles from Shiloh, forty from Jerusalem, and fifty-two from Jericho, near which was Jacob's well or fountain, where our blessed Saviour entered into conversation with the Samaritan woman, John iv. 7.—Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentary, Calmel's Dictionary, and Wells's Geography of the Old Testament.

b The word keslith, which is here rendered 'a piece of money,' signifies likewise a lamb, from whence the Septuagint, Vulgate, Olear, and others, have translated it 'an hundred lambs:' but since, long before this, money was in use, and made the instrument of traffic, (Gen. xxiii. 16.) which must of course destroy the method of exchanging one commodity for another, it is much more probable, that it was some sort of coin, though of what value it is uncertain, which had a lamb stamped upon it, and was called by that name, as we do call an angel, from the stamp it bears of one. (Universal History, b. l. c. 7. and Patrick's Commentary in locum.)—There is great reason to believe, that the earliest coins struck, were used both as weights and money; and indeed this circumstance is in part proved by the very names of certain of the Greek and Roman coins. Thus the Attic mina and the Roman libra, equally signify a pound: and the stater of the Greeks, so called from weighing, is decisive as to this point. The Jewish shekel was also a weight as well as a coin: 3000 shekels, according to Arbuthnot, being equal in weight and value to one talent. This is the oldest coin of which we any where read, for it occurs, Gen. xxiii. 16, and exhibits direct evidence against those who date the first coinage of money so low as the time of Croesus or Darius, it being there expressly said that 'Abraham weighed to Ephron four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchant.' With respect to the stamp or impression which the first money bore, the primitive race of men being shepherds, and their wealth consisting in their cattle, in which Abraham is said to have been rich, for greater convenience, metals were substituted for the commodity itself. It was natural for the representative sign to bear impressed the object which it represented; and thus accordingly the earliest coins were stamped with the figure of an ox or a sheep. For proof that they actually did thus impress them, we can again appeal to the high authority of Scripture: for there we are informed that Jacob bought a parcel of a field for an hundred pieces of money. The original Hebrew, translated 'pieces of money,' is kesitoh, which signifies lambs, with the figure of which the metal was doubtless stamped. (Maur. Ind. Antiq. vol. vii. p. 470.) It is certain that in many countries the coin has had its name from the image it bore; so, among our ancestors, a coin was called an angel because it bore the image of an angel; hence, also, a Jacobus, a Carolus, a Louis (Louis d'or), a Joe, a Napoleon, because certain coins in England, Spain, France, and Portugal, bore on one side the image of the kings of those countries, James, Charles, Louis, Joseph, Napoleon. The Athenians had a coin called bovs, an ox, because it was stamped with the figure of an ox. Hence the saying in Æschylus's Agam. v. 36, "I must be silent concerning other matters; a great ox has come upon my tongue," to signify a person who had received a bribe for secrecy, that is, a sum of money on each piece of which an ox was stamped. The word opes, riches, is a corruption of oves, sheep, because, these animals, in ancient times, constituted the principal riches of their owners; but when other cattle were added, the word pecunia, (from pecus, cattle,) which we translate money, and from which we still have our English term pecuniary, appears to have been substituted for oves, because pecus, pecoris, and pecus, pecudis, were used to signify all kinds of cattle, large and small. Among our British and Saxon ancestors we find coins stamped with the figure of an ox, horse, hog, goat, &c., and this custom arose in all probability, both among them and other nations, from this circumstance, that in primitive times the coin was the ordinary value of the animal whose image it bore.—Clarke's Comment. Gen. xxxiii. 19.—Ed.

c At what time this misfortune happened to Dinah, the Scriptures gives us no account: it is presumed, however, from the bold exploit of her two brothers to avenge her dishonour, (which implies that they were men grown,) that she could not be less than fifteen or sixteen years of age; and the occasion of her running herself into this premature, Josephus tells us, was a great festival then held at Shechem, which she, desirous to see the fine sights and fashions of the place, adventured to go to.—Antiquities, b. l. c. 21.

her, and having gained a secure opportunity, ravished her. But notwithstanding this dishonourable act, his soul was so enamoured with her charms, that he desired nothing more earnestly than to marry her; and to this purpose prevailed with his father, to enter upon a treaty with her friends. Jacob soon heard of the rape committed upon his daughter, but concealed the matter until his sons were come home; and when he had made them acquainted with it, their resentment grew to such an height, that they vowed severely to revenge the dishonour done unto their family. In the mean time, Shechem having prevailed with his father to obtain him the damsel, they both went together to make the proposal to her father; promising to give her as large a dowry, and her relations as costly presents as he should desire; and alleging withal, that if his family were to intermarry with the Shechemites, it would prove the most effectual means to make them both live together in perfect harmony and friendship. This was a fair offer; but the treacherous sons of Jacob, who meditated nothing but the most bloody revenge, made them this reply: "That it was not lawful for them to contract an affinity with any uncircumcised nation, but that, if he and his people would consent to be circumcised, as they were, they would then come into his proposal."

Hamor and Shechem agreed very readily to this condition; and when they returned to the city, and had convened the inhabitants: "They commended the Israelites highly for a peaceable and good-natured people, from whom they might reap many great advantages, and in process of time make all their substance (which was very considerable) their own, if they were to intermarry with them; but that this would not be done without a general consent to be circumcised." How averse soever the people might be to such an operation at first, yet the thirst of gain, joined with the powerful interest which Shechem had among them, soon won their consent, inasmuch, that on that very day, every male of them was circumcised. But ^b three days after this, when their wounds had made them incapable of making any resistance, Simeon and Levi entered the city, and having put all the men to the sword, made search in Shechem's house, where they found their sister Dinah, and brought her away. After which they re-entered the town, plundered the houses, took both women and children captives,

^a This shows more fully, that the custom of those times was, as we noted before, for men to give money for their wives, and to give it generally to their parents. The money, or presents so given, were by the Greeks called ἑδώριον; for so we find Vulcan, when he had caught his wife Venus in an act of incontinency, telling her and her paramour, that he would not let them go "until the mother shall have given him back the whole of the bridal gifts presented by him for the impudent damsel." But there was a great reason for a dowry now, and a large one too, that he might make compensation for the wrong he had done. There is to be observed, however, a natural equity in the subsequent law of Moses, (Exod. xxii. 16, and Deut. xxii. 28.) by which a man was bound to make satisfaction to the father, if, either by enticement or violence, he had abused his daughter.—Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentary.

^b The third day, as physicians take notice, was the time when fevers generally attend circumcision, occasioned by the inflammation of the wound, which was generally more painful than, as the Hebrews observe, than at any time else; and for this reason, the sons of Jacob took the opportunity of falling upon the Shechemites, when they were least of all in a condition to defend themselves.—Howell's History.

and carried away all the cattle that they found in the neighbouring places.

Jacob was much concerned at the furious proceedings of his sons, for which he justly reproved them. He was apprehensive indeed, that the inhabitants of the land would unite against him, and destroy his family for this violent outrage; but Simeon and Levi, who were the chief actors in the tragedy, were so warmed with the thoughts of the dishonour done to their sister and family, that they did not think they had carried their resentment in the least too far for so base an injury. Jacob, however, thought it advisable, for his own security, to tarry no longer there, but to shift into some other part of the country. And accordingly, having received particular directions from God to remove to Bethel, and there to build an altar, (whereon to perform the vow which he made when he fled from his brother Esau,) he set his resolution to go thither: but before he did that, being willing to carry nothing that might be offensive to God, to so sacred a place, he found it necessary to make a reformation in his family. To this purpose he commanded all that proposed to go along with him, to bring out their idols; which they not only did, but gave up their ^c ear-rings likewise, which they were used to wear as spells or amulets against sickness, and other misfortunes. These he took and buried privately in a deep hole, which he caused to be dug under an oak, near Shechem; and so having purified ^d themselves, even to

^c It was a custom in several countries, for the men as well as the women, and for the meaner as well as the better sort, to wear ear-rings, and therefore we find Plautus in his play called Poenulum, Act v., taking this notice of some Carthaginian slaves,—"That their hands should be without fingers, one would think, because they wore their rings in their ears." But, besides the rings designed for ornament, it was a common thing for idolatrous nations to wear others for superstitious uses. These, as some say, were made in form of a semicircle, and reached over the forehead from ear to ear. They had astronomical characters and signatures engraven upon them, and to them they imputed a thousand supernatural virtues. They were always dedicated to some false deity; and therefore St. Austin, in several places, exerts himself with a becoming zeal, against such impious fooleries, and tells his countrymen, the Africans, (among whom this custom had got some footing,) that in this execrable superstition, as he calls it, they did not design to dress themselves out to please men, so much as to serve and please devils. And therefore Jacob was highly to be commended for destroying these relics of idolatry, which his haste to be gone, both according to God's command, and his own apprehensions of danger, made him bury under ground, rather than stay to melt them down.—Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentary; Heidegger's Hist. Patriar. vol. 2. Essay 13; and Calmel's Dictionary under the word Rings.

^d The manner wherein Jacob required of his domestics to purify themselves, was by washing their whole bodies, and putting on clean and fresh apparel; and that this was a custom among other nations as well as the Jews, when they sat about any solemn and religious office, is plain from that passage in Enripides where Alcestris, being to perform some holy rites in behalf of her children, "In the waters of the stream she lav'd their lily skin, and from the cedar-wood halls, bringing beautiful apparel, she gaily bedecked them,—then, standing before the shrine, she pray'd." But of all other nations, the Egyptians, (as Herodotus tells us, b. I. c. 37.) and more especially their priests, were most remarkable for this sort of cleanliness. "They shaved their bodies all over every third day; they bathed themselves in cold water twice a day, and twice a night; and wore constantly nothing but linen vestments, and shoes made of papyrus; for this reason I suppose, because they were the most proper to be washed." Not that we are to suppose that God respects a worshipper by his spongy appearance, so long as his conscience is polluted within. In the washing and changing of their garments, they set forward to Bethel, and arrived there safe, and without any disturbance, because God had struck such a terror into the cities round about them, that, notwithstanding the late provocation in the matter of Shechem, nobody offered to molest or pursue them.

As soon as Jacob came to Bethel, where ^a Deborah, his mother's nurse, happened to die, he erected an altar, as God had commanded him, whereupon he performed his vow; and not long after, God appeared to him again, confirming the change of his name, and giving him fresh assurances of his design to multiply his posterity, and to give him the inheritance of the land of Canaan; which induced him to erect a pillar of stone, whereon he poured a drink-offering and oil, as a lasting monument of his gratitude and devotion.

The desire which Jacob had to visit his aged father made his stay in Bethel not long; and therefore, removing from thence, he intended to have reached ^b Ephrah, which was not far distant, that night, but was prevented by Rachel's falling in labour of her second and last child, for of him she died as soon as she was delivered, sordidness indeed there is something distasteful, and it is an unseemly thing to appear before a great man in dirty apparel; but the principal design of God's appointing this outward cleanliness, was to be a sign and memorandum to the person approaching his presence, what the inward temper and complexion of his mind should be; and therefore we find the royal Psalmist, in allusion to this very custom, declaring his pious purpose, 'I will wash my hands in innocency, and so will I go to thy altar,' Ps. xxvi. 6.—Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentary.

^a In Gen. xxiv. 59, we read that Deborah went along with her mistress Rebecca, when Isaac's steward was sent to conduct her out of Mesopotamia; how is it, then, that we find her here in Jacob's retinue so long afterwards, and when he was returning from the same place? The Jewish doctors tell us, that Rebecca, having promised her son at his departure that she would send for him again, as soon as she found him out of danger, did now send Deborah to fetch him back. But, besides that a younger messenger would have been much more proper, we do not find that Jacob was sent for, but that he left the country, by God's appointment, and upon the bad usage of his father-in-law. Some Christian commentators are, therefore, of opinion, that after she had brought her mistress Rebecca to her marriage, and seen her well settled in her family, she went back to Haran again, and there dwelt in Laban's house, till, upon Jacob's returning home, she, having a desire to see her old mistress once more, put herself under his convoy. Others again suppose, that Jacob had been at his father's house before this time; or that, after Rebecca's death, Deborah hearing of his return into Canaan, might be desirous to spend the remainder of her life with his wives, who were her countrywomen. Any of these conjectures may be sufficient to solve the difficulty of her being found in Jacob's family; and the reason why Moses takes notice of her death is, not so much because it was a circumstance of moment enough to be preserved in history, as that it was of use to assign the reason why the oak near which she was buried, and which perhaps was still standing in his days, came by its name. But what will in some measure serve, both to vindicate the sacred historian, and to show, at the same time, how much these nurses and women, who had the care and education of persons of birth and quality, were honoured and esteemed in those early days, is this passage, upon the like occasion, in the poet Virgil:—"Thou Caieta, nurse of Æneas, hast also conferred eternal renown on our shores; even still the memory of thy tomb exists, and thy name points out thy grave in the great Hesperia!"—Æneid, b. 7.

^b This place was afterwards called Bethlehem, a city about two leagues distant from Jerusalem, famous for the birth of David, king of Israel, but infinitely more so for the birth of Christ, the Son of God, and Saviour of the world.—Calnet's Dictionary.

and had just time to name him Benoni, that is, 'the son of sorrow;' but his father, unwilling to perpetuate the remembrance of so melancholy a subject, called him ^c Benjamin, which signifies 'the son of my right hand, or 'my strength.' She was buried in the way to Ephrah, where her husband built ^d a monument of stone over her grave, which the sacred historian tells us was extant in his days. But this was not the only misfortune which attended Jacob in this place: his eldest son Reuben, having taken a liking to Bilhah, the concubinary wife which Rachel had given him, made no scruple to commit incest with her; which thing grieved his father so, that, though he forbore taking any present notice of it, yet he could not but ¹ resent it at his dying hour. Soon after this Jacob left this melancholy place, and came at length to Maure, the place of his father's abode, who was doubtless not a little overjoyed at the return of his son, after so long an absence.

CHAP. II.—Difficulties Obviated, and Objections Answered.

THE worst accusation against our patriarch is that of his purloining, as some may call it, or appropriating to himself a considerable part of Laban's substance; and shame light on him who pretends to apologize for this, in order to give countenance to any trick or collusion in matters of commerce. The Scripture only relates the fact, without either censure or approbation; and we read it to wrong purpose if, because we find a thing recorded of a patriarch, and yet not censured by the holy penman, we therefore immediately conclude it to be right.² Men will be men, full of imperfections, and governed by their passions, so long as they live in this world: nor are the examples propounded in Scripture to beget in us humility and watchfulness, upon every remembrance of human frailty, but the laws contained

² Scripture Vindicated.

^c From the different names which the father and mother gave this son of theirs, some have observed, that names are oftentimes strangely adapted to things, and the presages of parents have anciently been observed to be fulfilled; "Alas, the auguries of parents are never unfulfilled!" Which was certainly nowhere more than in the fate of Benjamin's posterity, since no tribe in Israel was more valorous, and yet none more subject to disasters, than his; since it was almost quite extirpated in the time of the Judges, ch. xx., and yet, before the conclusion of that age, became so powerful as to have the first king of Israel chosen out of it.—Patrick's Commentary.

^d The learned Bochart is of opinion that this monument of Rachel's, which is the first that we read of in Scripture, was a pyramid, curiously wrought, and raised upon a basis of twelve large stones, whereby Jacob intended to intimate the number of his sons. It was certainly standing in the time when Moses wrote, ver. 20, and just before Saul was anointed king there is some mention made of it, 1 Sam. x. 2. But that the present monument cannot be the same which Jacob erected, is very manifest from its being a modern and Turkish structure. Mr Le Brun, who was at the place, and took a draught of it, says that the tomb is cut into the cavity of a rock, and covered with a dome, supported by four pillars, on fragments of a wall, which open to the sepulchre. The work is rude enough, and without any ornament; but the whole is as entire as if it had been but just made, which makes it hard to imagine that it had subsisted ever since Jacob's time.—Maunderell's Travels, and Calnet's Dictionary.

therein, which are true and righteous altogether, to be the rule and measure of our conduct. We readily grant, therefore, that this action of Jacob's, considered in itself, according to the rules of strict justice, can hardly be vindicated; but then we are to remember, that there was a much superior agent, even the great Proprietor of the world, and who has an undoubted right to transfer possessions where he pleases, by whose direction it was done.

For suppose we allow (what some great men, both physicians and philosophers, are wont to maintain) that the fancy of the dam, in the time of conception, is of power sufficient to influence the form, and shape, and colour of the young, and to produce the effect which it had upon Laban's cattle; yet we cannot imagine that Jacob knew anything of this secret. Men had not as yet inquired into the powers of nature, and observations of this kind were not much regarded. ¹ Religion and the worship of God was, in these days, the wisdom of the world; and a simplicity of life, and integrity of manners, more studied than any curious and philosophical speculations. If study and philosophy had helped men to this knowledge, how came Laban and his sons to be utter strangers to it? And yet, had they not been strangers, they could not but apprehend that Jacob might by art variegate the cattle as he pleased, and would not therefore have made so weak a bargain with him. They certainly, therefore, had no notion that any such thing could be done, neither had Jacob any intelligence of it when he made the contract with Laban; but being resolved to be contented with what the divine providence should allot him, he made choice of the speckled cattle merely to put an end to all cavils about wages, as not doubting but that God would so order matters that in the event he should have enough: and therefore his words, 'So shall my righteousness answer for me in the time to come,' are just as if he had said, ² "I may be thought to have acted imprudently in naming this hire, as if it were impossible for cattle that are all white to bring forth any but such as are like themselves; but in the result it will appear that God had respect to my just dealing, and this you will plainly see when you come to pay me my wages."

But though Jacob at first might be ignorant of the secret, yet we cannot deny but that, after the bargain was made, God might give him some intimation of it, and perhaps might enjoin him to put it in execution; and yet, after all, he might not apprehend any natural efficacy in the thing. Instances there are, more than enough, in Scripture, of God's requiring persons to perform such actions as might testify their faith and reliance on his promises, in order to receive such blessings as he intended for them. Thus Naaman the Syrian, when he came to beg of God a cure of his leprosy, was directed ³ 'to wash seven times in Jordan.' Washing in Jordan was to be an evidence of his believing that God would heal him, and upon his giving this evidence he was cured; which was the case of Jacob here before us. God had told him that ⁴ 'he had seen all that Laban had done unto him,' but that he would take care that he 'should not hurt him;' that all Laban's contrivances to defraud him of his wages he would turn so much to his advantage, as that they should tend to the increase of his prosperity; and then, very probably, as a token of his belief and dependance on him, he commanded him to take peeled rods, and use them as he directed. Jacob believed, and did as he was commanded; but all this while he might no more think that the peeling of rods of green boughs, and laying them in the watering places where the flocks were to drink, was a natural way to cause them to bring forth spotted and speckled young ones, than Naaman did, that washing in a river was a cure for a leprosy. But even suppose the case, that Jacob had the notion that party-coloured rods might be a natural means to produce party-coloured cattle; yet if he used them in obedience to the divine command, and not merely as a means to enrich himself at the expense of another, we cannot perceive wherein he was culpable. God Almighty determined to punish Laban for his injustice, and to reward Jacob for his fidelity. He revealed to Jacob the manner in which he designed to bless him, and ordered him to do an action as a token of his reliance on him, for the performance of his promise. Jacob faithfully observed the orders that were given him, and the event proved accordingly.

Here was no trick, no circumvention in the matter; though it must be allowed, that had it been lawful for any private person to make reprisals, the injurious treatment he had received from Laban, both in imposing a wife upon him, and prolonging his servitude without wages, was enough to give Jacob both the provocation and privilege so to do. God Almighty, however, was pleased to take the determination of the whole matter into his own hands; and therefore the true conclusion is, what Jacob himself expresses in his speech to his two wives, 'Ye know, that with all my power, I have served your father, and your father hath deceived me, and changed my wages ten times; but God suffered him not to hurt me. If he said thus, the speckled shall be thy wages, then all the cattle bare speckled; and if he said thus, the ring-streaked shall be thine hire, then bare all the cattle ring-streaked. Thus God hath taken away the cattle of your father, and hath given them to me.'

A man so highly favoured by God, and so sensible of his peculiar goodness, can scarce be supposed capable of making any vow with a mercenary view, or of neglecting to perform it, when made. The vow which the patriarch made upon his journey into Mesopotamia, is conceived in these terms. ⁵ 'If God will be with me, and keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on, so that I come again to my father's house in peace, then shall the Lord be my God;' that is, I will religiously worship and serve him; but it is an unfair construction to say, that unless God did bring him home in peace, he would not worship him. The right which God has to the service and homage of his creatures, is absolute and alienable: his dominion, his power, his goodness, covenant, and promises, do all require this of us; and therefore the words must mean, either that besides God's natural property in him, he should have also a farther demand of duty upon him, in consequence of this vow; or ¹ that he would perform some signal service to him, and worship him with a more than ordinary devotion, consecrating (as it follows) the place where he then stood to his honour; offering him sacrifices, and giving him the tenth of all he had, to maintain this worship.

Such is the sense of the vow; and the conditions relating to it seem to denote the secret wish and desire of his soul, and not any express stipulation with God. Man certainly cannot insist on terms with his Maker, but he may desire and humbly hope for a supply of his wants. More than this the patriarch does not expect; and less than this God never intended to give. 'Our heavenly Father knows that we have need of food to eat, and raiment to put on,' and it is a renunciation of our dependance upon his providential goodness not to ask them. To serve God for no consideration, but that of his own glory, is a notion that may well enough comport with our future exalted state, when we shall 'hunger no more, neither thirst any more,' and where our service will always be attended with vision; but while we are invested with these weak and frail bodies, they and their concerns will tenderly affect us, and God, who considers whereof we are made, expects no other than that they should.

Considering then the circumstances that Jacob was in, leaving now his own, and going into a strange country, we need not much wonder that we find him solicitous for his daily bread. With his staff he passed over Jordan; and when he returned with a great retinue, the grateful acknowledgment which he makes upon that occasion, he expresses in these words: ² 'I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, and of all the truth, which thou hast shewed unto thy servant;' and a temper like this would never have neglected to pay its vows unto the Most High, had not the patriarch either met with obstructions, that made it not safe for him to go, or waited till God, who had all along conducted him hitherto, should direct him to go to the place appointed for such oblation.

Before he came to that place indeed, we are told that he ³ 'commanded his household, and all that were with him, to put away the strange gods that were among them.' And from hence it may be presumed, that there were several of his family (and possibly Rachel herself) addicted to idolatry, which he might connive at; but this is a mistake, which arises purely from the faultiness of our translation. There the word strange is supposed to refer to gods, and to be another name for idols: whereas the words (Elohei-han-necar) do properly signify 'the gods of the stranger that was among them,' that is, the gods of the Shechemites, whom they had taken captive, and brought into Jacob's family. This alters the sense of the words quite, and throws the charge of idolatry, not upon Jacob's household, but upon the strangers that were in it. The captives of Shechem, which his sons had taken, were now to be incorporated into his family, and put under new restrictions. Whatever singularities were in their dress or ornaments, or in the rites and usages of religion they had been accustomed to, these he intended to abrogate, and to reduce them all to the same purity of worship, and simplicity of life and manners, which he designed to keep up among them. And this is so far from being a stain upon his conduct, as if he were a tame conniver at impiety, that we find him undertake the reformation even of strangers, as soon as they were come under his roof, with a spirit and resolution not unlike that of holy David: ⁴ 'Mine eyes look unto such as are faithful in the land, that they may dwell with me, and whose leadeth a godly life, he shall be my servant.'⁵

Some writers have made it a question, how Jacob, upon his return home, should know where his brother Esau dwelt, and why he should send him so humble and submissive a message: but ⁵ we can hardly imagine that Jacob should be so imprudent as to carry his wives, children, and substance into Canaan, without knowing whether he might safely venture thither. It is presumable, therefore, that while he rested at Gilead, he sent messengers to inquire, whether his father was alive; what condition he was in; how the people of the land were affected to him; and whether he might come and live with security near him. From these messengers he might learn the place of his brother's habitation; and when he found that he should meet with no obstruction, if he could but reconcile Esau to him, he very prudently sent to him likewise, with an intent if he found him inexorable, to bend his course another way. And indeed, if we consider what had passed between Esau and Jacob, before the latter went from home, we shall soon find reason enough why Jacob should send to him, before he adventured to come, and sit down with his substance near his father. Esau still expected to be his father's heir, especially as to his temporalities; and therefore if Jacob had returned home without Esau's knowledge, this, at their father's death, would have laid the foundation of a greater misunderstanding than ever: for Esau would then have thought, that his brother had been inveigling his father, and drawing a great part of his substance from him. He could never have imagined, that any person, in a state of servitude, could have acquired so large a fortune; and therefore when he came to see all that wealth, which he knew nothing of before, he must have concluded that he had defrauded him.

It was not from pride or vanity, therefore, or to gratify an ostentatious humour, that Jacob sent his brother an account of his prosperous circumstances, but partly to recognise the goodness of providence, which had so prospered him, and partly to let him know, that he was not come to raise any contributions, either upon him, or the family; that he had brought his substance with him from Haran, and was not going into Canaan to do him any wrong.

The whole design of this interview with Esau was to procure a firm reconciliation with him; and therefore it is no wonder that Jacob should make use of such terms as were most likely to ingratiate. He knew his brother's rugged and haughty temper, and considered him as a person, who, by his valour and conduct, had raised himself to a principality and dominion, whilst himself, for twenty years together, had lived in no better capacity than that of a servant; and therefore he might justly think, that this difference of appellations did not misbecome their different conditions of life.

By the divine direction indeed, he was constituted Esau's lord; nor did he forego that prerogative by calling himself Esau's servant. Lord and servant were no more then, than (what they are now) certain modes of civility, which passed between persons of good breeding, without ever adhering to their strict acceptation; and therefore Jacob might make his addresses to Esau in this manner, without any derogation to his spiritual pre-eminence, and confining himself to the bounds of nature, might reverence him as his elder brother.

But how jealous soever we may be of Jacob's honour, it is certain, that the Almighty approved of his conduct, by himself interposing to bring about the desired reconciliation. Before this interview with his brother, and while he lay under terrible apprehensions of his displeasure, ¹ the 'angels,' we are told, met him. They met him, that is, they showed themselves to him, to assure him of their custody; and by and by we see what followed: ² his brother Esau, contrary to his natural roughness, and avowed revenge, comes and treats him in a most friendly manner; which sudden change in Esau, we may reasonably suppose, was occasioned by one of those angels who appeared; and who, working upon his humours and fancy, sweetened him into a particular benignity of temper, so that Jacob, by his humble and submissive behaviour, gained his end.

There is this peculiar hardship upon Jacob, that in the matter of Leah, he was perfectly imposed upon; that he had no design of having any communion with her; was contracted to her sister; and in all probability, had he enjoyed her first, would never have had concern with any other. But the misfortune was, that, in the other's nuptial night, he had carnal knowledge of her, and thereupon was induced to think, that he could not honestly leave her. Her sister Rachel was all this while (bating consummation) his lawful wife to whom he was contracted, to whom he was solemnly married; and therefore he could not in justice relinquish her neither. In this dilemma he was in a manner under a necessity of adhering to both; and as polygamy was not at that time interdicted, he thought he might do it without any violation of the laws of God. The only question is, whether he did not incur the sin of incest in so doing? And to this some Jewish doctors answer, that the prohibition of marriages, within such degrees of consanguinity, was restrained to the land of Canaan only; and that therefore it was not unlawful for Jacob in Haran to take two sisters, nor for Amram in Egypt to take his father's sister: and to this purpose they observe farther, that in the Mosaic law itself, and particularly in the 20th chapter of Leviticus, where the sentence of excision is pronounced against incestuous marriages, there is no punishment assigned to him who shall marry two sisters; which, as they will have it, was, for the honour of Jacob, omitted. However this be, it is certain that there is no such toleration under the Christian dispensation; and therefore he who pretends to pronounce any thing upon a case so singular as this of our patriarch's is, should consider the different state of things, before the promulgation of the law, during the obligation of it, and since the commencement of the gospel; which undoubtedly prohibits both a plurality in wives, and consanguinity in marriages, and requires of its votaries the strictest chastity, from a consideration and motive which neither the law of nature, nor the law of Moses, knew any thing of: ³ 'Ye are not your own, for you are bought with a price; therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's.'

Of all the adventures which happened to Jacob, that of his wrestling is deservedly reckoned one of the strangest, and has therefore been made a matter of doubt, whether it was a real event, or a vision only. ⁴ Maimonides, and some other Hebrew, as well as Christian interpreters, are of opinion, that all this was transacted only in Jacob's imagination. They suppose, that the patriarch, being strongly possessed with the sense of the danger he was going to encounter, saw, in a vision, a man coming to him, and who, after some altercations, began to wrestle with him; that the conflict between them continued till break of day, when his antagonist, not able to get the better, desired to be gone, &c.; and that, as a proof that this vision was more than an ordinary dream, it seemed to him, that the angel touched his thigh: and in effect, as soon as he awoke, he found himself lame, probably by the force of his imagination.

If this explication be admitted, the whole difficulty is at an end. It is natural, perhaps, for a man, under the apprehensions of a dreadful foe, to dream of fighting; and to dream, at the same time, that he comes off victorious, might be accounted an happy omen. But it must be confessed, that the analogy of the story, and more especially Jacob's lameness, which was consequent upon his conflict, will not suffer us to think that all this was only in a dream. The more general therefore, and indeed the more rational opinion is, that this wrestling was real, and that Jacob was actually awake, when engaged in it; but then the question is, who the person was that did encounter him?

Origen, I think, is a little singular, and no ways to be justified in his conceit, when he tells us, that the person with whom Jacob wrestled, was an evil angel, in allusion to which he thinks that the apostle grounds his exhortation: ⁵ 'Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, for we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places.' But that Jacob, who at this time was so immediately under the divine protection, should be submitted to the assault of a wicked angel; that he should merit the name of Israel, that is, the conqueror of God, for overcoming such an one, or call the place of combat Peniel, that is, the face of God, in commemoration of his conflict with such an one, is very absurd, if not an impious suggestion. Those who espouse this opinion, may possibly be led into it from a thought, that the person here contending with Jacob, was an enemy, and come with a malevolent intent against him; whereas nothing can be more evident, (especially by his blessing him before they parted,) that he came with a quite contrary design. ⁶ Among the people of the East, from whence the Grecians came, and brought along with them several of their customs, wrestling was an exercise in great vogue, as highly conducive to the health and strength; and a common thing it was for two friends, when they met together, to amuse and recreate themselves in this way. The Jewish doctors, therefore, seem to be much in the right, when they maintain, that the person who contended with Jacob was a good angel; and as their settled notion is, that those heavenly spirits sing every morning the praises of God, at the approach of day; so the request which his antagonist makes, ¹ 'Let me go, for the day breaketh,' shows him to be one of the angelic host, who had stayed his prefixed time, and was now in haste to be gone, in order to join the heavenly choir: for the prophet Hosea, I think, has determined the matter very plainly, when speaking of Jacob he tells us, that ² 'he took his brother by the heel in the womb, and by his strength he had power with God, yea he had power over the angel, and prevailed.'

How Jacob, who was an hundred years old, could be enabled to do all this, must be imputed to some invisible power that assisted him. ³ An angel is here, in an extraordinary manner, sent to encounter him, and he, in an extraordinary manner, is enabled to withstand him. The whole scene is contrived to cure him of his uneasy fears; and a proper medium to do this was to let him see, that an old man might contest it even with an angel, and yet not be foiled; and the power, he might reasonably conclude, which assisted him in this (if the matter were to come to blows with his brother Esau) would so invigorate his little army of domestics, as to make them prevail and become victorious.

It was a common custom among eastern nations, as appears from several passages in Scripture, to convey the knowledge of things by actions as well as words. To this purpose we find Zedekiah ⁴ 'making him horns of iron,' thereby to portend victory to Ahab; and Elias, ordering Joash ⁵ 'to strike the ground with arrows,' thence to presignify his triumph over the Syrians. Nay, even Hannibal himself, (as the historian ⁶ tells us,) perceiving that his soldiers were not to be encouraged with words, made a public show for them, not so much to entertain their sight, as to give them an image and representation of their own condition. In like manner, we may suppose, that God made use of this expedient to cure Jacob of his dejection; and though Moses (who cannot be supposed to insert every thing) says nothing of the angels giving him this intimation, yet we find it ⁷ in Josephus, that no sooner was the wrestling ended, but a voice called out to him, and said, "Comfort thyself in what thou hast done, for it is not a common adversary that thou hast foiled, but an angel of the Lord: take it for a presage, therefore, that thy posterity shall never fail, and that thou thyself shalt never be overcome."

'O Lord God of my father Simeon, to whom thou gavest a sword to take vengeance of the strangers, who loosened the girdle of a maid to defile her, and polluted her virginity to her reproach: Therefore thou gavest their rulers to be slain, so that they dyed their bed in blood, being deceived. Thou gavest their wives for a prey, and their daughters to be captives, and all their spoils to be divided among thy dear children, who were moved with thy zeal, and abhorred the pollution of their blood, and called upon thee for aid.'⁸ This is the preface to the prayer which Judith makes to God, in the apocryphal book that goes under her name. And indeed were there no other arguments to prove this book spurious, this one passage is enough, where we find the most abominable massacre called a divine work, and perfidy, murder, and rapine, gilded over with the specious names of zeal for God, and indignation against vice. The abhorrence which Jacob expressed of the cruelty of his sons, the sharpness of the reproach uttered against them, the remembrance of it even to the end of his life, and the care he took to recapitulate it upon his death-bed, give us a much juster idea of it, than the writings of some ⁹ of the rabbins, who have undertaken, not only to excuse, but even to commend it. As to the probability of the fact, however, we are not to suppose, that because Simeon and Levi are only mentioned, they therefore were the only persons who had any hand in this wicked exploit. They indeed are only mentioned, because being own brothers to Dinah, both by father and mother, and consequently more concerned to resent the injury done to her honour, they are made the chief contrivers and conductors of it; but it is reasonable to think, that the rest of Jacob's sons, who were old enough to bear arms, as well as the greatest part of the domestics, were engaged in the execution of it: because it is scarcely conceivable, how two men alone should be able to master a whole city, to slay all the men in it, and take all the women captives, who, upon this occasion, may be supposed more than sufficient to have overpowered them.

Nothing is more known and common in history, than to ascribe an action (especially in military affairs) to the chief commanders in it, how many under agents soever they may think proper to employ: and we should deny Moses the common privilege of an historian, if we should account that a fault and omission in him, which, in other writers of the like nature (especially where they study brevity), is reputed a great beauty and perfection. Moses however is far from pleading his privilege in this respect; for having made mention of Simeon and Levi, as the principal leaders in the action, he then proceeds and tells us, that ¹⁰ 'the sons of Jacob,' meaning the rest of his sons who were of competent age (and with them very reasonably their attendants) 'came upon the slain, and spoiled the city, because they had defiled their sister.'

It is very remarkable of the Jewish historian Josephus, that he gives us no manner of account of Reuben's incest, for fear that his recording so vile an action might leave some blot of infamy upon that patriarch and his posterity. But Moses has given us a better proof of his truth and integrity, in that he not only mentions this abomination once, but even in the benediction which his father gives Reuben, makes a remembrance and recital of it. And this he did, that he might give us a true account, why the right of inheritance, which was originally in him, came to be conferred on Joseph; and the kingdom, or right of dominion, which was forfeited by his transgression, came to be translated to the tribe of Judah. This he did, that he might furnish his countrymen with matter sufficient for their humiliation, who by this and many more instances of the like nature, are given to understand, that it was not their merit, but purely God's mercy, which advanced him to the honour of being his peculiar people; and this he did, that he might acquaint us all, how God was pleased to make these great, these elect heads and fathers, instances of human frailty and sin, in order to show, that there is nothing, even nothing in man, unless God by grace be with him; that ¹ ' of ourselves (as the apostle words it) we are not sufficient to do any thing, as of ourselves, but all our sufficiency is from God.'

For the same reason, we may imagine it was, that Moses makes mention of Rachel's stealing away her father's gods, as a probable intimation, that she was not entirely cured of the idolatrous superstition of the country from whence she came.

The Jewish doctors are generally agreed, that the word teraphim, which we render gods, is not of Hebrew extraction. The Septuagint translates it sometimes an oracle, and sometimes vain idols; and several commentators will have it to be a word borrowed from the Egyptians, and to import the very same with their Serapis. ² The Jews indeed pretend, that this idol was the head of a first-born son, plucked off from the neck, and embalmed; under the tongue of which was fastened a golden plate, with the name of some false deity engraven upon it, which being placed in a niche, with lighted candles before it, gave vocal answers to such as came to consult it: but others rather think, that it was the same with what the Persians call telephim, more generally known by the name of talismans, that is, images in human form of different sizes, and different metals, cast under certain constellations, with the figures of some planets and magical characters engraven upon them; whereas others are of opinion, that the teraphim which Rachel stole were the dii penates, or household gods of her father Laban, namely, the images of Noah, the restorer of mankind, and of Shem, the head of his family; and therefore they observe, that Laban, by way of distinction, calls them his gods, that is, the gods of his family. That these teraphim were statues, or images of a human shape and figure, is manifest from ³ Michal's putting one of them into her husband's bed, when she favoured his escape: that at their first institution, their intent was innocent, to be emblems or representations only of some renowned ancestor, whose memory the family was desirous to perpetuate; but that, in process of time, they came to be looked upon as the lares or dii tutelares of the house, were made objects of religious adoration, and at length perverted to all the vile purposes of necromancy, a learned author, ⁴ who has examined this matter to the full, has proved beyond exception.

But whatever men or fictitious deities these figures were made to represent, it is certain, that the use they were chiefly applied to, was to foretel future events, and discover what was hid or lost; and for this purpose were consulted and prayed to as oracles, at certain times, and under some particular aspects of the planets. Among other reasons, therefore, for Rachel's stealing away her father's teraphim, this is generally supposed to be one,

—That he might not, by inquiring of them, gain intelligence which way it was that Jacob had taken his flight.

The truth is, there seems to have been in Laban an odd mixture of religion. In his conversation with Abraham's steward, when he came to negotiate a match for Isaac, he seems to express a very devout sense of the being and providence of God: and yet, at his first coming up with Jacob, he seems to be chiefly solicitous for the loss of his gods, as he calls them, which were but dumb and senseless idols. In the treaty which he makes with Jacob, he invokes the God of Abraham, which is allowed to be the great God of heaven and earth; and yet we can hardly forbear thinking, that he must have believed a plurality of gods, in subordination to the supreme, by reason of his anxious concern for these images. Jacob, no doubt, during his abode with him, used all the interest he had in the family, to rectify his notions, and convince him of his error; but he was not able to prevail; and therefore some imagine, that Rachel stole away his idols, that she might remove the occasion of his superstitious worship, and hinder him from going on in his impiety.

These idols, we may presume, were made of gold, or some very valuable substance; and therefore it may be supposed that she took them along with her, not only to destroy them, but to make herself a reparation likewise for the wrongs she had received from him; and whereof we find both the sisters making this complaint: ⁵ 'Is there yet any portion or inheritance for us in our father's house? Are we not counted of him strangers? for he hath sold us, and hath quite devoured also our money.'

But even supposing the worst of the case, that Rachel did take with her these idols, because she still retained an hankering after the religion of her ancestors; yet Jacob is not to be discommended for marrying one of his own family, who adhered to the true worship of God, though mixed with some superstitious customs, which he might easily reclaim in time, rather than any of the Canaanitish line, which was every day sinking more and more into idolatry; and for that idolatry, and other flagitious practices, were in process of time to undergo an utter excision: especially considering, that when he came into the land of Canaan, where he had full liberty of acting as he pleased, he made a thorough reformation in his family, and had all these little emblems of her former superstition taken from her and destroyed.

The word dudaim, which we render mandrakes, is a Calmet in his Dictionary, gives us a description of this plant, as it is found in the French king's gardens.—Its root is white, and somewhat rough; is two or three times as big again as its stem, and always grows taper. Generally, at some distance from its upper part, it divides into two branches, which is the reason that this root has something of the figure of a man, whose two thighs are represented by the two branches. From the sides of the root proceed a great number of small fibres, in several places, which serve to imbibe the juice of the earth, for the nourishment of the plant. From the root there rises a round and smooth stem, of a pretty deep red; and at the top of the stem grow four branches, which spread at equal distances from each other. Every branch has five leaves, which are indented, of a dark green, and terminate in a point. From the centre of these branches proceeds another very straight and smooth stem, at the extremity of which grows a knob of about twenty-four fruits, round, and of a beautiful red; and within this fruit is a kind of nut, much of the figure with a lentil. This nut includes in it the seed of the one of those terms, whose true signification the Jews, at this time, pretend not to understand. There is but one place more in Scripture, wherein it occurs, and that is in the 7th chapter of Canticles, wherein the bridegroom invites his spouse to go with him into the fields: 'Come, my beloved, let us get up early to the vineyard, let us see if the vine flourish, whether the tender grapes appear, and the pomegranates bud forth. The mandrakes give a smell; and at our gates are all manner of fruits, which I have laid up for thee, O my beloved.' Here we find it placed among the most delicious and pleasant fruits, the grape, the pomegranate, &c., and represented as very fragrant and odoriferous in its smell; but the mandrake, say some, is a stinking and ill scented fruit, of a bad taste, and a cold narcotic quality; and therefore they have rendered the word 'fine and lovely flowers;' and some of them will have it to be the violet or jessamine, (which suit very well with the season of the year here mentioned;) whilst others contend very strongly for the lily, which, in Syria, grew in the fields, and was of a most agreeable beauty and smell.

That passage in Solomon's Song, however, will not suffer us to doubt but that it was a fruit, of some kind or other; and Ludolf¹ in his History of Ethiopia, will needs have it to be what the Syrians call mauz, a fruit much about as big as a small cucumber, that hangs in clusters, sometimes to the number of forty upon the same stalk, and is, in figure and taste, not unlike the Indian fig.

It is not to be doubted, indeed, but that the mandrake in Palestine is of a different kind to what we have in these climates. St Austin, who thought it a great curiosity to see one, tells us that it was very beautiful to the eye, and of a fragrant smell, but utterly insipid; so that he wonders what should make Rachel set so high a value upon it, unless it were its scarceness and rich scent. In the province of Pekin in China, we are informed, that there is a kind of mandrake so valuable, and when mixed in any liquor makes so rich a cordial, that a pound of its root (for in the root lies all the virtue) is worth thrice its weight in silver.

It was a general opinion among the ancients, that there was a certain quality in the juice of mandrakes to excite amorous inclinations; and therefore they called them the apples of love, as the Hebrew word dod, from whence comes dodaim, is frequently set to signify love. Thus, whether we consider this fruit as pleasant to the eye, smell, or taste, or as a restorative to nature, and helpful to conception, any of these reasons are sufficient why Rachel should take such a fancy to them: and why she purchased them at so strange a rate, was chiefly occasioned by Leah's sullen reply, that she had 'taken away her husband's affections from her,' which provoked the other, who, according to the established order of succeeding to his bed, had certainly the property in him that night, to resign him to her.

Moses, however, only mentions this circumstance to let his reader know upon what occasion it was that Leah, after she had done child-bearing, as she thought, came to conceive again. ² It had been below the dignity of such a sacred historian as he is to take notice of such trivial matters, had there not been something of great consideration in them; and what could that be, but chiefly the birth of the 'blessed seed,' which was the object of the hopes of all pious people in these days? It is evident, from the conduct both of Rachel and her sister, that it was children they desired, and not merely the company of their husband; nor would their husband have ever been determined by their blind bargains, had it not been matter of pure indifference to him whether of their embraces he went to, so long as his family was but increased and multiplied.

That it was a very ancient custom, not only among the Hebrews, but with many other nations, and particularly the Greeks and Romans, in the marriages both of their sons and daughters, and especially of the latter, for the parents to give with the bride and bridegroom, as part of the portion or dowry, a servant, to abide in their power and property, is a matter so plain, ^a from sundry examples, that it needs no contesting. The great difficulty is, for what reason it was that these matrons of old were so very desirous that their husbands should have commerce with these their dotal maids, in case they had no children of their own: and for the solution of this we must observe, that according to the principles of the oldest philosophy, spirit is the universal, efficient cause in nature, but especially in generation, and in human generation most of all; so that a spiritual conception must, of necessity, precede and direct every bodily one, insomuch that there can be no corporeal conception without a spiritual one; but a spiritual there may be without a corporeal one, that is, when the matter or medium is not adapted to that purpose. Now, this position being laid down, it may be observed farther, plant, which dies and grows again every year, and has nothing valuable in it but the root, whose virtues are wonderful. Of this plant (as Dioscorides informs us) there are two sorts: one is black, and called the female mandrake, having leaves not unlike lettuce, though less and narrower, which spread upon the ground, and are of a very disagreeable scent. It bears something like services, which are pale, and of a strong smell, with kernels within, like those of a pea. It has two or three very large roots, twisted together, black without, but white within, and covered with a thick rind. The other sort, or the male mandrake, produces berries as big again as those of the female, of a good scent, and a colour not much unlike saffron. Its leaves are large, white, broad, and smooth, like the leaves of a beech tree, and its root resembles that of the female, but is much thicker and bigger, and the quality of them both is to stupify and make sleepy those that take them—B. 6. c. 61. (This plant, though once in great repute in medicine, is now deservedly deemed of none,—it is of no use in cases of barrenness, and is even dangerous to be eaten.)

² Patrick's Commentary.

^a In the tragedy of Euripides, which is called Iphigenia in Aulis, Clytemnestra is brought in, as preparing and hastening all things for the nuptials of her daughter, who, unknown to her, was devoted for a sacrifice, and addressing herself in this manner:—"I the bridemaid am come, but away ye and bring from the chariots those gifts which I am about to present with the girl; with expedition fetch them to the hall." Old Demanetus, in the Asinaria of Plautus, is told by his slave, "Thy spouse, who had more in her hand than you, brought a slave as a marriage gift." These servants among the Greeks were called φέροναι, from whence is derived the Latin verna; and by the Romans, dolales, receptitii, or recepticia. They had likewise the name of λάτρις given them, and their service was expressed by the word λατρεία, which signifies the service due from man to Almighty God; which is wont to be distinguished from any other sort of service, and denotes that such persons were entirely at their mistresses' devotion.—Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. 1. Annotation 32.

A. M. 2149. A. C. 1855; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 3495. A. C. 1916. GEN. CH. XXVIII. 10—XXXVII.

that these matrons very probably were not ignorant that the mother contributes nothing, of herself, towards the formation of the fetus, and much less to its inspiration with life, but merely the bearing it in the womb; and hence they might infer, that the bearing it in the womb was not sufficient of itself to confer a right to the fruit of it, which came thither they knew not how, which they had no hand in the fashioning of, and which they were no more able to quicken, than they were to enliven a dead body. It being, therefore, no strange thing, in these days, for one man to raise up seed for another, or to propagate by another, by parity of reason they might conclude, that one woman might as well do the same for another, or bear in her stead, under such and such circumstances, by the union and co-operation of their wills, and strong attraction of the imagination in two consociating into one. And this was the consideration which moved them to press this matter so very earnestly as they did: when finding that, after they had spiritually conceived of their husbands, by taking them into an ideal image for elaboration, there was wanting strength in them to bear, and to work out what they had received, they could afterwards have no greater pleasure than to appoint one who should faithfully supply that part, wherein they themselves were defective, and thereby be able, not only to remedy the reproach of their barrenness, but to establish a stronger interest in the family for themselves, and for all that they could call their own.

Thus have we endeavoured to silence some of those evils, which may be made against particular passages in the Mosaic history, during this period of time; and for the farther confirmation of its truth and authority, we might produce the testimony of several heathen writers, ² such as Sanchoniatho, Berossus, Hecataeus, Eupolemus, and others, as they are quoted by Eusebius in his Præparatio Evangelica. The fiction of Jupiter's chain in Homer, reaching from heaven to earth, as it relates to the divine providence, had its original from Jacob's ladder. The memory of his wrestling with an angel has been preserved, ever since, by a whole nation's abstaining from a particular part of the thigh, which, without that supposition, cannot be accounted for. Jacob's living with his uncle Laban in the capacity of a servant, gave rise to the story of Apollo's being reduced, when expelled from his father's house, to the necessity of turning Admetus's shepherd. The fable of the Bethleams, which ³ Eusebius takes out of Philo Biblius, came undoubtedly from the altar of Bethel; and, to name no more, the whole business of Jacob's arrival at Shechem upon his return from Mesopotamia, of his daughter Dinah's rape by the prince of the country, and of the terrible revenge which her brothers took for that indignity, is related by Alexander Polyhistor, as he is quoted by the same father, much in the same order, and with the very same circumstances, that we find it recorded in the works of Moses.

CHAP. III.—Of Jacob's Ladder and Pillar.

To judge of the occasion of Jacob's vision, wherein this emblematical ladder was represented to him, we must imagine that we saw the heir of a powerful family taking his leave of his aged parents, and for fear of an angry brother departing from his father's house; beginning a journey of 450 miles, into a strange country, all alone, on foot, and without any servant to attend him: travelling all the day with a pensive heart, and forced at night to take up his lodging in the open air, and with nothing better than an hard stone to be his pillow: if we suppose Jacob in this condition, I say, we shall soon perceive the reason why God thought it convenient, at this time, to give him comfort and consolation in the way of a dream.

That dreams, or nocturnal visions, were a common way of God's revealing himself to mankind of old, is evident from instances almost innumerable; and the reason of his making choice of this method might be, either ⁴ to convince them of his omnipresence, that 'he was about their bed, and about their paths, and spied out all their ways;' or to convince them of his constant care, and that he was not unmindful of them, even when they little thought of him, and were most absent from themselves; or to convince them of his unlimited power over their souls, when even sleep itself could not hinder his access to them; or because that the mind, in the dead and silence of the night, was fitter to receive divine impressions, when nature was hush, and the passions asleep, and no variety of thoughts to distract its attention.

But whatever God's reasons might be for conveying things by dreams, it is certain that the vision of the ladder, and the comfortable words which he spoke from the top of it, made such a lively impression upon Jacob, that he proceeded in his journey with cheerfulness and alacrity: ⁵ 'Behold I am with thee, and I will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and will bring thee again into this land: for I will not leave thee, until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of.' These are the verbal assurances which God gives Jacob; and therefore we may presume that the representation of the ladder had something analogous in it.

This ladder, according to the sense of the ⁶ best interpreters, is an emblem of the divine providence, which governs all things. Its being 'set upon the earth' denotes the steadiness of providence, which nothing is able to unsettle; its 'reaching up to heaven' signifies its universality, or that it extends to all things; the 'several steps of the ladder' are the motions and actions of providence; the 'angels going up and down' show, that they are the great ministers of providence, never idle, but always employed in the preservation of the just; 'their ascending' means their going up to receive the divine orders and commands; and 'their descending,' their coming down upon earth to put them in execution. So that, in this hieroglyphic, God signified to Jacob, now full of care and uneasy apprehensions, that the man who was under the custody and protection of divine providence wanted not company in a wilderness; wanted not security in the midst of dangers; wanted not direction in the most difficult undertakings; since there were so many ministering spirits holding correspondence between earth and heaven, and daily and hourly 'sent forth' from God's presence 'to minister unto them who shall be heirs of salvation.'

Other interpretations there are in great numbers, but too 'a full of fancies and conceits to be here taken notice of. One, however, seems a little more solid, and may not undeserve our observation. ²The promise, we may remember, which God is introduced as making to Jacob from the top of the ladder, does chiefly relate to his covenant with Abraham, which was principally founded in Christ, that chosen seed, 'in whom all the families of the earth were to be blessed;' and the analogy of the thing may induce us to believe that this ladder was designed for a type and emblem of the covenant of grace, which was in force from the time of man's first apostasy, but began to be put in execution at the incarnation of our Saviour Christ, that only Mediator, who opened an intercourse between earth and heaven; by whose intercession, plenty of all spiritual blessings descend to us, and by whose merits and doctrines our natures are sanctified, and so become meet to be 'partakers with the saints in light,' or to ascend into heaven. And to this mystical meaning of the ladder a The rabbins, having given us long chimerical descriptions of this ladder, will have it represent almost every thing that comes into their fancies. Some pretend that the ascending angels were those who had the care of Jacob in his going; the descending, those whose business it was to secure him in his returning from Mesopotamia. Another (Jarchi on Gen. xxviii. 12.) is of opinion, that God designed hereby to point out the place where he would have the temple built one day; and to reconcile this opinion to geography, he affirms that God at this time transported to Luz the hill of Sion, upon which the temple at Jerusalem was afterwards built. Philo, who certainly believed a metempsychosis, tells us, that the angels which Jacob saw are emblems of souls, whereof some descend to animate bodies, whilst others ascend, having quitted the bodies which they once animated. St Austin will have this ladder to represent the cross of Christ; and some of the mystical divines, making it an emblem of a contemplative life, do maintain, that the angels ascending the ladder are those believers whom they call perfect, as having the faculty of causing their affections to soar up to the highest heavens, and that the descending represented those mean and abject souls whose centre is the earth, and whose delight consists in fleshly things. — Saurin's Dissertations.

our Saviour himself may be thought to allude, when he tells us, that ³ 'Hereafter ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man;' which 'a learned commentator has in this manner paraphrased:—'Ye have heard, no doubt, of those of old, that several things relating to the Messias have been represented by Jacob's ladder; and ye are to know, that they are all now to be accomplished in me, and shall every day be more and more accomplished, until the time of my assumption into heaven. Ye shall know that heaven, which by the sin and corruption of mankind was shut in Adam, shall by my dispensation and doctrine be opened again; and that God, being reconciled to the world by me, shall continue in covenant with them for ever. Ye shall know, that I am that ladder and way to heaven, by which ye may gain admittance to the Father; for I am he that unites heaven and earth together, so that from henceforward the angels shall continually be passing from the one to the other. In short, ye shall know, that I am the Lord, not only of the visible creation, but the Prince likewise of angels and all invisible spirits, even the true God. This, I say, ye shall henceforth more fully know, by my doctrine, my miracles, my death, my glorious resurrection, and triumphant ascension into heaven.'

Thus, according to the declaration which God makes from the top of the ladder, it seems reasonable to imagine, that he might have a twofold design in making this representation to Jacob, namely, by a proper type, to prefigure the incarnation of his Son, which, like this ladder, joined heaven and earth, the divine and human natures, together; and by a proper emblem of the angels ascending and descending upon it, to give him an evidence of the watchful providence of God that attended him. The former of these designs might perhaps be a little too abstruse for Jacob's comprehension at present, but the latter he immediately understood; and therefore we find him, as soon as he arose, out of a grateful sense of the divine goodness in sending him a vision so full of consolation, erecting and consecrating a pillar, in order to perpetuate the memory of so momentous an event.

It is the opinion of some commentators, indeed, that to preserve the memory of this heavenly vision, Jacob took the stone whereon his head lay, and wherein they discern nothing extraordinary, and set it up for a monument or pillar upon the top of some other stones, which he had gathered and heaped together: but, besides that the fancy of an heap of stones seems unworthy of the Holy Scriptures, and betrays us into a low and trifling idea of this great affair, there is not the least ground from the text itself, nor from this symbolical way of transmitting facts to future generations, to suppose that there was any more than one single stone.

The word matzebah, which our interpreters render a pillar, is by the Septuagint translated Στήλη, by the vulgar Latin, titulus; and from hence several, both ancients and moderns, have supposed that there was an inscription upon this pillar. The manner of consecrating this pillar was by pouring oil upon it, which Jacob might have by him, without a miracle, considering how common the use of oil was in these hot countries, to refresh the limbs when weary with travelling, and how necessary, upon that account, it was to carry some with him in his journey: nor is there any reason to suppose, that Jacob made use of this form of consecration in compliance with the custom of the country where he then was. It is uncertain whether this custom was established in Jacob's time; but if it was, it is hardly credible that a pious man, as he is represented, would have adopted a superstitious ceremony into the worship of the true God. ¹ The much more probable opinion, therefore, is, that as the rites of sacrificing and circumcision were instituted before the promulgation of the law, so this manner of consecrating things, by way of unction or libation, was at first enjoined the patriarchs Abraham and Isaac by God, and either by precept or tradition from them, came afterwards to be practised by Jacob. Nor is it unlikely but that Jacob's practice in this particular, and the great veneration which was afterwards paid to his monumental pillar, might give occasion ^a to the worshipping such erected stones in future ages, and, upon such abuse, of God's so strictly prohibiting any to be set up: ² 'Ye shall not make ye any idols or graven image, neither shall ye rear up any matzebah,' statue or pillar, 'to bow down unto it, for I am the Lord your God.'

In the religious sense of the word, then, matzebah may properly signify a large consecrated stone, erected pillarwise, before which prostrations and adorations were made, and upon which oblations and libations, but not any bloody sacrifices, were presented: but then the question is, how Jacob could think to secure this monument from being thrown down by the natives or passengers; or how he could impose a new name upon it, and establish that name in future ages, when the place had a name before, and no person was present to bear testimony of what he did. This, indeed, the Scripture gives us no manner of account of; and therefore, if we do it but modestly, we are left at liberty to make our own conjectures.

According to the ancient versions of the word, we may suppose that there was upon this stone some legible and intelligible title or inscription; nor is it improbable that the title should be, what the patriarch in a sort of ecstasy called it, 'Bethel,' or 'the house of God.' How Jacob might be provided with an iron pen, or style, for the purpose of engraving this title, can be no difficult thing to imagine, if we do but consider that the style was the common instrument of writing in those days, which every scholar used to carry about with him, and which Jacob, ^b having led a studious and contemplative life under his father and grandfather, and, as some suppose, under Melchizedek likewise, was not unqualified to make use of; and that the very ancient, if not universal custom of erecting, anointing, and consecrating such like stones, with an inscription, either literal or hieroglyphical, and sometimes both, could hardly have any other foundation than this practice of his.

But besides the bare inscription of the name and title of the stone, there might probably be yet something more to attract the eyes of the traveller, and to raise a veneration for the place. And, therefore, admitting the stone to be square, we find that there were two oaths, as it were, taken upon it, by the covenanting parties, that is, the oath of God to Jacob, repeating the substance of what he had sworn to his fathers, and limiting it to him and his seed; and the oath of Jacob to God, obliging himself and his posterity to such a constant homage as is therein specified; and hereupon we may infer, that for the better preservation of the memory of this great league, there might be written, on one side, the obligation of God, exactly in the terms of the 13th, 14th, and 15th verses; and on the opposite, the obligation of Jacob, as expressed by him in the three last verses of the 28th chapter of Genesis. And, because it was necessary that the name of the person who erected and consecrated the stone should be preserved, we may further suppose, that as God's signing this covenant on his part might be in this form, ANI JEHOVAH, ELOHE ABRAHAM, ELOHE ISAAC, I the Lord, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac; by parity of reason, Jacob's signing might run thus, ANI JACOB, BEN ISAAC, BEN ABRAHAM, I Jacob, the son of Isaac, the son of Abraham.

On the vacant sides of the stone, we may suppose again, that the other awful sentences which Jacob upon this occasion pronounced, ³ 'How dreadful is this place! This is the gate of heaven, and verily the Lord is in this place!' were engraven. And because a very early custom of crowning such public pillars with garlands might very likely take its rise from Jacob's practice at this time, we may therefore be allowed to make one conjecture more, namely, that as Luz, near which this transaction happened, had its name from a grove of almond-trees, not far distant from it: so Jacob might think it very decent, in memory of the divine favours there received, to crown and adorn the top of this titular stone, with a garland of almond branches taken from thence. All this, we allow, is no more than supposition and conjecture: but, without some such contrivance as this, how could this stone have been an instrument to perpetuate the memory of an event? How a means of Jacob's imposing a new name upon a place that was entirely in the possession of others? Well might the natives or proprietors ask, by what authority this was

^a From Jacob's pouring oil upon the stone of Bethel did arise the superstition of the ancients for their betul, which were stones enointed and consecrated to the memory of great men after their death. Sanchoniatho, or rather Porphyry, the author of the fragment which Eusebius has preserved under the name of Sanchoniatho, attributes the invention of these betul to Saturn; but the best account that can be given of this absurd practice is from hence, and a sufficient demonstration it is how the best and noblest acts of piety may be perverted, and degenerate into mere stupidity, by a fond, superstitious imitation.—Calmet's Dictionary, under the word Bethel; and Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. 1.: Occasional Annotations, 30.

^b That Jacob was a man of learning, and of an extraordinary genius, is not only a general tradition of the Jews, but supported likewise by some lines in the character which the pen of Moses gives us of him. He had certainly great advantages under his father and grandfather, who justly deserved a name among the eldest oriental philosophers; and therefore he is described, in the eastern style, as 'a man dwelling in tents,' as much as to say, one who leads a philosophical and contemplative life, or a minister or student of the house of learning, as the Targum truly interpret the phrase.—Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. 1.: Occasional Annotations, 15.

done? And since Jacob was not there to give them an answer, his only way could be to leave the history and occasion of it engraven upon the very stone.

And indeed, without some such supposition, why should this stone, even by different nations, be accounted such a valuable piece of antiquity? Why should the Jews be so fond to have it thought that they had it in the sanctuary of their second temple, and that upon it the ark of the covenant was placed? Since the destruction of their temple, why should it be their custom, one day in a year, with great lamentation, to go and anoint this stone, in remembrance of their father Jacob, and the covenant made with him? And why should the Mahometans pretend, that they have this stone (though by mistake of one patriarch for another, they call it the stone of Abraham) set up at their temple at Mecca, which they make their common Kibla, or point of worship, and before which the pilgrims pay their solemn devotions?

These, we allow, may be no more than false pretences; but still they are an evidence, that this pillar was once held in high veneration, which it could hardly have been, but must very soon have been buried in oblivion and rubbish, had it been no more than a large ragged stone, without any thing to distinguish it, that is, without any sculpture or inscription on it. And therefore, notwithstanding the silence of Scripture, we have sufficient reason to conclude, that this pillar was erected in order to preserve the remembrance of the heavenly vision which God in this place vouchsafed Jacob; that to this purpose it was engraven with such inscriptions as might give posterity sufficient intelligence upon what occasion it was erected; that by means of such inscriptions, it came to be recognised as Jacob's pillar, and held in great esteem in future generations; that this pillar thus engraved, as it was the first of its kind that we have upon record, gave probably the origin to the invention of stylography, or the ancient manner of writing upon stone, ever after; and that the consecration of this stone, and the imposition of a new name upon the place where it stood, is enough to justify the practice of sanctifying places appointed for religious worship, by some solemn form of separation; of calling them 'the house of God,' and imputing to them a relative holiness; in Christian countries, of dedicating them to the memory of departed saints and martyrs; and every where, of observing that wholesome and devout advice of the preacher: 'Keep thy foot when thou goest into the house of God, and be more ready to hear than to give the sacrifice of fools. Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thine heart be hasty to utter any thing before God, for he is in heaven, and thou upon earth; therefore let thy words be few.'

SECT. IV.

CHAP. I.—Of the Life of Joseph,^a which includes the rest of Jacob's.

THE HISTORY.

JACOB had not been long with his father before there befell him another sad disaster. Joseph was his beloved child, as being the son of his dear departed Rachel, and ^b a youth of a very promising and extraordinary genius. As a mark of his peculiar love, the fond father gave him clothes richer than he did the rest, and among others, ^c one coat more especially, which was made of a changeable or party-coloured stuff. This made his other brothers envy him not a little; and what gained him no good-will among them, was their looking upon him as a spy, because he had told his father some things wherein the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah, ^d with whom he was chiefly conversant, ^e had grossly misbehaved, which made them prolix in relating the adventures of Joseph than of any other of Jacob's children: both because his life is a bright example of piety, chastity, meekness, and prudence; and because it was by the means of Joseph that Jacob went down into Egypt; and as his going down gave occasion to the wonderful departure of the children of Israel from thence, so the history of the Jews would have been sadly imperfect, and indeed altogether unintelligible, without a longer account than ordinary of Joseph's life and transactions there.—Heidegger's Hist. Patriar. vol. 2. Essay 20.

^b Most versions, as well as ours, have made Jacob to love Joseph, because he was the son of his old age; whereas had this been the cause of his affection, he must have loved Zebulun, as much as Joseph, because he was of the same age, and Benjamin much more, because he was above fifteen years younger [only thirteen years, according to Dr Hales' table given before.] It seems, therefore, as if they had confounded the words Ben-Zebulun, the son of senators, or elders, as he is called here, with Ben-Ziknah, the son of old age; whereas the former has a signification quite different. According to the Hebrew idiom, it signifies 'the son, or disciple of senators,' that is, one endued with an extraordinary wisdom and prudence; accordingly the Samaritan, Arabic, and Persian versions have rendered it, 'because he was a wise and prudent son,' though even this comes short of the energy of the idiom, and might more properly be rendered, 'because he was as wise and prudent as a senator.' And this justifies the reason of Jacob's extraordinary love to Joseph, because it is natural for parents, especially for fathers, to admire those children who show any degree of wisdom above their years; whereas, to be fond of a child begotten in one's old age, and for no other reason, is no more than a piece of dotage, which Moses would hardly have thought worth recording.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 7, and Howell's History, b. 1.

^c The coat whereby Jacob distinguished his son Joseph from the rest of his brothers, is generally thought to signify a garment that was wrought with threads of divers colours, or made up of pieces of silk or stuff, which had much variety in them; but the word passim, which is here made use of, according to some learned annotators, does properly signify a long garment, down to the heels or ankles, with long sleeves down to the wrists, which had a border at the bottom, and a facing, as we call it, at the hands, of a colour different from the garment, which was accounted noble, as well as beautiful, in ancient times.—Patrick's Commentary.

^d He chose the sons of his father's concubines, rather than those of his wife Leah, to be his companions, on purpose, perhaps, to avoid the ill consequences of the latter's envy and emulation against him. For it is not unlikely that Leah's sons, considering the excessive love which their father had for him, might be ready to suspect, that he designed to bequeath the right of primogeniture to him, which each of them thinking they had a better title to, might thereupon be tempted to malign and maltreat him: whereas, among the sons descended from concubines, as having not the like ambition, he might find better quarter, and to their company the rather resort, out of a principle of homily and condescension, and to discountenance the haughty behaviour of the sons of Leah towards the sons of the concubines.—Patrick's Commentary, and Bibliotheca Biblica in locum.

^e The Hebrew and the Alexandrian Septuagint have it, 'they brought unto their father an evil report,' or 'grievous complaints against Joseph,' that is, they began their base and barbarous treatment of him with lies and calumnies. However, Aquila, Symmachus, and the Syriac, make Joseph the accuser; but of what crime it was, that he accused them to his father, and whether it consisted in deeds or words only, is a subject that has

^a Two reasons are generally assigned, why Moses is more treat him so very surly, that whenever he spake to them, they would scarce give him a civil answer. But that which completed their envy and resentment, or rather turned them into an irreconcilable hatred, was his innocently telling them some of his dreams, which seemed to portend his advancement in the world above them.

He told them that one night he dreamed, that as he and they were binding sheaves together in the field, his sheaf stood upright, while theirs fell prostrate before it, as if they had been doing obeisance; and that another time, he fancied himself mounted on high, and the sun, moon, and eleven stars, doing him the like homage. This raised the indignation of the rest, as thinking it a disparagement to have a younger brother their superior: which their father perceiving, in hopes of mitigating their resentment, ^a thought fit to discomtenance him in the interpretation of his dreams, by telling him, that they were vain and chimerical, and what could never come to pass; though, in himself, he could not but think, that there was something extraordinary and ominous in them. His brothers, however, instead of abating their hatred, grew every day more and more exasperated; so that they resolved at last to cut him off, and only waited for a convenient opportunity.

It happened, at this time, that Joseph's ten brethren (for Benjamin was as yet too young for any business) were keeping their flocks not far from Shechem, when their father not having heard from them for some time, and ^b being not a little anxious for their welfare, sent Joseph to find them out, and know how they did. As he drew near to Shechem, he was informed by a person whom he met with by accident, that they had removed from thence, and were gone about twenty miles farther north to a place called ^c Dothan. Thither Joseph went occasioned a great variety of conjectures among critics and commentators. Some will have it, that Joseph told of their unkindness and asperity to him; others, of their quarrelling and contentious way of living. Some, of their committing sodomy or bestiality; while those who confine it to words only, suppose it to be passionate and unedifying reflections they might make upon their father, for loving Joseph more than themselves. But whatever it was, it may be gathered, from their propense malice to him, that it was no small crime, because that for his telling it, and which he might do with no other intent, but only that his father's rebukes and admonitions might reform them, they hated him even unto death.—Bibliotheca Biblica and Howell's History.

^a St Chrysostom, in his homily upon the place, has given us this farther reason.—“Besides,” says he, “he might think it convenient to give this calm check to a spirit so much elated, as this young man must be, by those great and certain expectations which God was pleased, in so extraordinary a manner, to set before him. The foreknowledge of all that greatness and glory, which was one day infallibly to be his portion, might have put him upon a wrong bias of behaviour; might have tempted him to antedate his superiority; and fail, or waver, more or less in his duty to his elder brethren, if not to his father himself; and this seems to be the meaning of Jacob's mentioning his mother, who was dead, and did not so well comport with his dream. But at the same time, that in prudence he was willing to prevent any vain aspiring conceits, or tumours in his son, in faith he was persuaded, that the fact would prove such as it was foretold.”

^b The reason of Jacob's uneasiness, and of sending his son Joseph upon this errand, will be very obvious, if it be remembered, that the sons of Jacob had so incensed the neighbouring places by the massacre of the Shechemites, that Jacob was obliged immediately to quit the country, for fear of a general insurrection upon him, as we read, Gen. xxxiv. 30.

^c It was a town about twelve miles to the north of the city of Samaria, as Eusebius informs us.—Hells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 1.

after them; and no sooner did they see him approaching, but their old malice revived, and immediately they resolved to make away with this master-dreamer, as they called him, and to persuade their father that some wild beast had devoured him.

This resolution, barbarous as it was, had certainly been put in execution, ^d had not Reuben, who was the eldest, interposed, and, dissuading them from imbruing their hands in his blood, advised rather to throw him into the next pit, with a design himself to draw him out privately, and convey him safe home to his father. Reuben's advice was liked; and therefore, as soon as Joseph came up to them, they immediately seized him, pulled off his fine coat, and threw him into a pit, which, at that time, chanced to be dry; whereupon Reuben withdrew, to contrive some means for rescuing his brother, whilst the others, as if they had done some glorious act, sat down to eat, and drink, and regale themselves.

In the mean time ^e a caravan of Ishmaelites, who were travelling from Mount Gilead into Egypt with spices and other merchandise, appeared in sight, which put Judah in the thought of taking their brother out of the pit, and selling him to these merchants, which would every whit answer their purpose as well, or better. The proposal was no sooner made, than it was approved: Joseph was taken out of the pit, was sold to the merchants, and the merchants sold him again to Potiphar, one of the king's chief officers, and captain of his guards. Reuben being absent while this was done, came to the pit not long after, in order to rescue his brother; but finding him not there, he began to bewail and lament himself to such a degree, that his brethren, to pacify his

^d He either thought himself most concerned to save his brother, as being the first-born, and therefore like to be the first in the blame; or he might hope, by thus piously and compassionately preserving the favourite Joseph, to recover that place in his father's affection, which he had lost by his incest with Bilhah, his concubinary wife. The speech which Josephus introduces him as making upon this occasion, is very moving and very rhetorical. “It were an abominable wickedness,” says he, “to take away the life, even of a stranger, but to destroy a kinsman and a brother, and, in that brother, a father and a mother too, with grief for the loss of so good, and so hopeful a son. Bethink yourselves, if any thing can be more diabolical. Consider that there is an all-seeing God, who will be the avenger, as well as witness of this horrid murder. Bethink yourselves, I say, and repent of your barbarous purpose. You must never expect to commit this flagitious villany, and the divine vengeance not overtake you; for God's providence is every where, in the wilderness, as well as in the city, and the horrors of a guilty conscience will pursue you wherever you go. But, put the case, your brother had done you some wrong; yet is it not our duty to pass over the slips of our friends? When the simplicity of his youth may justly plead his excuse, his brothers certainly, of all men living, should be his friends and guardians, rather than his murderers; especially when the ground of all your quarrel is this, that God loves your brother, and your brother loves God.”—Josephus, b. 2, c. 3.

^e Though we name the Ishmaelites only, yet here seem to be two, if not three sorts of merchants mentioned in this passage, the Ishmaelites, the Midianites, and Medanites, (as they are called in the Hebrew, Gen. xxxvii. 36.) who were a distinct people from the Midianites, as descended from Medan, one of Abraham's sons by Keturah, and brother to Midian, Gen. xxy. 2. But as they and the Midianites lived near together in Arabia, not far from the Ishmaelites, they all joined together in this caravan, as one society of merchants; as it is the custom even to this day, in those eastern countries, for merchants and others to travel through the deserts in large companies, for fear of wild beasts or robbers.—Patrick's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations.

grief, were forced to tell him in what manner they had disposed of him; whereupon Reuben, finding it impossible now to recover him, joined with them in contriving how to manage the matter with their father, so as to take off from themselves all manner of suspicion.

To this purpose they killed a kid, and dipping Joseph's coat in the blood of it, ^a sent it to their father, as if they had found it in the field, and were fearful that it was their brother. Their father soon perceived whose coat it was; and supposing that some wild beast or other had slain his son, ^b he rent his clothes, and put on sackcloth, and began to mourn for his death. In vain did the rest of his children endeavour to comfort him; his grief would admit of no remedy; his resolution was to ^c lament his loss to the hour of his death; nor did he ever cease this disconsolate way of life, until he was told the surprising news of Joseph's advancement in Egypt.

From the time that Joseph had admission into Potiphar's family, he showed such diligence and fidelity, and proved so successful in every thing he undertook, that his master soon took notice of him, and in some time, having made him his steward, ^d put all his affairs under his management.

In this condition Joseph might have lived very happy,

^a In one and the same verse it is said, that 'they sent the coat of many colours, and they brought it to their father:' but this seeming solecism is easily resolved, only by saying, that they sent it by the hands of persons who brought it to their father; or that they sent it by a messenger, as being afraid to be present at the first gust of their father's passion, and afterwards brought or produced it, when one of them, as Judah is supposed to have been their spokesman, related the tale which follows: by which artifice they seemed to give themselves an air of compassion, since it was no uncommon thing afterwards (as in the case of Julius Cæsar, and Julia his daughter, the wife of Pompey), on mournful occasions, to produce such affecting relics and remains.—Bibliotheca Biblica.

^b Renting the clothes was an eastern way of expressing either grief for calamity or horror for sin. Reuben was the first we read of, who, to denote his exceeding sorrow, rent his clothes; and as Jacob we find does the like, we may well suppose that it was an usual manner of expressing all grief and uneasiness of mind in those days; and by putting on sackcloth, which Jacob is here the first precedent of doing, but was afterwards commonly used upon all mournful occasions, he seemed to signify, that since he had lost his beloved son, he looked upon himself as reduced to the meanest and lowest condition of life.—Bibliotheca Biblica, Howell's History, and Burdet's Oriental Customs.

^c Jacob expresses his sorrow in these words, 'I will go down unto the grave unto my son.' But if by the grave we are here to understand a place of sepulture, how could Jacob say that he would go down thither to his son, when he presumes here that he was not buried, but torn to pieces by wild beasts. To solve this difficulty, some imagine that the particle el should not, in this place, be rendered to, but, as it sometimes means, for, or in the stead of; and so the sense is, 'I will go down to the grave instead of my son,' who, unhappy child as he was, had no burial: but since the word scholah, in Greek ἄδης, in Latin infernum, signifies very frequently the state of the dead in general, the much clearer sense of the words will be, 'I will not cease mourning until I die, and be laid in my grave.'—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^d The words in the text are, 'he knew not aught he had, save the bread which he did eat;' which is one of the highest expressions of confidence that we can imagine: for it signifies, that he was utterly careless about any thing that concerned his estate, not minding what his expense or receipts were; but taking his ease, left all to Joseph's honesty. In short, he thought of nothing, but only to enjoy what he had, without care or trouble.—Patrick's Commentary.

had it not been for an adventure of a nature somewhat singular. He was now in the bloom of his youth, and of a beauty and comeliness so extraordinary, that his master's wife could not forbear conceiving an irregular passion for him. Upon several occasions, she had given him indications enough of her ardent desire to draw him into a wanton familiarity with her, but he was blind to her signs, and deaf to her soft speeches; so that she was at last resolved to break through the rules of her sex, and court him in plain terms. But how great was her surprise when, instead of a ready compliance, as she probably expected, she found herself not only denied, but severely reprimanded likewise for her disloyal passion! Being willing, however, to hope that another opportunity would prove more favourable, after several fruitless attempts, she at last laid hold on one, when all the family was abroad, and ^e accosted him in so violent and passionate a manner, that she would not hear any farther denial. In vain it was for him ^{to}

^e Joseph at this time was about seven and twenty years old. For he was seventeen when he was sold to Potiphar, Gen. xxxvii. 2, and he was committed to prison immediately upon his noncompliance with his mistress's temptation; where, as far as it appears, he had not been long before he interpreted the dreams of the two disgraced courtiers; and two years after that he was released and promoted, namely, when he was thirty years old: so that we may reasonably conclude that this temptation befell him about three years before his release, that is, in the twenty-seventh year of his age. At this time it is supposable that he was a comely person enough, and the saying is, that "a comely person is a silent recommendation;" but the stories relating to his excessive beauty, as they are recorded by the Talmudists, are ridiculous, and not much better than what Mahomet, in his history of the patriarch, tells us, namely, that his mistress having invited the ladies of the town to a splendid entertainment, ordered Joseph to be called for, but that, as soon as he appeared, they were amazed at his beauty, and so confounded, that they knew not what they did, but instead of eating their meat they ate their fingers, and said among themselves, "This is not a man, but an angel."—Bibliotheca Biblica in locum, and Alcoran, chap. of Joseph.

^f Josephus tells us, that Potiphar's wife took the opportunity of a certain festival, when all the people were gone a merry-making, to tempt Joseph; that, feigning herself sick, she decoyed him by that means into her apartment, and then addressed herself to him in words to this effect:—"It had been much better for you," says she, "had you complied with my first request; if for no other consideration, in regard at least to the dignity of the person who is become your petitioner, and to the excess of my passion. Besides, it would have saved me the shame of condescending to some words and expressions, which I am still out of countenance when I think of. You might perhaps make some doubt before, whether I was in earnest; but this is to satisfy you that I mean no ill by my persisting in the same mind. Take, therefore, your choice now, whether you will improve this opportunity of present satisfaction, in the embraces of a creature that loves you dearly, and from whom you may expect still greater things; or stand the shock of my hatred and revenge, if you will presume to value yourself upon the vain conceit of your chastity more than my favour," &c.—Antiquities, b. 2. c. 4.

^g Josephus, however, brings in his namesake expostulating the matter with his mistress, and reminding her of her duty to herself and her husband, to piety, and common fame. "What signifies," says he, "a momentary pleasure, with a certain repentance immediately to ensue; an heaviness of heart for a thing once done, and an utter impossibility of recalling and undoing it, together with perpetual fears of discovery and disgrace? What does all this signify, I say, in balance of the most substantial comforts, and the most necessary duties of human life? Whereas, in a conjugal state, the selfsame delights are all free, safe, innocent, and warrantable, both before God and man. Consider again, how it would lessen your authority, to expostulate the heinousness of the crime: her appetite was eager and impatient; and therefore she caught him by the cloak, and pressed him to lie with her; and he having no other way to escape, left his cloak in her hand, and fled.

Whether it was that she feared, by his manner and behaviour, that he might accuse her to her husband, or that she was enraged at the slight put upon her proffered love; but so it was, that she resolved his immediate ruin: and accordingly she began with ^a setting up a most horrid outcry, which immediately brought in all that were within hearing, and then showing them Joseph's cloak, which she pretended he put off in order to lie with her, she told them that he had made so furious an attempt upon her virtue, that nothing but her loud cries could have saved her.

By the time that her husband came home, ^b she had dressed up her story so well, and expressed the pretended indignity put upon her with such an air of resentment, that her credulous husband, little suspecting his wife's treachery, was so prepossessed with the circumstance of the cloak, that, without any farther inquiry, ^c he make your servant your equal, by a shameful participation in one common crime; and pray, is it not better to trust to a good conscience, that fears no light, than to commit wickedness in the dark, and then live all your days in a restless dread of being detected," &c.—Antiquities, b. 2. c. 4.

^a There is something not unlike this revengeful artifice in Potiphar's wife, in the representation which the poet makes of Phædra, when, in an affair of the like nature, she finds herself rejected by her son-in-law Hippolytus:—"I myself will retort the crime, and spontaneously accuse him of an illieit love; favour me, ye faithful band of servants, lend me thine aid, thou, &c. Lo, rapidly he fled, and in his consternation left behind his sword; still yet we hold the token of his crime."—Senece, Hippol.

^b Upon Potiphar's coming home, Josephus makes his wife break out into these words:—"You will never deserve to live, husband, unless you make an example of that perfidious wretch, your man. He has forgotten what he was when you took him into your house, how kindly and respectfully he has been treated here, to a degree beyond his very hope, as well as his desert. The charge of your whole family is committed to him, the command of the rest of your servants, and the trust of all you have. What will you think of this fellow now, who, in requital of all your bounty and good offices, could have the impudence to attempt the violation of your bed, and to take the opportunity of this festival day, when you were out of the way, to break in upon my privacy, and press the enjoyment of his beastly ends. You have made him, in effect, master of all things under your roof; and would nothing serve him, but he must have your wife likewise? Here is the ungrateful villain's cloak, which, in his fright, he left behind him, when I cried out, as he was going to force me."—Antiquities, b. 2. c. 4.

^c It is somewhat wonderful, that if Potiphar believed his wife's story, he did not immediately put him to death; but there is one thing which might check the violence of his passion, and that was, the great opinion he had for some time been confirmed in, of Joseph's virtue and integrity. Joseph, he saw, was young and beautiful, and therefore he might think it a thing not impossible for a lady of distinction to be in love with him, and upon a disappointment to be exasperated: as therefore he would not inflict any capital or corporal punishment on him, so he thought it prudent to hurry him away to prison unheard, lest, being allowed to speak in his own vindication, he might clear himself, and thereby bring discredit upon his family. It must not be denied, however, what St Chrysostom has observed, that here again was a special, and as it were a miraculous intervention of the divine power, which preserved his life as it did before, when he was cast into the pit. The superior influence which softened the heart of Reuben, restrained the hand of Potiphar, in order to make our patriarch a more glorious example, and to complete these events hurried poor Joseph away, and clapped him up in the king's prison; where we shall leave him for a while, to take a view of what passed in his father's family.

^d Before the time that Joseph was sold into Egypt, Judah, his father's son by Leah, had married ^e a Canaanitish woman name Shuah, by whom he had three sons, Er, Onan, and Shelah. Er being cut off for his wickedness before he had any children by his wife Thamar, Judah ordered his second son Onan, according to the custom of the country, to marry her, and ^f to raise a posterity to his brother. Onan seemingly obeyed his father, but not brooking the thought that any of his children should inherit his brother's name who was dead, he took such a wicked and unnatural way to prevent having any, that God was provoked to punish him with sudden death likewise. His third son Shelah was not yet fit for marriage; and therefore Judah desired his daughter-in-law to retire to her father's house, and there live a widow, until he became adult, and then he would make him her husband. Thamar did so, and waited till Shelah was come to man's estate; but finding no performance of Judah's promise, (as indeed he never heartily intended any,) she was resolved to make herself amends some other way, which she did by the following stratagem.

Judah had lately buried his wife; and as soon as the usual days of mourning were over, he took a particular friend with him, and went to Timnah, to divert himself a in the course of his life, which God had predetermined and foretold.—Chrys. Hom. in locum.

^d Though the latter part of Judah's story, relating to the incest with his daughter Thamar, was acted after Joseph was sold, and while he was in Egypt; yet the former part of it relating to his marriage, and the birth of his three sons, must needs fall out before Joseph was sold. For since there were but two and twenty, or at the most, but three and twenty years between Joseph's being sold into Egypt, and Jacob's going down thither, it could no ways be, that in so short a space of time, Judah could marry a wife, have three sons at three several times by her, marry two of her sons successively to one woman; defer the marriage of the third son to the same woman, beyond the due time; afterwards himself have sons by the same woman his daughter-in-law; and one of these sons, Pharez, beget two sons, Hezron and Hamul, Gen. xlvj. 12. It can no ways be, I say, that all these transactions should be comprised in so short a time. And therefore we must suppose, that the business of his being married, and having children, was prior to Joseph's being sold; but that Moses, not willing to intermingle the story of the two brothers too much, brings all he had to say concerning Judah into the compass of one chapter, and so concludes his adventures, before he proceeds to those of Joseph.—Howell's History, b. 1. Universal History, b. 1. c. 7; and Bibliotheca Biblica in locum.

^e It was not so bad for a man circumcised to marry the daughter of one uncircumcised, as it was for an Israelite to give a daughter in marriage to an uncircumcised husband, Gen. xxxiv. 11; for an uncircumcised man was accounted unclean, though he had renounced idolatry; but a woman, born of uncircumcised parents, if she embraced the true religion, was not so accounted. And such an one we may suppose Judah's wife to have been; otherwise he had offended his father, as much as Esau did Isaac, by marrying the daughter of Heth.—Patrick's Commentary.

^f This is the first mention we have of this custom, which nevertheless seems to have been a very common one, and well understood even by young Onan; for he knew that the first-born child was not to be accounted his, but his deceased brother's, was to be called by his name, and inherit his estate. For this, say the Hebrew doctors, was an ancient custom in force before the law of Moses, that when a man died without issue, his brother should marry his wife, and that the first son, upon such marriage, was to be reputed her deceased husband's heir.—Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentary.

little at the shearing feast. Tamar had intelligence of this; and therefore, putting off her widow's weed, and dressing herself like a courtesan, she threw a veil over her face, and planted herself between two ways, where she knew her father-in-law, in his way to Timnah was obliged to pass.

Judah no sooner saw her, but taking her to be what she appeared, he began to make his addresses to her. What she insisted on was only a reward for her compliance, which he readily agreed to, and promised to send her a kid; but she having a farther design upon him, demanded a pledge for the performance of his promise, which was his signet, his bracelet, and his staff; and so, being agreed, they went together, had their enjoyment, and she proved with child.

Judah, according to his promise, sent by his friend Hirah (for that was his name) a kid to redeem his pledge; but when Hirah came to the place, the woman was gone, nor could he find, upon his best inquiry, that any such person as he described had ever been there: so that Judah, when he told him his ill success, thought it the wisest way to let her go off with the pledges, rather than run the hazard of his reputation, by making any farther search.

About three months after this, word was brought him, that his daughter-in-law had played the harlot, and was certainly with child. Judah, though glad perhaps at the news, because her death would free him from the promise of giving his son Shelah to her, pretended however to be highly enraged at her incontinency, and ordering her to be brought forth, ^a condemned her to be burnt according to the laws of the country. Tamar, instead of being surprised at this dreadful sentence pronounced against her, only sent the pledges to Judah, with this message, That the owner of these things was the person by whom she was with child: whereupon, struck with confusion, and reflecting on the injury he had done her, in withholding his son, he acknowledged her ^b less culpable in

^a Among eastern nations, as well as elsewhere, women, who were guilty of adultery, were more severely punished than the men: whether it was that the injury done the husband was reputed to be more heinous, or that the men, having the power of making laws, took care to enact them in favour of themselves. Thus God is said, 'for the hardness of their hearts;' to have indulged the Jews in the matter of divorcing their wives; but the wives had not the like privilege over their husbands. In many places a man might have as many wives as he could maintain, but the women were to be content with one husband. And in like manner, here Judah, we find, condemns Tamar, though a widow, for her crime, to be burnt; whilst himself, in the same state of widowhood, thought fornication a very pardonable crime. It is questioned, however, by what right and authority he could pass this sentence upon her: and to answer this, it is supposed, that every master was judge and chief magistrate in his own family; and that therefore Tamar, though she was a Canaanite, yet being married into Judah's family, and having brought disgrace upon it, was properly under his cognizance. His cognizance, however, according to the opinion of some, did not extend so far as to have her burnt at the stake, as we call it, but only branded in the forehead for a whore; though others deny that his authority extended even so far: for being in a strange place, it can hardly be thought, that the power of life and death, or indeed of any other penalty, was lodged in him: and therefore they think that the words mean no more than this,—That she should be brought before a court of judicature, and sentenced according to the laws of the country.—Selden de Jure Nat. b. 7. c. 5, Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentary, Howell's and Universal History.

^b The words in the text are, 'She hath been more righteous the whole affair than himself, and from that moment took her home to his house; but had never any more communion with her.

When the time of her delivery was come, she was brought to bed of twins, but the manner of their birth was somewhat surprising; for though one of them put forth his hand, about which the midwife tied a scarlet thread, to distinguish him for the first-born; yet as he withdrew it, his brother got before him, and so came first into the world; which occasioned his name to be Pharez, that is, one breaking forth, as the other with the thread on his hand was called Zarah.

To return to Joseph. He had not been long in prison, before his virtuous and obliging deportment gained him the favour of the keeper, insomuch that he was intrusted with the management of the affairs belonging to the prison, and with the custody of the prisoners themselves.

At this time there were two persons of note, the king's cupbearer, and his chief baker, for some offence or other, committed to the same prison where Joseph was, and by the head-keeper, intrusted to his care and attendance. To this purpose, Joseph coming to their apartment one morning, and finding them both pensive and melancholy upon the account of a dream which each of them had had the night before, and under more concern still, because in that place, they could have no person to interpret for them; to allay their superstitious humour, in trusting to diviners and soothsayers, he told them, in the first place, that the interpretation of dreams did not depend upon rules of art, but if there were any certainty in it, it must proceed from a divine inspiration, and then desired to know what it was that they dreamed.

The cupbearer began, and told him that in his sleep he fancied he saw a vine, with three branches, which all on a sudden budded, then blossomed, and so bore ripe grapes; and that he had in his hand the king's cup, into which having squeezed the juice of the grapes, he gave it to the king, and the king drank it from his hand as usual. To this Joseph replied, that as the three branches denoted three days, it would not exceed the compass of that time, before the king, ^c having made an inquiry into than I: not more virtuous or chaste, for she knowingly committed adultery and incest when he designedly did neither; but more just, in that he, by withholding Shelah from her, had provoked her to lay this trap for him. So that, though Tamar was wicked in the sight of God, yet she may be said to be juster before Judah, or to have done no more in drawing him into this scrape, than what he justly deserved.—Poole's Annotations.

^c The expression which Joseph here makes use of concerning the king's cupbearer and baker, 'Pharaoh shall lift up thy head,' seems somewhat too literally translated, since the words in the original mean no more, than that Pharaoh would have them brought forth and examined. The ancients, we are to know, in keeping their reckonings or accounts of time, or their list of domestic officers or servants, made use of tables with holes bored in them, in which they put a sort of pegs or nails with broad heads, exhibiting the particulars, either number or name, or whatever it was. These nails or pegs the Jews call heads, and the sockets of the heads they call bases. The meaning therefore of 'Pharaoh's lifting up his head' is, that Pharaoh would take out the peg which had the cupbearer's name on the top of it to read it; that is, would sit in judgment, and make examination into his accounts. For it seems very probable, that both he and the baker, had been either suspected or accused of having cheated the king, and that, when their accounts were examined and cast up, the one was acquitted, while the other was found guilty. And though Joseph uses the same expression in both cases, yet we may observe, the conduct of his servants, would restore him to his favour and his post again. Only he desired, that if his interpretation proved true, he would, in his prosperity, ^a be pleased to remember him, and to recommend his case to the king; since the truth was that he had been fraudulently taken ^b from his own country and cast into prison without any fault or offence of his.

A. M. 2276. A. C. 1728; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 3539. A. C. 1872. GEN. CU. xxxvii. TO THE END.

^cHearing so happy an interpretation of this dream, the baker was the readier to propose his, which was to this effect:—That while, as he thought, he had on his head three wicker baskets, in the uppermost of which were several kinds of baked meats for the king's table, the birds came and ate them out of the basket. To which Joseph immediately replied, that the three baskets, even as the three branches had done, signified three days; but that in the space of that time, the king having made scrutiny into his behaviour, and found him guilty, would order him to be hanged upon a gibbet, for the fowls of the air to devour his flesh. And as Joseph foretold, so it came to pass: for three days after this, the cupbearer was restored and the baker hanged. The cupbearer, however, when himself had got into prosperity again, thought little of Joseph, till, in about two years after this, an accident happened which forced him in a manner to call him to remembrance.

that speaking to the baker, he adds, that 'Pharaoh shall lift up thy head from off thee,' that is, shall order thy name to be struck out of the list of his servants by taking the peg out of the socket.—Bibliotheca Biblica in locum.

^a There is nothing of a distrust of God's goodness, justice, or power, in making use of human means. The release of the king's cupbearer appeared to Joseph to be a good opportunity, pointed out by providence, for him to lay hold on, and he would have been wanting to his own preservation, had he not employed it. Though therefore it may be thought, that his asking this court-officer to represent his case to the king, might be in reward or compensation for his prediction; yet even herein he may be justified by apostolical authority, which in cases of this nature instructs, (1 Cor. ix. 4. and Gal. vi. 6.) that temporal advantages may very lawfully be both asked and received. In the cupbearer's not remembering him, however, we may observe something that seems providentially to have turned to his advantage, since had he been discharged before Pharaoh's dream, he might many ways have missed of that prodigious favour and advancement, which by this means he attained.—Bibliotheca Biblica in locum.

^b The words in the text are, 'from the land of the Hebrews,' which some men suppose were added by Joshua, or some other writer, after the death of Moses; because in Moses' days, and much less in Joseph's, Canaan was not known by that name. It is not the whole land of Canaan, however, that Joseph here means, but only that part of it which lay about Hebron, where Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, had for a long while lived; (Gen. xxii. 1, 2. xxxv. 27. xxxvii. 14.) It is said, indeed, that they were strangers and sojourners in the country; but then they were strangers of great note and high renown, who were treated as princes, lived by their own laws, and made leagues not only with private men, but with cities and with kings; (Gen. xxiii. 6. xxi. 22. xxvi. 28. xxxv. 6.) the fame of whose deeds could not but be spread abroad, both by the victory which Abraham got in a battle over several kings, and by the sacking of Shechem, which their neighbours durst not revenge; all which might very well make that part of the country wherein they, for three generations, had resided, not improperly be called 'the land of the Hebrews.'—Patrick's Commentary.

^c As flush as the chief baker was with hopes, there is this obvious difference between his and the cupbearer's presage, namely, that he was not an agent, but a sufferer in his dream; for he did not give a cake or a confection to the king as the other did the cup, but the fowls of the air descended upon his basket, and fled off with the dainties that were in it.—Patrick's Comment.

The king his master had, in one night, two very portentous dreams, which gave him the more uneasiness, because none of the ^d Egyptian Magi could give him the least light into their meaning. Seeing the king therefore in this perplexity, the cupbearer could not forbear telling him, that while he and the chief baker were under his majesty's displeasure in prison, each of them, in the same night, had a dream, which a young man, an Hebrew, then in prison with them, interpreted exactly, and as the event happened; and that, in his opinion, he had a talent that way much superior to any that had hitherto been consulted.

Pleased with this discovery, and eager to have his dream explained, the king gave orders immediately for Joseph to be sent for; who, after he had shaved and dressed himself, was introduced into his presence, where he had not been long, before the king related his dream to him, namely, "That as he was walking on the banks of the river Nile," as he thought, "he saw seven fat kine, which fed in the meadows. And soon after that, seven others, exceeding lean, and frightful to behold, which came and ate up the fat ones, and yet looked not a bit the better; and that, after this he dreamed again, and fancied that he saw seven full ears of corn, proceeding all from the same stalk, which were in like manner devoured by seven others, that were blasted and withered."

As soon as the king had ended, Joseph, giving him first to understand that it ^e was by the assistance of God alone that he was enabled to be an interpreter of dreams, told him, that the seven kine, and seven ears of corn, signified the same thing, and the repetition of the dream

^d The Chaldeans of old were the most famous people in the world for divination of all kinds; and therefore it is very probable that the word Magi, which we render magicians, is not of Hebrew, but Chaldean origin. The roots, however, from whence it springs (if it be a compound word, as probably it is) are not so visible; and therefore commentators are perplexed to know by what method men of this profession proceeded in their inquiry into secret things; whether they pretended to expound dreams, and desery future events, by natural observations, by the art of astrology, which came much in request in future ages, by such rules as are now found in the books of oneirocritics; or by certain characters, images, pictures, and figures, which were engraved with magical rites and ceremonies. It is not to be doubted indeed but that the magicians, whom Pharaoh consulted for the interpretation of his dreams, made use of some at least, if not all these arts; and the Jewish doctors would make us believe, that after several attempts of divers kinds, they came at last to this exposition, that Pharaoh's daughters (for they supposed him to have seven) should die, and that he should have seven others born to him in their stead; but this being not at all satisfactory to their master, put the cupbearer in mind of Joseph's great abilities that way.—Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentary.

^e The words wherein Joseph prefers his interpretation of Pharaoh's dreams, are much of the same kind with what we find Daniel addressing Nebuchadnezzar upon the like occasion.—'The secret, which the king hath demanded, cannot the wise men, the astrologers, the magicians, the soothsayers, show unto the king; but there is a God in heaven, who revealeth secrets, and maketh known unto the king what shall be in the latter days.'—(Dan. ii. 27, 28.) Both these holy men insinuate, that the interests of princes are more especially the care of divine providence, and that therefore, for their admonition, he frequently sends dreams and visions upon them. And this declaration, previous to the exposition, was perfectly proper, and of mighty force to bespeak the king's attention and regard, at the same time that Joseph was asserting the being and interposition of Almighty God in the guidance of human affairs.—Le Clerc's Commentary, and Bibliotheca Biblica in locum.

A. M. 2276. A. C. 1728; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 3539. A. C. 1872. GEN. CH. xxxvii. TO THE END.

only denoted the certainty of the event; that therefore, as the lean kine seemed to eat up the fat, and the withered ears to consume the full and flourishing, so, after seven years of great plenty, other seven years of extreme famine should succeed, which would lay waste all the country, and leave no signs of the former plenty: and therefore, since it had pleased God thus to inform the king what seasons he intended to bring upon the earth, he hoped he would make a right use of the information, by appointing a wise and prudent man over his whole kingdom, who should take care to build granaries, and appoint officers under him in every province, who should collect and lay up ^a a fifth part of each plentiful year's product against the succeeding years of famine.

^b This interpretation, and the good advice given upon it, made the king conceive so great an opinion of Joseph's wisdom, that he thought no one could be so fit to manage the office of collecting the corn in the years of plenty as he who had suggested a scheme so very beneficial. He, therefore, in a short time, made him his deputy over the land of Egypt, and to that purpose invested him with the usual ensigns of that station; gave him his own signet from off his finger; caused him to be clothed in a robe of fine linen, and put a golden chain about his neck; ordered him to ride in a chariot next to his own; and wherever he went, heralds to go before, and, in token that the viceroy was coming, to proclaim to the people, ^c

^a Since there were to be as many years of scarceness as of plenty, some have made it a question why Joseph advised no more than a fifth part of the corn, in plentiful years, to be laid up: but to this it may be replied, that the greater and richer sort were used, in time of plenty, to fill their storehouses with provision against a scarcer year, which sometimes happened; that in the times of famine, men were wont to live more frugally and parsimoniously, as the Egyptians at this time, according to Josephus, were obliged to do by Pharaoh's special command; that, even in the years of famine, tillage went on, and the harvest might be something, (though not mentioned by reason that the product was comparatively inconsiderable,) especially in the lands lying near the Nile: and that, as the tenth part was an ordinary tribute due to the kings of Egypt, in the years of extraordinary plenty, (when the fifth was no more than the tenth in other years,) Pharaoh might think it proper to double this charge, or, what is rather to be supposed from a good king and a good counsellor, to buy as much more as was his tribute, which he might do at an easy rate, when such a vast plenty made corn extremely cheap.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b Here we may observe again, that Joseph directs Pharaoh to look up to God as the author of all these events, and that not in an ordinary, but extraordinary manner, since such fertility and such famine did not proceed from mere natural causes, but from an overruling providence, which made the river Nile overflow its banks so largely for seven years together, and so occasion a great plenty; and then, for the next seven years, overflow very little, if at all, and so produce a very sore and long famine. Nor can it be objected to Joseph that he was guilty of presumption or boldness in giving his advice to Pharaoh concerning the provision that was to be made against the ensuing scarceness, since he was conscious to himself that he was best able to give such advice, and would have been guilty of the sin of omission, had he neglected to do it, in so great and so general a concern.—Patrick's Commentary, and Bibliotheca Biblica in locum.

^c Annotators are much at a loss to determine of what original the word abrech is, some pretending that it is altogether Hebrew, while others make it a compound of Hebrew and Syriac, and others contend, at the same time, that it is purely Egyptian. Those who pretend that it is Hebrew, besides the signification of bowing the knee, which it very well bears, by dividing it into two words, make it import a tender father, and suppose that Joseph might very properly be called a father in point of his consummate wisdom, and young or tender in regard to his

'bow the knee.' Nor was this all: for to attach him still closer to his service, and make him forget the very thoughts of ever returning to his own country, ^d he changed his name to that of Zaphnah-paaneah, which signifies a prime minister, and matched him into a noble family, to Asenah, the daughter of ^e Potipherah, priest or prince of On; by whom he had two sons, the former of whom he called Manasseh, intimating that God made him forget all his toils; and the other Ephraim, because he had made him fruitful in the land of his affliction.

In the mean time, Joseph being now about thirty years old when he was raised to this height of power, took a progress through the whole kingdom; built granaries, appointed proper officers in every place, and, in short, ordered all things with such prudence and years. Those who make it a mixture of Hebrew and Syriac, divide it, in like manner, into two words, and suppose that as ab, in the Hebrew, is father, so rech or rach, in the Syrian tongue, is king, in the same sense that Joseph says of himself, and perhaps with allusion to this very name, 'God has made me a father unto Pharaoh,' (Gen. xlv. 8.) that is, in giving him wholesome counsel, even as a father does his children; but those who contend for its being purely Egyptian, do freely confess, that at this distance of time, and under such obsolescence of that language, it is next to impossible to find out the genuine signification of an honorary term, as this very probably was; and therefore they observe, that as the Jewish historian makes no mention of this circumstance in Joseph's story, he might be induced to that omission by reason of his not understanding this word of exotic growth. In this uncertainty of opinions, therefore, we have thought it the best way to follow that translation which some of the best Hebrew interpreters, the Septuagint and Vulgate versions have approved.—Heidegger's Hist. Patriar., vol. 2. Essay 20.

^d It was an ancient custom among eastern princes, upon their promotion of any favourite, to give him a new name. Nebuchadnezzar, we read, (Dan. i. 7.) imposed new names upon Daniel and his companions in Babylon; and it was the custom of the Mogul never to advance a man, but he gave him a new name, and that significative of something belonging to him; but here the question is, what the meaning of the name which Pharaoh gave Joseph is? In the Hebrew text it is Zaphnah-paaneah, but in the Egyptian and Greek Pentateuch it is Pson-thon-phanech. The oriental versions, however, are pretty unanimous in rendering it—a revealer of secrets, but there are some reasons why this should not be its true interpretation. For the time when Pharaoh gave the patriarch this name, was when he advanced him from the condition of an imprisoned slave to that of a 'ruler throughout all the land of Egypt;' and, therefore, it is reasonable to suppose that he gave it in commemoration of such promotion, rather than of his expounding dreams; because to have called him an interpreter of dreams only, had been degrading him to the level of magicians. Now if Pharaoh gave him this name in memory of his promotion, it is very likely that this name was strictly and properly Egyptian, otherwise the common people could not have understood it, though Moses, in his recording it, might endeavour to accommodate it to the Hebrew idiom; and if it was Egyptian, the word in that language signifies what we call a prime minister; or strictly the first, or prince of the lords.—Bibliotheca Biblica, Occasional Annotations, 41.

^e The reader must remember not to confound this name with Potiphar, who bought Joseph of the Ishmaelites, because their names in Hebrew are not differently written. The one, however, is called the captain of the guards, the other the prince or priest of On; so that the former must have had his residence in the capital, to be always about the king; but the latter lived at On or Heliopolis, about twenty miles distant from Memphis, the metropolis of the kingdom: nor can we suppose that Joseph would ever have married his master's daughter, lest she should have proved not unlike her mother, for whose incontinence he had so severely smarted.—Universal History, b. I. c. 7 application, that before the seven years of plenty were expired, he had amassed together an immense quantity of corn, enough to supply both Egypt and the neighbouring countries; so that when the years of famine came on, and the people applied themselves to Pharaoh, he remitted them to Joseph, who, when he saw it fit, opened his stores, and sold provision to all that came.

In the second year of the famine, Jacob, who was not exempt from the common calamity, hearing that there was corn to be bought in Egypt, sent ten of his sons thither to buy some, who, upon their arrival, were directed to apply to Joseph for an order, and as soon as they saw him, prostrated themselves before him, and begged that they might be supplied with corn.

Joseph, at first sight, knew his brethren, but being minded to terrify them a little, would not, as yet, discover himself to them; and therefore, choosing to speak by an interpreter, with a severe look and angry tone, he asked them whence they came, and upon their answering from the land of Canaan, he charged them with being a spies who were come to discover the weakness of the country. To which they replying, that they came with no other intent, than purely to buy corn for their numerous family, being all the b sons of one man, who once indeed had twelve, but that the youngest was left at home, and the next to him dead: he immediately caught at their words, and put their honesty upon this probation:—That since, as they said, they had a younger brother, a These words, 'Ye are spies,' are not to be looked upon as a lie, because they are not spoken by way of affirmation, but of probation only, in the manner that judges speak, when they examine suspected persons, or inquire into a crime, of which men are accused; and have therefore the force of an interrogation, 'Are ye not spies?' or I must take you to be such, until you prove the contrary. This, though it was but a pretensive charge of Joseph, had yet the better colour, because Egypt was defenceless and liable to incursions only on that side from whence his brethren came; for what with the interposition of large deserts, and shallow seas, it was pretty well secured on all other quarters. (Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentaries in locum.)—To conceive the full force and heinousness of this charge, says Dr Hales, it is necessary to state briefly the situation of Egypt at the time. In the reign of Timaeus, or Thamus, about B. C. 2159, Egypt had been invaded and subdued by a tribe of Cushite shepherds, from Arabia, who cruelly enslaved the whole country, under a dynasty of six kings, until, at length, the native princes, weary of their tyranny, rebelled, and after a long war of thirty years, shook off the yoke, and expelled the shepherds to Palestine, where they became the Philistines, (from Palesthan, "the shepherd land," in the Sanscrit, or primitive Syriac,) about B. C. 1899, or twenty-seven years before Joseph's administration. But the memory of their tyranny was still fresh in the minds of the Egyptians, so that 'any shepherd was an abomination to the Egyptians,' Gen. xlv. 31; and 'they could not endure to eat bread with the Hebrews,' because they were shepherds, and came from the neighbourhood of Palestine. And they were greatly apprehensive, that the Philistines, who were a warlike people, might attempt to regain a footing in Egypt, weakened as it had been by so long a war; and when the land of Goshen, which had been their principal settlement, the best pasture land in Egypt, was now in a great measure waste. (Hales' Analysis, vol. 2. p. 141, second edition.) This circumstance most probably, at a subsequent period, gave rise to the dread of the Hebrews becoming more powerful than them, and again enslaving them.—Ed.

b By this they suggested the impossibility of their being spies, since no man, in his wits, would send so many and all his own sons, upon so dangerous and capital an enterprise; nor was it probable that one man could have a design upon Egypt, but all the great men in Canaan must have joined in it, and then they would have sent men of different families, and not all of one only.—Patrick's Commentary.

some one of them should be dispatched to bring him, whilst the rest were kept in custody; otherwise he should look upon them (and there he spake with a seeming earnestness) as no other than spies and enemies; and so ordered them all to prison, until they should come to a resolution.

After three days' confinement, however, he sent for them again, and then, with a milder air, told them that as himself feared God, and was willing to act justly by them, he was loath that their family should want provision, or that they themselves should suffer, if innocent; he therefore propounded this expedient to them:—"That one of them should be confined, as an hostage for the rest, while they returned with corn for the family; and that when they came again, and brought their youngest brother with them, the confined should be released, and all of them reputed honest men."

For persons in their circumstances there was no expostulating with one who had them at his mercy; and therefore they consented to do whatever he required. But in the interpreter's absence, they supposing that no one else understood their language, began to bewail their unrelenting cruelty to poor Joseph, and to condemn themselves severely for it; while Reuben, who was not so culpable in the matter, put them in mind, that all this mischief might have been prevented, had they listened to his counsel, and not acted so inhumanly to their innocent brother, for whose sake, it was no more than what they might expect, that vengeance at one time or other would certainly overtake them.

Their discourse, in short, was so very dolorous and affecting, that Joseph could no longer contain himself, and was therefore forced to withdraw a little to give his tears vent, and then coming in again, commanded c Simeon to be bound and sent to prison: but setting the rest at liberty, he ordered the officer who distributed the corn to supply them with what they wanted, and at the same time, as a fresh matter for their surprise, d to put each man's money into the mouth of his sack. His orders were accordingly obeyed; and therefore, when they came to bait, and to give their beasts provender, e they were

c It may be supposed, perhaps, that because Reuben was the eldest, he, upon this occasion, had been the properest hostage; but Reuben, we may observe, had showed himself averse to those lengths of wickedness and inhumanity, in which most of the other brothers were agreed, against Joseph. Reuben, in short, resolved to save him; and as Judah was inclined to favour him, had Simeon joined with them, their authority might have prevailed for his deliverance; but Simeon was the person who was most exasperated against him. He was the eldest of those who had proposed to murder him, and was therefore a fit proxy for the rest; the man, as the Hebrews say, who put Joseph in the pit, and was now very justly to be served in his kind: though they who tell us this, have a tradition, that as soon as his brothers were gone, Joseph had him unbound, and ordered him what provisions and conveniences he pleased, during his confinement.—Patrick's Commentary, and Bibliotheca Biblica in locum.

d This Joseph might do, without defrauding Pharaoh; for he might either supply them out of that stock of provisions which belonged properly to himself; or if the provisions were the king's, he might pay for them out of his own purse. Nor is there any occasion to conceive, that a person so entirely in favour and confidence with his prince as Joseph was, had his hands tied up from disposing, at his own discretion and pleasure, of so small a boon as this to his friends, for their relief and comfort.—Musenius.

e If it should be made a question, why Joseph's brethren made not a little frightened to find their money returned; nor failed they to make all the dismal reflections hereupon that their fears could suggest, concluding that the haughty viceroy had done this, that he might have a pretence to make them his slaves at their next coming down.

As soon as they were got home, they acquainted their father with all these adventures; they told him the treatment they had received from the king's prime minister, and how he suspected them of being spies, of which they had no way to clear themselves, but by leaving Simeon bound in prison, as a pledge, till they should bring Benjamin, to show that what they told him of their family was true. These were sad tidings, indeed, and what made their poor afflicted father break out into this melancholy complaint:—"That one way or other, him they had deprived of his children; that Joseph was dead, Simeon was left in Egypt, and now they were going to take Benjamin from him likewise, which were things too heavy for him to bear."

In vain it was for Reuben, in order to prevail with his father to comply, to offer, as he did, that if he did not return him safe, he might take his two sons, and kill them if he pleased: the death of a grandson was no compensation for the loss of a child; and therefore, instead of assuaging, this did but augment his grief, and make him absolutely resolve not to trust Benjamin with them: for "his brother is dead," says he, "and he is left alone; if any mischief should befall him by the way, then will ye bring my grey hairs with sorrow to the grave."

In such debates as these they spent the time, till the famine every day increasing, and their stock of provision being well nigh gone, necessity put them in the thoughts of going down again into Egypt. This their father likewise reminded them of, but without taking any notice of their obligation to the viceroy to bring their younger brother with them; which, when Judah suggested to him, and set before him withal the utter impossibility of their going into Egypt, without his complying with that condition, he began to complain again, that he thought himself hardly used in their telling the viceroy any thing of the state of his family, or that they had another brother; which Judah endeavoured to excuse, by assuring his father, that what was said upon that head, proceeded from the simplicity of their hearts, and in answer to the interrogatories which the viceroy put to them, without ever dreaming that he intended to make such a cruel handle of it; and then perceiving his father to waver a little in his resolution, ^a he reiterates the necessity of use of their own stocks, and especially in a time of so great scarcity, in a public inn? the answer is obvious,—That the inns, or resting-places in those parts of the world, neither were, nor are as yet, such as we meet with in England, and some other parts of Europe. They afforded no accommodation of any kind, but barely house-room. The passengers who travelled in those countries, carried most, if not all of their provisions with them; nor did they make any other use of these public houses, but only to repose themselves in at the end of their stages. (Musculus).—The khan or caravansara is seldom more than four bare walls, open at top, and perfectly exposed; if there are cells, nothing is found but bare walls, dust, and sometimes scorpions, the only refreshment being the water generally found in the vicinity; nor are even these empty mansions always to be met with.

^a In the text, the words wherein Judah delivers himself to his father, are these,—'If thou wilt send our brother with us, we will go down and buy thee food; but if thou wilt not send him, their going again, and presses him to consent, with this solemn promise, that at the hazard of his own life, he would take care and return him safe: 'Of my hand shalt thou require him,' says he; 'if I bring him not unto thee, and set him before thee, then let me bear the blame for ever.'

But it was not so much his son's importunity, as the necessity of affairs, which induced Jacob to comply; and therefore, perceiving that there was now no remedy, he delivered up Benjamin; but before they departed, instructed them what to do, namely, to take a double quantity of money with them, for fear that there was some mistake made in the other that was returned, ^b and some such presents as the country afforded, and what they imagined would be most acceptable to the viceroy: and so having entreated Heaven for their success, he sent them away, with an aching heart, but a resolved acquiescence in God's good providence, let the event be what it would.

As soon as they arrived at Egypt, they went directly to the king's granaries, and presented themselves before Joseph, who seeing their brother Benjamin with them, gave orders to his steward to conduct them to his house, where he designed they should dine that day. Here again they began to fear, lest this might be a contrivance against them upon account of the money which was returned in their sacks; and therefore, before they entered the house, they acquainted the steward with the whole affair, and to demonstrate their honesty, told him, we will not go down,' Gen. xliii. 4, 5; which, at first view, seem to have an air of undutifulness in them, but upon a nearer inspection, will admit of this apology, namely, that this was not the first proposal made to Jacob by his sons, to have Benjamin go with them into Egypt. Reuben had once before offered his two sons for pledges, and received a repulse. Upon Jacob's renewing his orders therefore for them to go, Judah only had courage to engage in this fresh remonstrance. He reminds his father, first of the solemnity and earnestness with which Joseph had pretended, that without Benjamin, 'they should not see his face;' then he offers to go very willingly in obedience to his father's command, but desires to insist upon the condition of Benjamin's going with them, as finally, indispensably, and absolutely necessary. For the words, compared with those of Gen. xlv. 26, do plainly denote as much, 'We will not go down,' that is, it is impossible, impracticable, unallowable for us to go. For the future tense, according to the Hebrew idiom, will bear this signification, and consequently will acquit Judah from all suspicion of rebellion or undutifulness towards his father.—Bibliotheca Biblica, on Gen. Annotation 45.

^b The present which Jacob ordered his sons to carry down to Joseph is thus particularized in our translation; 'a little balm, a little honey, spices, and myrrh, nuts and almonds,' Gen. xliii. 11. But there is reason to suspect, that some of these are not the real things which the original words intend. Balm, indeed, which we may suppose was that of Gilead, was of great price all the world over, and a small quantity of it was a present worth acceptance; but unless the honey in Canaan was better than ordinary, there doubtless was no want of it in Egypt: and therefore, it is much more likely that this part of the present consisted of dates, since the Hebrew expresses both by the same name; and in Judea, especially about Jericho, as both Josephus and Pliny tell us, there was a great plenty of them. The word nechoth, which is rendered spices, should rather signify storax, which is an aromatic gum put into all precious spicy ointments. And the word loth, which is translated myrrh, would come nearer the original if it were called laudatum. Botivim, which we read nuts, are what we call pistachios, which were highly esteemed by the ancients as a delicious food; and with these almonds might not improperly be joined together.—Universal History, and Patrick's Commentary.

that besides the money which they found returned, they had brought more along with them, to buy a fresh quantity of provisions.

The steward, on the other hand, being let into the secret, and perceiving the concern they were in, bade them dismiss all uneasy apprehensions; told them, that what they found in their sacks they ought to look upon as a treasure sent them from heaven; owned that he himself had fairly received their money; and gave them assurance that they should never hear any more of it; and, that they might believe his words to be true, he went and brought Simeon unbound to them; acquainted them that they were to dine with his lord that day; and showed them, in the mean while, all the tokens of civility that were fitting for welcome guests.

Joseph was to return by noon, and therefore his brothers took care to have their present in readiness; and when he was come, introduced it in the handsomest and most submissive manner they could. He received them all with a friendly countenance; inquired much concerning the health and welfare of their aged father; and then turning to Benjamin, asked them, if he was the younger brother they had mentioned to him; and without staying for their answer, saluted him in these words, 'God be gracious to thee, my son.' But finding his affections begin to work, and fearing lest he should discover himself too soon, he retired into his chamber, and there vented his passion in a flood of tears; which when he had done, he washed his face, and returned to the company, and ordered the dinner to be served up.

Three tables were spread in a large dining-room; one for himself alone, by reason of his dignity; another for his Egyptian guests, ^a who hate to eat with people of a different nation; and a third for his brethren, who were amazed to find themselves placed in exact order, according to their seniority, and did not a little wonder what this unexpected civility might end in.

Joseph, however, during the whole entertainment, behaved very courteously. From his own table ^b he sent dishes to every one of his brothers, but to Benjamin he sent five dishes for each of their one; which was another mystery they could not unriddle; however, for the present, they were very cheerful and merry.

After they had ate and drank very plentifully, they began to think of taking their leave, and of going about the affair for which they came: but Joseph had one fright more in reserve for them; and therefore he ordered his steward, when he filled their sacks with corn, to return their money, as he had done before, but into Benjamin's sack, not only to put his money, but the silver cup likewise, wherein he himself used to drink, and after they were gone a little way out of town, to go and overtake them, and charge them with felony.

The steward did as he was commanded: and, when he came up with Joseph's brethren, upbraided them with ingratitude, in so badly requiting his lord's civility, as to steal away his cup. ^c Conscious of their own innocence, and disdainful of so vile a charge, they put the matter upon this short issue:—That whoever, upon search, should be found to have the cup, should be given up to suffer death, and themselves become all his lord's bond slaves. So said, so done: the beasts were unloaded—the sacks were searched—and to their great astonishment and surprise, the cup was found in Benjamin's. To no purpose it was for the poor youth to say any thing in his own defence: upon such a demonstration none would believe him: and yet, being all concerned in the disgrace, they loaded their asses again, and in a mournful manner returned to the city.

Joseph was at home expecting their return, and when they came before him, reprimanded them very sharply, while they lay prostrate at his feet, and ^d acknowledged lous and astonishing to them, if what Herodotus tells us be true, b. vi. c. 27., namely, "that the distinction in this case, even to Egyptian kings themselves, in all public feasts and banquets, was no more than a double mess."—Patrick's Commentary, and Bibliotheca Biblica.

^c Gen. xlv. 5. 'Whereby indeed he divineth.' Grotius thinks that Joseph meant by this speech, that he used this cup in his drink-offerings, when he sacrificed to prepare himself to receive divine presages; but I think we had better say, there was a kind of divination by cups, though we know not what it was, as we are certain there was by many other things among the Greeks, who borrowed much of their religion from the Egyptians. Such vessels as were used in divine service were not used in their own, being held sacred, and therefore separated from common use, and kept so safe, no doubt, that it was not easy to steal them. He speaks, therefore, of some divination that was used at their meals, which doth not signify that Joseph practised it. But the words are still capable of a more simple interpretation, for maclash sometimes signifies no more than to make an experiment, as in the words of Laban, Gen. xxx. 27, and so the meaning may be, "Might you not have considered that thy master made a trial, by laying this in your way, whether you were honest men or filchers."—Patrick's Commentary on Genesis.

^d Judah, in behalf of himself and his brethren, might very well have pleaded in defence, that they received their sacks from the officer tied up as they were, without ever once opening them; and that the same hand which now, for these two times, had returned their money, was the most likely to have conveyed the cup into them; but since there was a manifest juggle in the thing, he was fearful of irritating the governor if he should go about to detect it; and therefore he thought that the best way for him and his brethren to escape was to acknowledge the crime, though they were innocent of it, and, as if they had no perception of the trick that was put upon them, to implore his pity and compassion, by arguments taken from other topics.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

A. M. 2276. A. C. 1728; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 3539. A. C. 1872. GEN. CH. xxxvii TO THE END.

their guilt; but, in the conclusion of his speech, he assured them, that the person only who was detected in the theft should remain a slave; the rest might return home when they pleased to their father.

Judah, who had taken Benjamin under his care, being by this time recovered from his surprise, drew near, and addressed Joseph in the most submissive and pathetic terms. He acquainted him with the whole case between them and their father, in relation to their bringing Benjamin into Egypt, to take away the suspicion of their being spies. He described very passionately their father's melancholy condition for the loss of his son Joseph; the extreme fondness he had for his son Benjamin; the difficulty they were under to prevail with him to trust him with them, so that he himself was forced to become security for his safe return; and that, if he should go home without him, his father's life was so wrapt up in the child, that he would certainly die with grief. Rather therefore than see this grief of his aged father, and his grey hairs with sorrow descending to the grave, he offered himself an equivalent for his brother: 'Now, therefore, I beseech thee, my lord, let me, thy servant, abide here a slave, instead of the lad, and let him go up with his brethren; for how shall I see my father without him?' This moving speech, and generous offer, were what Joseph's soul could not withstand; and therefore, being able to contain himself no longer, he ordered all the company to leave the room, that he might have a more affectionate freedom in discovering himself to his brethren.

But no sooner had he told them that he was Joseph their brother, which was all that his full heart would let him utter, than, reflecting upon what they had once done to him, they were all struck with such a surprise and confusion, that for a long time they could make him no answer.

As soon, however, as he had recovered himself, he desired them to draw near unto him: he embraced them all round with an unfeigned tenderness; and to dispel all farther apprehensions, told them, that their selling him into Egypt was directed by an unforeseen providence; that therefore, they had no reason to be angry with themselves for doing it, since they were no more than the instruments in God's hand to bring about what his eternal purpose had determined; that he had no reason to resent it, since by that means he had been advanced to the honour and dignity of being governor of all Egypt; nor his father or any of his family to murmur at it, since God had appointed this method for the preservation of their lives. For five years more, he told them, there were to be of the famine; and, therefore, he bid them hasten into Canaan, and tell his father of all his glory and greatness, and desire him to come down, that he might take care of him, and feed him in this time of dearth, and provide him with a country, even the land of Goshen, not far distant from him, and very commodious for such as led a pastoral life. All this, he owned, would be strange and surprising for them to tell; but their father would hardly doubt the testimony of so many eye-witnesses; above all, he would not fail to believe what his favourite Benjamin told him: and with that, he threw himself upon Benjamin's neck, kissed him, and wept over him for joy; and having treated all the rest in the same kind manner, and as a person that was perfectly reconciled to them, they began to take courage, and conversed more familiarly with him.

A rumour, in the mean time, was spread through the court, that Joseph's brethren were come to buy corn; which, when Pharaoh heard, he sent for him, and told him, that since his father's family was so numerous, and the famine as yet not half over, his best way would be to send for them, and place them in what part of the country he thought fit; for that they should never want provisions or any other favour that he could show them. He put him in mind likewise to send them a fresh supply of corn, and whatever else he thought would be necessary in their journey, with chariots and wagons to bring down their wives and children, and the best of their moveables.

Joseph gladly obeyed the king's command: and, besides the chariots and provisions, sent to his father ten asses, laden with the choicest commodities of Egypt; to his brethren he gave each of them changes of garments, but to Benjamin he gave five, with three hundred pieces of silver; and so dismissed them with this kind charge, that they should not 'fall out by the way.' With hearts full of joy they proceeded in their journey to Canaan, and were gladly received by their good old father, especially upon the return of his two sons, Simeon and Benjamin, whom he scarce expected to have seen any more. But when they informed him that his son Joseph was likewise alive, and in what pomp and splendour he lived; that he was the very man, the king's prime minister and governor of Egypt, who had put them into so many deadly frights, being not able to bear so much good news at once, he fainted away in their arms: but when he came to himself again, and they showed him the presents which Joseph had sent, and the chariots and carriages which were come to take him and his goods away, his spirits revived, his doubts and his fears vanished, and in an ecstasy of joy, he cried out, 'It is enough! Joseph my son is yet alive; I will go and see him before I die.'

To see so dear a son, for whom he had mourned so long, in all his Egyptian state and glory, was enough to make him hasten his journey: but as his gratitude to God for all his late mercies vouchsafed unto him, and his farther want of the divine protection to accompany him into Egypt, required some fresh act of religion from him, he chose to go to Beersheba, and there offer some sacrifices, both because it was the place where Abraham and Isaac had lived so long, and because it was in the way to Egypt, as being the utmost boundary of Canaan towards the south.

Here it was that God appeared to him again in a vision; bid him ^a not fear to go down into Egypt, since

^a Gen. xlv. 28.

^a It is not unlikely, that the good old man had promised himself the comfort of spending the remainder of his days in the land which God had been pleased to promise him; and therefore, after so much labour of life, and change of place, when he thought himself at the end of his pilgrimage, and perhaps depended upon the patriarchal line being put in possession before his death, to be obliged to leave his land, and to go into a foreign one, was not a little discouraging, especially if he retained in his mind the melancholy prediction to his grandfather, Gen. xv 13,

A. M. 2276. A. C. 1728; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 3548. A. C. 1863. GEN. CH. XXXIII. TO THE END.

he would be with him, and protect him, and in due time bring his posterity out of it again to enter into the possession of the promised land; and that, as to his own particular, he should live near his beloved Joseph, die in his arms, ^a and have his eyes closed by his hand. So that, encouraged by this divine promise, Jacob left Beersheba, and cheerfully pursued his journey into Egypt, where, when he arrived, ^b he and his family made up in all just ^c the complement of seventy persons.

As soon as he came within the borders of Egypt, not far from the land of Goshen, he sent Judah before to acquaint his son Joseph with his arrival; who instantly took his chariot, with a retinue suitable to his high station,

'Know of a surety, that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, four hundred years, and shall serve them.'—Bibliotheca Biblica in locum.

^a Gen. xlv. 4.—This appears to have been a very ancient and general custom, as there are evidences of its existence among the Jews, Greeks, and Romans. Homer describes Ulysses thus expressing himself on the death of Socus:—

Ah, wretch! no father shall thy corpse compose,
Thy dying eyes no tender mother close. Il. xi.—Pope.

There seems to be something of a reason in nature why such a particular regard should be had at death to the eyes, and that is, because they are in life so eminently serviceable both to body and mind. We close the eyes of the dead, because no part of the body looks so ghastly after death, whereas nothing was so sprightly and beautiful before: and the reason why the nearest in blood or friendship should have this office is too obvious to need any explication.—“I entreat that the gods may ordain that when I am doomed to pay the debt of nature, he may be there to close my eyes and thine.”—Penel. ad Ulyss. de Telemach.

^b The whole account of Jacob's sons and grandsons, who went along with him into Egypt, stands thus:—By Leah 32; by Zilpah 16; by Rachel 11; by Bilhah 7: in all 66, exclusive of Jacob himself, and of Joseph, and his two sons, which make up the 70: and it was necessary indeed that these genealogies should be exactly registered, not only to distinguish each tribe, and thereby discover the Messiah when he came, but, as it is in the case before us, to make it apparent, that the increase of Israel, even under oppression, should bear a fair proportion to the promise made to Abraham, namely, ‘That his seed should be even as the stars of heaven, and as the sand upon the sea-shore for multitude.’—Universal History, and Bibliotheca Biblica.

^c There are three different accounts in Scripture of the number of Jacob's family, when they came down into Egypt. In Gen. xlv. 26, it is said, that ‘all the souls which came with Jacob into Egypt, were threescore and six:’ in the very next verse, and in Deut. x. 22, it is said, that ‘they were threescore and ten;’ and yet St Stephen, in Acts vii. 14, tells us expressly that they were seventy-five. Now, in order to reconcile these seeming contradictions, we must observe, that in each place there is a different manner of computation. In the first catalogue, Moses speaks of those persons only who came out of Jacob's loins, that is, his children and grandchildren that went into Egypt with him; and these exclusive of Jacob himself, and Joseph and his two sons, who were in Egypt before, were exactly sixty-six: whereas, including Jacob himself, together with Joseph and his two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, who, though they were in Egypt before, yet living there as strangers only, and having their original from the land of Canaan, may be reckoned as if they had come into Egypt with Jacob, the number is exactly seventy. The difference between Moses and St Stephen is a little more difficult to reconcile; and yet, if we suppose that St Stephen follows the first number of Moses, namely, sixty-six, out of which he excludes Jacob, Joseph, and his two sons, and to which he adds only nine of his sons' wives, for Judah's wife was already dead, and Benjamin is supposed to be still unmarried, and Joseph's wife out of the case, these nine wives, I say, which though out of Jacob's blood, yet belonged to his family, and to Joseph's kindred, which is the very expression St Stephen makes use of, added to the number of sixty-six other persons, will amount exactly to seventy-five.—Patriick's Commentary, Universal and Howell's Histories.

and with infinite satisfaction, congratulated his arrival at a place where he had it in his power to make his life happy and comfortable. What the expressions of filial duty, and paternal affection were upon this occasion, words cannot describe: tears of joy flowed from both sides: and while the son was contemplating the goodness of God, in bringing him to the sight of his aged father, the father, on the other hand, thought all his happiness upon earth completed in this interview: and therefore, ¹ ‘Now let me die,’ says he to his son, ‘since I have seen thy face, because thou art yet alive.’

As soon as these tender greetings, and the solemn rejoicings which followed upon them, were over, Joseph proposed to his father and brethren, to go and acquaint Pharaoh with their arrival: and as he supposed that the king would have a curiosity to see some of them, he gave them in charge, that in case he should ask them what occupation they were of, their answer should be, that they were shepherds, as their ancestors, for many generations, had been before them: by which means he might ^d secure for them the land of Goshen, which would be a separate habitation, and a happy retreat from the insults of the Egyptians, who were known ^e to have an utter detestation to shepherds.

^d By the general consent of ancient geographers, the land of Goshen is situate in the eastern part of Egypt, between the Red Sea and the river Nile, upon the borders of Canaan. It was a fruitful spot of ground, very fit for pasturage; and therefore Josephus tells us that Pharaoh's own cattle were kept there, and accordingly we find him ordering Joseph to make one of his brothers the inspector-general over them. The country was separate from Egypt: and for this reason the Israelites inhabiting it, might keep themselves in a body, without endangering their religion or manners, by intermixing with the Egyptians, and without incurring their envy or odium, as they would have done, had they lived among them, and shared any power or profit in the government. They came down into Egypt upon a particular exigency, and were to return again to take possession of the promised land; and therefore a country, that lay in a manner contiguous to it, was the most convenient for their abode, that they might be in readiness to remove whenever God should order them to leave it, which they would not have found so easy a thing to do, had they been settled in the heart of Egypt.—Poole's Annotations.

^e The country of Egypt, as Diodorus tells us, b. I. was divided into three parts, whereof the priests had one, the king a second, and the soldiery a third; but under these there were three other ranks of men, shepherds, husbandmen, and artificers. The husbandmen served the king, and the other two orders, in tilling the ground for very small wages, and so did the shepherds, in their capacities; for the Egyptians, we must remember, had sheep and oxen, as well as horses and asses, which they sold unto Joseph, in the time of the famine. It cannot be thought, therefore, that they abominated all shepherds in general, but only such shepherds as were foreigners, and for what reason it was that they did this, is not so easy a matter to resolve. Some are of opinion, that shepherds were held in detestation, because they were a people in those days addicted to robbery, which made them very odious to the Egyptians: but others imagine, that theft among the Egyptians was not reputed so abominable a crime; and therefore they think, that the most probable reason for this aversion to shepherds, and to the Hebrews, as such, was the great oppression and tyranny under which they had lately groaned, when the Phœnician shepherds penetrated Egypt, wasted their cities, burnt their temples, murdered the inhabitants, and seated themselves for a considerable while in the possession of it. (See note, page 215.) But upon whatever account it was, that the Egyptians had this aversion to shepherds, it certainly was an instance of Joseph's great modesty and love of truth, that he was not ashamed of an employment, so mean in itself, and so vile in the eyes of the Egyptians. Had he been minded to make the most of the matter, he might have

With this caution he took five of his brothers along with him; and having informed Pharaoh that his father and family were come as far as Goshen, he presented his brothers to the king, who for his sake received them very graciously; and when he asked them what profession they were of, they told him that they were shepherds, as their family for many generations had been; that want of pasture for their cattle, and of sustenance for themselves, had made them leave Canaan; but that since, as they understood, his majesty had been so hospitable, as to give them reception in his dominions, they humbly prayed, that they might be allowed to settle in Goshen, as a country most convenient for their purpose: which he readily granted, and offered moreover to make any one of them, whom Joseph should appoint, his royal shepherd.

Not long after this, Joseph, in like manner, presented his father to Pharaoh, who seeing him look very hale and hearty, and desiring to know of what age he might be, was informed by Jacob, that he was a an hundred and thirty; which, when the king seemed to wonder at, he told him moreover, that his life was not as yet, near so long as that of some of his ancestors, because his fate had been to have too large a share of troubles and fatigues to harass and wear him out; and so, wishing his majesty abundance of health and prosperity, he returned to Goshen, where Joseph took care to supply him, and all his family, with such a plentiful provision of corn, and other necessaries, from the king's storehouses, as in the time of the greatest scarceness made him insensible of any want.

But while Jacob and his family lived in plenty, the Egyptians found the sad effects of the famine, which increased daily upon them, and Joseph holding up his corn at a high rate, in a short time brought all their money into the king's coffers; and when their money was gone, they were all, except the priests, who were furnished from the king's stores, obliged to part with instructed his brothers to have concealed their way or business of life; or if he was aware that they would follow the same in Egypt that they had done in Canaan, he might nevertheless have put into their mouths the high dignity of their descent, and the wonderful history of their family, namely, that Abraham was their great-grandfather, a prince renowned for his defeat of four confederate monarchs; that Isaac was their grandfather, whose amity and alliance had been courted by kings; and that Israel was their father, who once gained a victory even over a mighty prince of the celestial host; all great men in their generations, and dignified with the conversation of God himself. This, and a great deal more, had Joseph been minded to serve the purposes of vanity, he might have suggested to his brethren; but by this open declaration, we may perceive, that his pleasure and ambition was, that the wonderful chain of the divine measures and counsels, in bringing him from an humble condition of life, to such a sublimity of power and figure, might be as conspicuous as possible.—Poole's Annotations, Patrick's Commentary, and Bibliotheca Biblica in locum.

a Pharaoh's question to Jacob, and Jacob's answer, we may suppose, were not all the discourse that passed between them, but only what most deserved to be mentioned; because as the learned Pererius observes this answer of Jacob's is the very hinge upon which the whole chronology of the patriarchal times turns. The same excellent commentator remarks, that though Jacob lived seventeen years after this, yet, even at last, he did not attain 'to the days of the years of the life of his father,' since his father Isaac lived an hundred and fourscore years, and his grandfather Abraham to an hundred and seventy-five.—Bibliotheca Biblica.

their cattle, their houses, their lands, and b at length, their very selves, for provisions. All these Joseph purchased of the people in the king's name, and for the king's use; and to let them see that the purchase was in earnest, and that their liberties and properties were now become the king's, he transplanted them from their former places of abode, into distant and different parts of the kingdom, that they might in time lose the very remembrance of their ancient possessions. c

This, in another person, might have been thought an immoderate zeal for an absolute power in the king, and an advantage unjustly taken of the necessities of the subject; but Joseph so managed the matter as to gain the commendation of both prince and people; for when the seventh and last year of famine was come, he acquainted them that they might now expect a crop against next year; that the Nile would overflow, and the earth would bring forth her fruits as usual. Hereupon he distributed fresh lands, cattle and corn to them, that they might return to their tillage as before; but upon this condition he did it, that from thenceforth the fifth part of all the product of their lands should go to the king, and the rest be theirs. To these conditions the people willingly consented, as imputing the preservation of their lives entirely to Joseph's care; and from that time it passed into a law, that the fifth part of the product of the land of Egypt should always belong to the crown.

While Joseph was enjoying the fruits of his great success and policy, his family at Goshen, which he failed not frequently to visit, became very wealthy, and very numerous, till at length his father Jacob, finding himself grow old and feeble, and perceiving that his latter end was near approaching, sent for him, and to this purpose addressed himself to him: "Though the desire of seeing a son, so dear to me as you are, raised to the height of Egyptian glory, joined to the raging famine which then visited our land, made me willingly come down into this strange country; yet Canaan being the inheritance which God promised to Abraham and his posterity, and where he lies interred with my father Isaac, and some others of our family, in the ground which he purchased of the inhabitants for that purpose; my last, and dying request to you is, d that you will not suffer me to be

b When the Egyptians were driven to this last extremity, in our translation it is said to be in the 'second year;' but this must not be understood to be the second year of the seven years of famine, but the second after that last mentioned, wherein they had sold their cattle, which was in reality the last year of the famine; because he now gave them corn for seed, as well as for food; whereas in the first years, there was neither sowing nor reaping. Gen. xlv. 6.—Poole's Annotations.

c See note on this subject in the following chapter.—Ed.

d Though there be something of a natural desire in most men to be buried in the places where their ancestors lie; yet Jacob's aversion to have his remains deposited in Egypt seems to be more earnest than ordinary, or otherwise he would never have imposed an oath upon his sons, and charged them all with his dying breath, not to sutler it to be done. For he very well knew, that had his body been buried in Egypt, his posterity, upon that very account, would have been too much wedded to the country, ever to attempt the acquisition of the promised land; and therefore, to wear them from the thoughts of continuing in Egypt, and fix their minds and affections in Canaan, he ordered his body to be carried thither beforehand, in testimony that he died in full persuasion of the truth of the promises which were given to him and his ancestors: nor was it inconvenient, buried here, but swear to see me carried to Machpelah, and there deposited with my ancestors. Your great power with the king will easily obtain that favour, which is the last I have to ask." Joseph was not long before he gave his father a satisfactory answer. He promised, and he swore to him, that he would fulfil his desire, which pleased the good old man to that degree, that "he bowed, and made his acknowledgment for this kind assurance.

Joseph, who could not be long absent from court, took his leave of his father, but not without giving strict charge to some of the family, that upon the very first appearance of danger, they should immediately send for him. Accordingly, as soon as word was brought him, that his father was a dying, he took his two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim with him, and went to visit him; who when he heard that his favourite son was come, summoned all his spirits together, and was so far revived as to be able to sit up in his bed.

Here he began with recapitulating all the glorious promises which God had formerly made him, concerning his numerous posterity's inhabiting the land of Canaan, and concluded ^b with the death of his dear Rachel.

That future generations, after their return to Canaan, should have before their eyes the sepulchre of their forefathers, for a record of their virtues, and an incitement to the imitation of them. But the strongest motive of all for Jacob's desiring to be buried in Canaan, supposing that he foreknew that our Saviour Christ was to live and die, and with some others, rise again in that country, was, that he might be one of that blessed number; as it was indeed an ancient tradition in the church, that among those who came out of their graves after our Lord's resurrection, Math. xxvii. 53, the patriarch Jacob was one.—Poole's Annotations, and Bibliotheca Biblica.

^a The words in our translation are, 'he bowed himself upon the bed's head,' (Gen. xlvii. 31,) where some expositors, presuming, that his bowing was a religious action, will by no means have it directed to Joseph, but to God only, for the assurance which Joseph had given him, that he should be buried according to his desire. But if the word must be translated 'bowed,' there is no necessity to make it an act of adoration, but only a common form of civility, wherewith the father might comply, without any diminution to his superiority over his son. What led these expositors into this conception, was the version of the Septuagint, and the words of the apostle to the Hebrews, where Jacob is said, in allusion, as they suppose, to this passage, to have 'worshipped on the top of his staff,' Heb. xi. 21. But the plain truth is, that the apostle here speaks of another thing, not of what Jacob did now, when Joseph swore unto him, but of what he did when he blessed his other children. In the former case, he seems to have kept his bed; but in the latter, to have received fresh spirits, and sat upon it, though leaning perhaps 'upon his staff.' So that the apostle's words are not taken from those of Moses, but are a reflection of his own, whereby he signifies the strength of Jacob's faith, even when he was so weak as not to be able to bow himself and worship, without the help of his staff. This clearly removes the difficulty, and reconciles Moses and the apostle very perfectly. But there seems to be a more compendious way of doing this; for since the word Shacab, which signifies to bow the body, may, in like manner, be rendered to lie or fall down, the most easy translation seems to be, he laid himself down upon his pillow, as weak men are wont to do, after they have sat up a while, to despatch some business.—Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentary.

^b Since Jacob had so strictly insisted upon his being buried with his fathers, and bound Joseph with an oath to see it done, it was proper for him to explain and clear himself, as to what might be secretly objected to his not interring Rachel, Joseph's own mother, and his best beloved consort, in that burying-place, where he so earnestly desired to lie himself; and for his excuse in this respect he had two things to offer: 1st, That he was then upon his journey, and in his return from Padan; and, 2dly, That he had erected a monumental pillar upon her grave, in a very public

"How tenderly I loved her," continued he, "all my family can testify; but this farther proof I design to give you of my affection to her. You have two sons born in a foreign country, and who, according to the usual order of inheritance, should have only the portion of grandchildren, in the division of the promised land; but from this day forward, they shall be called by my name, be esteemed my sons, and as heads of two distinct tribes (for they shall not be called the tribe of Joseph, but the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh) receive a double portion in that allotment. But it must not be so with the other sons which you beget after these: they come in only for the portion of grandchildren: and to you in particular, I bequeath that tract of ground, which, by force of arms, I took from the Amorites, that it may descend to your tribe for ever."

All this while Jacob, whose sight was very much decayed, talked to his son concerning his children, as if they had been absent; but when he perceived that they were in the room, he rejoiced not a little, and ordered them to be brought near him. Joseph placed them in a position according to the order of their age, to receive his father's blessing; but Jacob, crossing his hands, laid his right, which carried with it the preference, upon the younger, and his left upon the elder of them; ^c which and frequented place; to which a right reverend commentator has added a further apology,—That, as she died in childhood, and Jacob in his travels might not have all things necessary to preserve her body long, he was constrained to bury her sooner perhaps than otherwise he would have done.—Patrick's Commentary, and Bibliotheca Biblica in locum.

^c Gen. xlviii. 14. 'And Israel stretched out his right hand, and laid it upon Ephraim's head.' Imposition of hands was a Jewish ceremony, introduced, not by any divine authority, but by custom: it being the practice among these people, whenever they prayed to God for any person, to lay their hand on his head. Our Saviour observed the same custom, both when he conferred his blessing on children, and when he healed the sick, adding prayer to the ceremony. The apostles likewise laid hands upon those upon whom they bestowed the Holy Ghost. The priests observed the same custom when any one was received into their body. And the apostles themselves underwent the imposition of hands afresh every time they entered upon any new design. In the ancient church imposition of hands was even practised upon persons when they married, which custom the Abyssinians still observe. The ceremony of the imposition of hands on the head of the victim, has been usually considered, in the case of paucular sacrifices, as a symbolical translation of the sins of the offender upon the head of the sacrifice; and as a mode of deprecating the evil due to his transgressions. So we find it represented by Abarbinel, in the introduction to his commentary on Leviticus, (De Viel, p. 301,) and so the ceremony of the scape-goat, in Levit. xvi. 21, seems directly to assert. And it is certain that the practice of imprecating on the head of the victim, the evils which the sacrificer wished to avert from himself, was usual amongst the heathen, as appears particularly from Herodotus, (b. ii. c. 39,) who relates this of the Egyptians, and at the same time asserts that no Egyptian would so much as taste the head of any animal, but under the influence of this religious custom, flung it into the river. Confession of sin was always connected with paucular sacrifices. (Levit. v. 5.; xvi. 21.; Numb. v. 7.) The particular forms of confession used in the different times of paucular sacrifices are handed down to us by the Jewish writers, and are given by Outram, (De Sacr. b. l. c. 15, 10, 11.) The form prescribed for the individual presenting his own sacrifice, seems particularly significant. "O God, I have sinned, I have done perversely, I have transgressed before thee, and have done so and so. Lo, now I repent, and am truly sorry for my misdeeds. Let then this victim be my expiation." These last words were accompanied by the action of laying hands on the victim; and were considered by the Jews as equivalent to this, "Let the evils which in justice should have fallen on my head, light upon thee

Joseph supposing to proceed from a mistake, he was going to rectify, but was told by his father, that what he did was by divine direction, and so made Ephraim not only the first in nomination, but gave him a blessing much more extensive than what he gave his brother.

By this time Jacob, finding himself grow faint, and the hour of his departure near approaching, called the rest of his sons together, to take his farewell of them, and distribute his blessing, or rather to foretell what should befall them and their posterity in future ages; and so directing his speech to them severally, he began with Reuben the eldest, and told him,—That for the crime of incest, in polluting his father's bed, he and his tribe were degraded ^a from the privileges of his birthright. He told Simeon and Levi, whom he joined together upon this occasion, that for their impious massacre of Hamor and his people, ^b their tribes should for ever be separated and dispersed among the other; but then turning to Judah, he prophesied of him, that to his tribe should the sovereignty belong, ^c and they be ^d situated in a very fruitful country; that from his name head of this victim."—See Outram De Sacr. b. 1. c. 22. 5, 6, 9. Steege on Atonement and Sacrifice, vol. 1. p. 341.

^a The prerogatives of the birthright consisted chiefly in the honour of the priesthood, in the rule and government of the family, and in a double portion of the inheritance, which at this time were all taken away from Reuben, and divided severally; since it appears, in the sequel of the history, that the tribe of Reuben continued all along in obscurity, while the priesthood was conferred on Levi, the government on Judah, and the double portion on Joseph, to descend to their respective tribes.—Howell's History of the Bible.

^b Jacob's words, in this place, may imply a double dispersion, namely, of the two tribes from each other; and of their being interspersed among the rest: and accordingly that of Levi had no inheritance among his brethren in the land of Canaan, but only a certain number of cities assigned to them in every tribe. And as for that of Simeon, they had properly no more than a portion of Judah's inheritance, (Josh. xix. 1.) if we except some few places which they got upon mount Seir, and in the wilds of the valley of Gedor, 1 Chron. vi. 39, &c.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 7.

^c Gen. xlix. 8. 'Thy hand shall be in the neck of thine enemies.' This expression denotes triumph over an enemy, and that Judah should subdue his adversaries. This was fulfilled in the person of David, and acknowledged by him. 'Thou hast also given me the necks of mine enemies, that I might destroy them that hate me,' Ps. xviii. 40. Treading on the neck of a vanquished foe has been a very common practice. Amongst the Franks it was usual to put the arm round the neck as a mark of superiority on the part of him that did it. When Chroudin, declining the office of mayor of the palace, chose a young nobleman, named Gogen, to fill that place, he immediately took the arm of that young man, and put it round his own neck, as a mark of his dependance on him, and that he acknowledged him for his general and chief. 'When a debtor became insolvent, he gave himself up to his creditor as his slave, till he had paid all his debt: and to confirm his engagement, he took the arm of his patron, and put it round his own neck. This ceremony invested as it were, his creditor in his person.'—Stockdale's Manners of the Ancient Nations, vol. 1. p. 356. See Gen. xxvii. 40. Deut. xxviii. 48. Isa. x. 27. Jer. xxvii. 8. Josh. x. 24. Lam. v. 5.

^d The country which the tribe of Judah was to inhabit is thus described by Jacob: 'Binding his foal unto the vine, and his ass unto the choice vine; he washed his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes,' (Gen. xlix. 11.) which are expressions somewhat hyperbolical: for they imply, that vines in this country should be as common as thorns in other places; and wine as plentiful as water; but were, in a great measure, answered in that fertile land which fell to the tribe of Judah's share. For here was the valley of Escol, a bunch of whose grapes was brought by the spies as a specimen of the fruitfulness of the land, Numb. xiii. 23. Here was a brook or torrent of the same name, should the whole nation of the Jews derive their appellation; and that the form of government which he then instituted, should endure among them until the Messiah came. ^e Of Zebulun ^f he foretold that his tribe should be planted near the sea-coasts; and of ^g Issachar, that his should prove a pusillanimous people, and be lovers of inglorious ease, more than of liberty and renown.

From Leah's sons the patriarch passes to those of his two concubinary wives; and ^h of Dan's posterity he foretells, that though they were descended from an handmaid, yet they should have the same privileges with the other tribes, should become a politic people, and greatly versed in the stratagems of war; of ⁱ Gad's, that they should be frequently infested with robbers, but overcome them at last; of Asher's, that they should be situated in a fruitful and exuberantly rich soil; and ^k of Naphtali's, that they should spread their branches like an oak, and multiply exceedingly.

along whose banks were the most delicious pasture-grounds for cattle; and, as modern travellers tell us, here are very large grapes still to be met with, especially in the valley of Hebron, which in all probability is that through which this torrent runs.—Poole's Annotations, Bibliotheca Biblica, and Universal History, b. 1. c. 7.

^e Gen. xlix. 10. 'The sceptre shall not depart from Judah.' Sceptres, or staves of some kind or other, have been among almost all nations the ensigns of civil authority, as they are to this day, being in themselves very proper emblems of power extended, or acting at a distance from the person. Achilles, who was the chief of a Grecian tribe or clan, is described in Homer as holding a sceptre or staff, which

The delegates of Jove, dispensing laws,
Bear in their hands.

This remarkable prophecy fixes the date of the Saviour's coming, which was not to exceed the time that the descendants of Judah were to continue an united people,—that a king should rule over them—that they should be governed by their own laws, and that their judges were to be from among their brethren.—Ed.

^f Had Jacob been present at the division of the land of Canaan he could hardly have given a more exact description of Zebulun's lot than we find him doing two hundred and fifty years before it happened. For it extended from the Mediterranean sea on the west, to the lake of Genezareth on the east, and lay therefore very commodiously for trade and navigation. The foretelling so precisely and distinctly the situation and employment of this tribe, though, at first appearance, it may seem a matter of no great moment, yet will be found to be quite otherwise, when it is considered, that such particularities as these could not but be very convincing to the Israelites that it was not chance, nor power, nor policy, that put them in possession of the land of Canaan, but 'God's right hand and his arm, and the light of his countenance, because he had a favour unto them.'

^g No less remarkable is the description of Issachar's tribe, since, though they were a very laborious people in all rural employments, yet they had no great inclination to war; and were therefore frequently infested and subjected by strangers, especially in the time of the judges.

^h The Jews think, that the prophecy of Dan's destroying his enemies by craft was more particularly fulfilled when Sampson, who was of that tribe, pulled down the temple, which crushed himself and the Philistines to death.

ⁱ Gad's lot happened on the other side of Jordan, where they were continually exposed to the incursions of the hordeing Arabs; but, by their watchfulness and bravery, they not only prevented them, but several times caught, and plundered them in their turns, insomuch that, in one battle, they took from them fifty thousand camels, two hundred and fifty thousand sheep, besides an hundred thousand men prisoners.—Deut. xxxiii. 22., &c.

^k The words in our translation, 'Naphtali is a hind let loose, he giveth goodly words,' are very obscure, and scarce intelligible. For though the former part of the prediction is commonly applied to Barak's overcoming Sisera, and the latter to that noble canticle

Jacob had reserved the sons of his beloved Rachel to the last; and therefore turning to "Joseph at the same time that he recollects his past troubles, and sets forth the future greatness of his tribe, he pours down upon him, and in him, upon his posterity, benedictions of all kinds. "The Lord, even the God of thy father," says he, "shall bless thee 'with the dew of heaven,' and with the 'fatness of the earth,' with the 'fruit of the womb,' that is, with a numerous posterity, and with the 'fruit of the breast,' with plenty of all sorts of cattle. May all the blessings promised to me and my forefathers be doubled upon Joseph's royal head; may they out-top and outstretch the everlasting mountains, and prove to him more fruitful and more lasting than they."

Whether Jacob might foresee no merit nor happiness extraordinary in the tribe of Benjamin, or that its being afterwards blended with the tribe of Judah might make it partake of the same blessing; but so it was, that he contented himself with describing its b fierce and warlike disposition, which, like a ravenous 'wolf, would shed the blood of its enemies, and in the evening divide their spoil.'

which Deborah made upon that occasion; yet the exposition which the learned Bochart gives us of this passage, 'He shall be like a tree that shooteth out pleasant branches,' is both more agreeable to the original, and more answerable to the event; since no tribe multiplied so wonderfully as this of Naphtali, who had but four sons when he came into Egypt, and yet could muster upwards of fifty-three thousand men fit to bear arms, when he came out of it, that is, in less than 220 years.—Essay towards a New Translation.

a In the benediction which Jacob gives his favourite Joseph, there are two remarkable titles which he confers upon him. 1st, 'That he was the shepherd, and the stone of Israel,' which seems to be a thankful recognition of Joseph's kindness to his father and family, in keeping and feeding them, even as a shepherd does his sheep; by which means he became the foundation or basis, as it were, of the house of Jacob, by preserving them from perishing by famine, and continuing them settled in the best part of the Egyptian kingdom, for a considerable time: though some refer it rather to his virtuous resisting the temptations of his mistress, and patiently enduring the master's severity, to both of which he remained as immovable as a stone. 2d, The other title is, that he was 'separate from his brethren;' where, though the word nazir signifies to separate, as Joseph was certainly separated from his brethren, when he was sold into Egypt, yet, as it is hardly supposable, that Jacob would couch so cruel an action in so soft a term, it is rather to be thought that he used the word nazir, which signifies crowned, in allusion to the superintendents of the king's household in all the eastern countries, who were called nazirs; and were probably some kind of diadem about their heads, by way of distinction and grandeur. And as for the fruitfulness promised to Joseph, this was exemplified in the large extent of his twofold tribe, Ephraim and Manasseh, which, at their first numbering, yielded seventy-two thousand seven hundred, Num. i., and at their second, eighty-five thousand and two hundred men, all able to go out to war. Num. xxvi.

b How brave and warlike a body of men, and how very expert in feats of arms, this tribe became, we may conceive from what we are told of them, namely, that 'there were seven hundred chosen men among them, left-handed, every one of whom could sling stones at a hair's breadth, and not miss.' (Judges xx. 16.) And how pertinacious they were in their undertakings of this kind is manifest, both from the fierce battles which they fought against all the other tribes, though in a very bad cause, (Judges, xix.) wherein they twice came off conquerors; and from the long opposition which the house of Saul, descended from this tribe, made against the accession of David to the throne, and which could not be suppressed until Abner, the general of their forces, forsook them. Judges and 1 Sam. passim.

c Besides these prophecies of Jacob, which were sufficiently ing to his children, according to the divine direction, and not according to his own inclination, reminded them all, but Joseph more especially, to bury him among his ancestors, d in the cave of Machpelah; and so laying himself down in his bed again, in a short time expired, after he had lived 147 years in all, and seventeen of these in Egypt.

The loss of so good a father was doubtless lamented by all his family, but by none with more sincere expressions of filial sorrow than by Joseph. At length, remembering his dying charge, he ordered his physicians, e according to the custom of the country, to verified by their events, the Jews ascribe some other works to him, namely, a treatise entitled The Ladder to Heaven, and another called Jacob's Testament, which Pope Gelasius reckons among the Apocrypha; together with some forms of prayer, which the Jews use every night, and pretend that they were composed by him. As to the commendations which they so plentifully bestow upon this patriarch, these, in a great measure, are justified by the character which the author of Ecclesiasticus gives him, chap. xlv. 23. And as the Mahometans allow him not only to be a prophet, but the father likewise of all the prophets, except Job, Jethro, and Mahomet; so they believe, that the royal dignity did not depart from his posterity, until the times of John the Baptist, and Jesus Christ; and that from him the twelve tribes of the Jews did spring, even as their own twelve did from Ishmael.—Calmet's Dictionary, under the word Jacob.

d Gen. xlix. 29. 'And he charged them, and said unto them, I am to be gathered unto my people: bury me with my fathers.' Princes and persons of quality, who died in foreign parts, were usually carried into their own country, to be buried with their fathers. That this was practised in the patriarchal times, appears from the injunction which Jacob laid upon his children respecting his interment. It was also the custom of the Greeks. Homer represents Juno as thus speaking concerning Sarpedon:—

Give the bold chief a glorious fate in fight;
And when th' ascending soul has wing'd her flight,
Let sleep and death convey, by thy command,
The breathless body to his native land.

For this reason, such as died in foreign countries had usually their ashes brought home, and interred in the sepulchres of their ancestors, or at least in some part of their native country; it being thought that the same mother which gave them life and birth was only fit to receive their remains, and afford them a peaceful habitation after death. Hence ancient authors abound in innumerable instances of bodies conveyed, sometimes by the command of oracles, sometimes by the good-will of their friends, from foreign countries to the sepulchres of their fathers, and with great solemnity deposited there. Thus Theseus was removed from Scyros to Athens, Orestes from Tegea, and his son Tisamenos from Helice to Sparta, and Aristomenes from Rhodes to Messene.—Ed.

e Gen. 1. 2. 'And Joseph commanded his servants, the physicians, to embalm his father.' Concerning the practice of physic in Egypt, Herodotus says that it was divided amongst the faculty in this manner—"Every distinct di-temper hath its own physician, who confines himself to the study and care of that alone, and meddles with no other: so that all places are crowded with physicians; for one class hath the cure of the eyes, another of the head, another of the teeth, another of the region of the belly, and another of occult distempers." (l. 2. c. 84.) After this we shall not think it strange that Joseph's physicians are represented as a number. A body of these domestics would now appear an extravagant piece of state, even in a first minister. But then it could not be otherwise, where each di-temper had its proper physician; so that every great family, as well as city, must needs, as Herodotus expresses it, swarm with the faculty. There is a remarkable passage in Jeremiah (chap. xlv. 11), where, foretelling the overthrow of Pharaoh's army at the Euphrate, he describes Egypt by this characteristic of her skill in medicine, 'Go up into Gilead, and take balm,' (or bal-sam.) 'O virgin, the daughter of Egypt; in vain shalt thou use many medicines, for thou shalt not be cured.'—Warburton's Divine I. got'on, b. 4. sec. 3.

embalm his father's body, and all preparations for his funeral to be made. For the space of seventy days they continued their mourning for him; in which time it being improper for Joseph to appear at court, he desired some of the officers about the king, to acquaint his majesty, that his father, before his death, had obliged him, upon oath, to bury him in a sepulchre belonging to their family, in the land of Canaan; and that therefore he begged leave to go and fulfil his last commands, and would, without delay, return again. ^b The king readily consented to his request, and ordered moreover the chief officers of his household, and some of the principal nobility of the kingdom, to attend the funeral, who, joined with his own and his father's whole family, some in chariots, and some on horseback, made ^c a very large and pompous procession.

^a The manner of embalming among the Egyptians according to Herodotus, Diodorus, and others, was as follows. When a man died, his body was carried to the artificers, whose business it was to make coffins. The upper part of the coffin represented the person who was to be put in it, whether man or woman; and, if a person of distinction, was generally adorned with such paintings and embellishments as were suitable to its quality. When the body was brought home again, they agreed with the embalmers; but according to the quality of the person, the prices were different. The highest was a talent, that is, about three hundred pounds sterling; twenty mine was a moderate one; and the lowest a very small matter. As the body lay extended, one of them, whom they called the designer, marked out the place on the left side where it was to be opened, and then a dissector, with a very sharp Egyptian stone, made the incision, through which they drew all the intestines, except the heart and kidneys, and then washed them with palm wine, and other strong and binding drugs. The brains they drew through the nostrils, with an hooked piece of iron, made particularly for that purpose, and filled the skull with astringent drugs. The whole body they anointed with oil of cedar, with myrrh, cinnamon, and other drugs, for about thirty days; by which means it was preserved entire, without so much as losing its hair, and sweet, without any signs of putrefaction. After this it was put into salt about forty days; and therefore when Moses says, that forty days were employed in embalming Jacob, (Gen. l. 3.) he must mean the forty days of his continuing in the salt of nitre, without including the thirty days that were spent in the other operations above mentioned: so that, in the whole, they mourned seventy days in Egypt, as Moses likewise observes. Last of all, the body was taken out of this salt, washed, and wrapped up in linen swaddling bands dipped in myrrh, and rubbed with a certain gum, which the Egyptians used instead of glue, and so returned to the relations, who put it into the coffin, and kept it in some repository in their houses, or in tombs, made particularly for that purpose.—Cabinet's Dictionary, under the word Embalm, and Warburton's Divine Legislation, vol. 2. b. 3.

^b It was against rule for any person, how great soever, in mourning apparel, to appear in public, and especially in the royal presence, because in that state they were looked upon as defiled; and therefore Joseph does not go himself, but desires some of the courtiers to carry his request to the king; and this request he was the rather bound to make, because the retinue and guard which the pomp of the funeral, and the danger of molestation from enemies, made necessary, could not be obtained without the king's leave.—Musculus.

^c The splendour and magnificence of our patriarch's funeral seems to be without a parallel in history. What hitherto has most affected me in the comparison, were indeed the noble obsequies of Marcellus, as Virgil has described them, but how do even these, with all their parade of poetry about them, fall short of the plain and simple narrative before us? For what are the six hundred beds for which the Roman solemnities on this occasion were so famous, in comparison of that national itinerant multitude, which swelled like a flood, and moved like a river, to all Pharaoh's servants, to the elders of his house, and all the elders of the land of Egypt, that is, to the officers of his household, and deputies of his provinces, with all the house of Joseph, and his

As soon as they were entered into the land of Canaan, they made an halt at ^d the thrashing-floor of Atad, and there continued mourning, and lamenting the death of their friend and father seven days; which made the Canaanites, perceiving that the company came from Egypt, call the place Abel-mizraim, or the mourning of the Egyptians, ever after. They thence continued their march till they came to the field of Machpelah, where ^e they deposited Jacob in the cave with his ancestors, and so returned to Egypt again.

As soon as their father was buried, Joseph's brethren began to reflect on the wrongs they had formerly done him, and were not a little apprehensive, that as he certainly had it in his power, he might now have it in his intention, to avenge himself of them: and therefore they consulted together, and framed this message,—That it was his father's earnest request, that he should forget all past injuries, and continue them under his protection, as formerly. This, when Joseph heard, such was his compassionate temper, that he could not refrain from weeping; and therefore, to remove their fears, he sent immediately for them, and receiving them with the same kind affection as when their father was alive, excused the actions committed against him, in such an obliging manner, and gave them such assurances of his future love, and adherence to them upon all occasions, as made them return to their families full of joy and satisfaction.

^f The sacred history gives us no further account of brethren, and his father's house, conducting their solemn sorrow for near three hundred miles into a distant country.—Bibliotheca Biblica, Occasional Annotations, 46.

^d The words in the text are,—‘And they came to the thrashing-floor of Atad, which is beyond Jordan,’ Gen. l. 10. Where this place was, we cannot determine from any account in Scripture; but it is very probable, that it lay not far from the place where Jacob was buried, and so not far from Hebron. For since it is absurd to suppose, that the corpse of Jacob was carried to the cave of Machpelah such a round about way as the Israelites went afterwards into the land of Canaan, namely, through Arabia Petraea, quite on the eastern side of Jordan, it remains to suppose, that these places are said to be beyond Jordan, not in respect of Egypt, from whence Jacob's corpse was brought, but in respect of the place where Moses was, when he wrote the history, that is, in a country on the east of Jordan; and consequently the places beyond Jordan must be such as lay on the west of Jordan; but why they made the thrashing-floor of Atad, rather than the place of interment, the scene of their lamentations, is not so easy to resolve. Perhaps it was a place more convenient to stay in for seven days, than the field of Machpelah; or perhaps it might be the custom, at the very entrance of the country, where they carried the corpse to be buried, to fall into lamentations, which they might repeat at the grave again, though no mention be made of it here.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 1.; and Patrick's Commentary.

^e The Jewish doctors have a tradition of a bloody fight which Joseph had at his father's funeral, with one Tzephio, the son of Eliphaz, who would have opposed his burying him in the cave of Machpelah, as disputing his title to the ground, but that Joseph, and his men, having overcome him, carried him away with them into Egypt, and kept him there prisoner as long as Joseph lived; however, as soon as he was dead, Tzephio found means to escape into Italy.—Universal History, in the notes, b. 1. c. 7.

^f The author of Ecclesiasticus has given us an encomium of the patriarch Joseph in these words, ‘Of Jacob was this man of mercy born, who found favour in the eyes of all flesh. He was born to be the prince of his brethren, and the support of his family; to be the head of his kinsmen, and the firm support of his people. His bones were visited, and prophesied after his death,’ (xliv. 15.) His meaning is, that his bones were removed out of Egypt, and that this fell out as a consequence of his prophecy, that God would visit the Hebrews, and bring them into any particulars in Joseph's life, though he lived fifty-four years after his father's death. It informs us, that he lived to see himself the happy parent of a numerous offspring in his two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, even to the third generation; and all this while we may presume, that he continued in high favour with his prince, and in weighty employments under him. But when he grew old, and found his death approaching, he sent for his brethren, and with the like prophetic spirit, that his father Jacob had done, told them, that God, according to his promise, would not fail to bring their posterity out of Egypt into the land of Canaan; and therefore he made them swear to him, as he had done to his father, that when it should please God thus to visit them, they would not forget to ^a carry his body along with them: and to this purpose, as soon as he was dead, which was in the hundred and tenth year of his age, they had his body embalmed, and ^b kept in a coffin, ^c until the time their deliverance should come.

the promised land. The Jewish rabbins have taken a great latitude in ascribing several particulars to this great man, which have not the least foundation in Scripture. They make him the inventor of all the arts and sciences, for which the Egyptians afterwards became so famous: and attribute to him the composition of several books, such as Joseph's Prayer, Joseph's Mirror, &c. which do not so much redound to his credit. Mahomet, in his Coran, (Surat. 12.) relates his history at length, but blends it with many fabulous circumstances, which have been much improved by the eastern people; for they made him in a manner greater than the Jewish doctors do. They tell us equally that he taught the Egyptians the most sublime sciences, and particularly geometry, which was highly necessary in their division of the land. They suppose, that all the wells, and baths, and granaries, which go under his name, nay, that all the ancient pyramids and obelisks, though they do not, were of his erection; and they believe, that he had all along upon his shoulder a point of light, like a star, which was an indelible mark of the gift of prophecy; with many more fictions of the like nature.—Calmet's Dictionary, under the word Joseph.

^a There are several reasons which might induce Joseph not to have his dead body immediately carried into Canaan, and buried, as his father was. 1st, Because his brethren, after his decease, might not have interest enough at court to provide themselves with such things as were necessary to set off the pomp and solemnity of a funeral befitting so great a personage. 2dly, Because he might foresee, that the Egyptians, in all probability, as long as their veneration for his memory was warm, would hardly have suffered his remains to have been carried into another country. 3dly, Because the continuance of his remains among them, might be a means to preserve the remembrance of the services he had done them, and thereby an inducement to them to treat the relations he had left behind him with more kindness. 4thly, And chiefly, because the presence of his body with the Israelites might be a pledge to assure them, and a means to strengthen and confirm their faith and hope in God's promises to their progenitors, that he would infallibly put their posterity in possession of the land of Canaan: and accordingly, when Moses delivered them out of Egypt, he carried Joseph's body along with him, (Exod. xiii. 19.) and committed it to the care of the tribe of Ephraim, who buried it near Shechem, (Josh. xxiv. 32.) in the field which Jacob, a little before his death, gave to Joseph, as his peculiar property.—Pererius' and Patrick's Commentary; Poole's Annotations, and Calmet's Dictionary under the word.

^b The Jewish rabbins have a story, that the Egyptian magicians came and told Pharaoh, that if he had a mind to keep the Hebrews in his dominions, he must hide Joseph's body in some certain place where they should never find it, because it would be impossible for them to go out of Egypt without it; that thereupon his body was put into a chest of 6000 lb. weight, which was sunk in the mud of one of the branches of the river Nile; and that Moses was forced to work a miracle to get it out, and carry it away.—Calmet, ibid.

THE most material objection we have placed last: and because it relates to a passage in Scripture, which is known to have its difficulties, it may not be improper, in order to give it a clear solution, first to cite the passage itself, and then to explain the terms contained in it: 'The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet, until Shiloh come, and unto him shall the gathering of the people be.'

1. Now the word shevet, which we render sceptre, has both a literal and a figurative signification. In its literal, it denotes a rod, a wand, a sceptre, a shepherd's crook, &c., and in its figurative, it either implies the correction and punishment, whereof the rod, or the authority and power, whereof the sceptre is the ensign. It cannot be doubted, I think, but that the word is to be taken in a figurative sense here; and yet it cannot be supposed to signify punishment, because the tribe of Judah was so far from being in a state of affliction, that it always flourished exceedingly, and even in the time of its captivity, enjoyed its own form of government. The word must therefore, in this place, be put for that power and dominion whereof the sceptre, in ancient times, was thought a fitter representation than either the crown or diadem.

2. The word mechokék, which we translate lawgiver, is not synonymous with the former, but has two distinct significations. It sometimes signifies, not a person who has power to make laws himself, but only to teach and instruct others in those laws that are already made: and in this sense it differs very little from the scribes, and doctors, and teachers of the law, whereof there is so much mention made in our Saviour's days. At other times, it denotes a person invested with power and authority even to make laws, but then this authority of his is inferior to that of a king; so that properly he may be called an inferior magistrate or governor set over a people by the license of some monarch, and, by his commission appointed to rule: and in this sense the word should rather be taken here, because there were such governors and deputies set over the Jews, after their return from the Babylonish captivity.

old; and they embalmed him, and he was put in a coffin in Egypt.' When Joseph died he was not only embalmed, but put into a coffin.' This was an honour appropriated to persons of distinction, coffins not being universally used in Egypt. Maillet, speaking of the Egyptian repositories of the dead, having given an account of several niches that are found there, says, 'it must not be imagined, that the bodies deposited in these gloomy apartments were all enclosed in chests, and placed in niches; the greatest part were simply embalmed, and swathed after that manner that every one hath some notion of; after which they laid them one by the side of another, without any ceremony: some were even put into these tombs without any embalming at all, or such a slight one, that there remains nothing of them in the linen in which they were wrapped but the bones, and those half rotten,' (Letter vii. p. 281.) Antique coffins of stone, and sycamore wood, are still to be seen in Egypt. It is said that some were formerly made of a kind of pasteboard, formed by folding and gluing cloth together, a great number of times; these were curiously plastered and painted with hieroglyphics.—Thevenot, part I. p. 137.

A. M. 2276. A. C. 1728; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 3548. A. C. 1863. GEN. CH. xxxvii. TO THE END.

3. The phrase which we render 'between his feet,' according to the modesty of the Scripture expression, means nothing else, but of his seed or posterity; and so the intendment of this part of the prediction must be, that 'the tribe of Judah shall have lawgivers of their own to the very last times.'

4. From whatever radix it is that the word Shiloh is derived, both Jews and Christians are agreed in this, that by the person to whom this title is applied, the patriarch intended the great Saviour of the world, who is called the Messias, or Christ.

5. By Judah here, there is not an absolute necessity to understand the people of that tribe only, but all those likewise who were afterwards called Jews. And,

6. Whether we refer the gathering of the people to the tribe of Judah, as they did in the times of the captivity, or to Shiloh, when he should come, as to the main of the prophecy, there is not a great deal of difference; since the main of the prophecy is,—'That the Messias shall come, before the Jewish government would totally cease.' And therefore the question is, whether there was any form of government subsisting among the Jews, and particularly in the tribe of Judah, at the time when Christ was born?

The form of government which Jacob, upon his death-bed instituted, was that of dividing his family into tribes, and making his own, and the two sons of Joseph, heads over their respective houses. This government was properly aristocratical; but in times of some extraordinary exigence, all authority was devolved in the hands of a judge, who, when the end for which he was appointed was effected, in the same manner as the Roman dictator did, resigned up his power, and became no more than 'one of the princes of the tribes of his fathers.'

The abuse of this judicial power, however, in the hands of Samuel's sons, made the people desirous of a regal government; and in that form it continued, from the time it came into David's hands, who was of the tribe of Judah, for the space of 470 years. The division of the kingdom made a great alteration in the fortunes of the people; for the Assyrian captivity was the ruin of the ten tribes. They lost their government, and from that time never recovered it; but it was not so with the kingdom of Judah, in the Babylonish captivity. ¹ For if we consider that the Jews were carried to Babylon, not to be slaves, but were transplanted as a colony, to people that large city; that they were commanded therefore, ² by the prophet, to 'build houses,' and 'plant gardens,' and to seek the 'peace of the city' in which they were captives; and that, upon the expiration of their seventy years' captivity, many of them were so well settled in ease and plenty, that they refused to return to their own country again. If we consider farther, that the Jews lived at Babylon as a distinct people, and were governed, in their own affairs, by their own elders; that they appointed feasts and fasts, and ordered all other matters relating to their civil and ecclesiastical state among themselves; and that, upon their return from Babylon, they were thought a people considerable enough to be complained of to Artaxerxes; we cannot but conclude, that they made all along a figure far from comporting with the condition of mere slaves, subjected entirely to a foreign yoke, without any law or government of their own.

After the time of this captivity, indeed, the Jews were never so free a people as they had been before. They lived under the subjection of the Persian monarch, and under the empire of the Greeks and Romans, to their last destruction; but still they lived as a distinct people, governed by their own laws; and the authority of the Persian, and other kings over them, destroyed not that rule, which, in all the vicissitudes that befell them, they still possessed.

How the case stood in the time of the Asmonean princes, may be collected from several passages in the Maccabees: and that the like government subsisted, to the very death of Christ, may in like manner be evinced from many instances in the gospel; but one or two of these will be enough to illustrate the thing.

When our Saviour tells the Jews, ³ 'The truth shall make you free,' and they reply, 'We are Abraham's children, and were never in bondage to any man,' surely they had not forgot their captivity in Babylon, much less could they be ignorant of the power of the Romans over them at that time; and yet they accounted themselves free; and so they were, because they lived by their own laws, and executed judgment among themselves. When our Saviour foretels his disciples, that they ⁴ 'should be delivered up to councils, and scourged in the synagogues,' he shows, at the same time, what power and authority were exercised in the councils and synagogues of the Jews: and, to mention but one instance more, when Pilate, willing to deliver Jesus, says to the Jews, ⁵ 'Take ye him, and crucify him;' and again, ⁶ 'Take ye him, and judge him according to your own law;' he likewise shows, that the Jews lived under their own law, and had the exercise of judicial authority among themselves.

By this deduction, it appears evidently that the sceptre, placed in the hand of Judah by his father Jacob just before his death, continued in his posterity till the very death of Christ. From that time all things began to work towards the destruction of the Jewish polity, and within a few years, their city, temple, and government, were utterly ruined, and the Jews not carried into a gentle captivity, to enjoy their laws, and live as a distinct people, in a foreign country; but were sold like beasts in a market, became slaves in the strictest sense, and from that day to this, have neither prince nor lawgiver among them: so that, upon the whole, ⁷ the sense of Jacob's prophecy, with relation to Judah, as it is now fulfilled, may not improperly be summed up in this phrase:—

"The power and authority which shall be established in the posterity of Judah, shall not be taken from them, or at least they shall not be destitute of rulers and governors, (no, not when they are in their declining condition,) until the coming of the Messiah. But when he is come, there shall be no difference between the Jews and Gentiles, who shall be all obedient to the Messiah; and after that, the posterity of Judah shall have neither king nor ruler of their own, but their whole commonwealth shall quite lose all form, and never recover it again.⁷

The bequest which Jacob makes to his son Joseph, runs into this form:—¹ 'Moreover, I have given to thee one portion above thy brethren, which I took out of the hand of the Amorite, with my sword, and with my bow.' But when did we ever read of Jacob's being a military man? His sons indeed invaded Shechem, and took, not from the Amorites, but the Hivites, the adjacent country, as we may suppose; but so far is he from approving of what they did, that to his very dying hour, we find him severely remonstrating against it, and must therefore be supposed too conscientious, either to retain himself, or to consign to his beloved son, a portion of land acquired by such wicked and sanguinary means.

The tract of ground, therefore, which he mentions, must certainly be that² which he purchased of Hamor, the father of Shechem; which he gave Joseph for a burying-place, and where Joseph, in consequence of that donation,³ was afterwards buried, and not in the field of Machpelah, the common repository of most of his ancestors. And to resolve the difficulty of his saying, that he took it from the Amorite by force of arms, when it is manifest that he bought it of Hamor the Hivite, for an hundred pieces of silver, we may observe, that the persons who are called Hivites in one place, may, without any impropriety, be called Amorites in another, forasmuch as the Amorites, being the chief of all the seven nations in Canaan, might give denomination to all the rest, in like manner as all the people of the United Provinces are, from the pre-eminence of that one, commonly called Hollanders: and then, if we can but suppose, that after Jacob's departure from Shechem, for fear of the neighbouring nations, some straggling Amorites came, and seized on the lands which he had purchased, and that he was forced to have recourse to arms to expel the invaders and maintain his right, all the difficulty or seeming repugnance of the passage vanishes.

⁴ Jacob, we allow, was a man of peace, but his sons were warriors; and to them he might the rather give permission to recover the possession of what he had bought, because he looked upon it as an earnest of his posterity's future possession of the whole land.⁵ And though we read nothing in the foregoing history, either of the Amorites invading Jacob's property, or of his expelling them thence; yet this is far from being the only instance of things being said to be done in Scripture,⁶ whose circumstances of time, place, and persons, we find nowhere recorded; and a much easier supposition it is, than to make, as some have done, the sword and the bow, here mentioned, to signify the money wherewith he purchased this small territory.

Jacob is the first, that we read of, who particularly declared the future state of every one of his sons, when he left the world; but it has been an ancient opinion, that the souls of excellent men, the nearer they approach to their departure hence, the more divine they grew, had a clearer prospect of things to come, and (as⁷ Xenophon makes Cyrus speak) at the point of death became prophetic. Though, therefore, the last words which we find our patriarch uttering to his sons, may be rather accounted prophecies than benedictions; yet since the text assures us, that⁸ 'he blessed every one with a separate blessing,' we may fairly infer, that though he found reason to rebuke the three eldest very sharply; yet if his rebukes, and the punishment pronounced against them, had the good effect to bring them to a due sense of their transgressions, it was a blessing to them, though not a temporal one; though, even in this last sense, it cannot be said but that he blessed them likewise, since he assigned each of them a lot in the inheritance of the promised land, which it was in his power to have deprived them of.

However this be,⁹ it is certain that all impartial critics have observed, that the style of these blessings or prophecies, call them which we will, is much more lofty than what we meet with in the other parts of this book; and therefore some have imagined, that Jacob did not deliver these very words, but that Moses put the sense of what he said into such poetical expressions. But to me it seems more reasonable to think, that the spirit of prophecy, now coming upon the good old patriarch, raised his diction, as well as sentiments; even as Moses himself is found to have delivered¹⁰ his benedictions in a strain more sublime than what occurs in his other writings.

It is true, indeed, that in the predictions of the patriarch, as well as in the benedictions of Moses, several comparisons do occur, which are taken from brute animals. Thus Judah is compared to a lion, Issachar to an ass, Dan to a serpent, Benjamin to a wolf, and Naphtali to an hind let loose. But this is so far from being a disparagement to the prophetic spirit, that it is a commendation of it; since, if the lion be a proper emblem of power and strength; if the ass be an image of labour and patience; if the serpent, an hieroglyphic of guile and subtlety; if the wolf, a symbol of violence and outrage; and if a hind let loose be no bad representation of a people loving liberty and freedom; then were these qualities, which nothing but a Divine Spirit could foresee, abundantly specified, as their respective histories show, in the posterity of the several heads of tribes to which they are applied.

And as these comparisons are a kind of testimony of the divine inspiration of the holy patriarch upon this occasion, so are they far from being any diminution of the dignity of the subject he was then treating of; since a man must be a stranger to all compositions of this kind, who is not persuaded, that comparisons taken from the animal world, are, as it were, the sinews and support of what we call the sublime; and who finds not himself less inclined to cavil at Jacob's manner of expression, when he perceives the lofty Homer comparing his heroes so frequently to a lion, a wolf, an ass, a torrent, or a tree, according to the circumstances he places them in, or the different point of light wherein he thinks proper to take them. And I mention it as an argument of the truth and excellency of the Mosaic history, that we find its author adhering to the original simplicity, and pursuing that very method of writing, which was certainly in vogue, when the most ancient books that we know any thing of were composed.

Moses' method of writing, as we have had occasion more than once to take notice, is very succinct; and therefore when he tells us, that upon Joseph's coming into Egypt, and being sold to Potiphar, captain of the guard, he commenced steward of his household, we must not suppose, that there did not a sufficient space of time intervene to qualify him for that office. What therefore some of the Jewish doctors tell us, seems not improbable, namely, that his master, as soon as he bought him, sent him to school, and had him instructed, not in the language only, but in all the learning of the Egyptians. However this be, it is certain that there is no small affinity between the Hebrew and Egyptian tongue; so that a person of good natural parts, and of an age the fittest that could be for learning any thing, might, with a little diligence and application, make himself master of it in a very short time.

Joseph, indeed, as we may observe, talked to his brethren by an interpreter; and that he might do, though the difference between the two tongues was not very great. ¹ A Frenchman, we see, is not understood at first by an Italian or Spaniard, though all the three languages are derived from the same original; but when once he is let into the knowledge of this, and comes to perceive their different formations and constructions, what was foreign to him before, soon becomes familiar. And in like manner, Joseph, with a small matter of instruction, and some observation of his own, might be let into the secret of the Egyptian language, the nature of their accounts, and the customs of the country, and so become every way qualified to give the content, we find he did, in the place to which he was advanced.

² The notion that we have of an eunuch, is a person who has lost his virility; and therefore to assign him a wife, as we find Potiphar had a very naughty one, may seem a manifest incongruity; but for this there is an easy solution to be given. The word Saris indeed denotes equally an 'eunuch,' and any 'court minister;' and the reason of this ambiguity is,—That, as eastern kings, for their greater security, were wont to have slaves, who were castrated, to attend the chambers of their wives and concubines, and upon the proof of their fidelity, did frequently advance them to the other court employments, such as being privy-counsellors, high-chamberlains, captains of their guards, &c., it hence came to pass, that the title of eunuch was conferred on any who were promoted to those posts of honour and trust, even though they were not emasculated. And indeed, when we read, in the books of Kings and Chronicles, so frequent mention made of eunuchs about the person of David, and other Jewish princes, we must be far from supposing, that these were all eunuchs in reality, since it was unlawful, ³ according to their historian, in that nation, to castrate even a domestic animal; and according to the institution of their law, an express prohibition it was, that ⁴ 'he who had his privy members cut off; should not enter into the congregation of the Lord.'

Both the Arabic version, and the Targum of Onkelos, are therefore very right in rendering the word, a prince or minister of Pharaoh: for if we compare the several parts of his history, we shall find, ⁵ that Potiphar had the chief command of the forces that guarded the person and palace-royal; that as such he presided in all courts and causes that had a more immediate relation to these; that he had power under the king, of judging and deciding all cases within those walls, of imprisoning and releasing, of life and death, and of hastening or suspending the execution of capital punishments.

And if Potiphar was a person invested with all this authority, it may seem a little strange, why he did not immediately put Joseph to death; since, had his wife's accusation been true, his crime deserved no less a punishment. But whether it was that Joseph had found means to vindicate himself, by the mediation of the keeper of the prison, who was Potiphar's deputy, though there is no account of it in Scripture; or God, in behalf of the righteous, might interpose to mollify the heart of this great man, and restrain his hand from doing violence, the issue of the matter shows, that he was in a short time convinced of his innocence, or otherwise it cannot be believed that he would have suffered him to be made so easy, and to be invested with so much power in the prison; though at the same time, he might not think proper to release him, for fear, that so public an acquitment might bring disreputation both to his wife and himself.

Joseph could not but foresee, that to live in the palaces of kings, and to accept of high posts and honours, would be very hazardous to his virtue. ⁶ But when he perceived the hand of providence so visible in raising him, by ways and means so very extraordinary, to eminence, and an office wherein he would have it in his power to be beneficial to so very many, he could not refuse the offers which the king made him, without being rebellious to the will and destination of God. To him therefore who had secured him hitherto, he might in this case commit the custody of his innocence, and accept of the usual ensigns of honour, without incurring the censure of vanity or ostentation.

And though, in after ages, all marriages with infidels were certainly prohibited, yet there seems to be at this time a certain dispensation current, forasmuch as Judah to be sure, if not more of Joseph's brethren, had done the same: besides that, in Joseph's case, there was something peculiar. ⁷ For as he was in a strange country, he had not an opportunity of making his addresses to any of the daughters of the seed of Abraham; as the match was of the king's making, he was not at liberty to decline it, without forfeiting his pretensions to the royal favour, and consequently to the means of doing so much good; and as it is not improbable that he might be advised to it by a particular revelation, so it is highly reasonable to believe that he converted his wife, at least to the worship of the true God, before he espoused her: even though there should be nothing in that opinion of the rabbins, that he made a proselyte likewise of her father, the priest of On, who could not but be desirous to purchase at any rate so advantageous an alliance, and took this occasion to establish the rite of circumcision, if not in all Egypt, at least among persons of the sacred order, who, according to the account of those who wrote the history of that country, in very early days certainly were not without it.

Some may imagine, that the better to personate an Egyptian lord, and thereby conceal himself from his brethren, or rather to comply with the language of the court, in this particular, 'Joseph swore by the life of Pharaoh,' in the same manner as the Romans, in adulation to their emperor, were wont to swear by his genius. It must be acknowledged indeed, that, as every oath is a solemn appeal to God, to swear by any creature whatever must needs be an impious and idolatrous act; and therefore the proper solution of this matter is,—not that oaths of this kind were allowable before the institution of Christianity, but that Joseph, in making use of these words, did not swear at all. ¹ For since every oath implies in it either an invocation of some witness, or a postulation of some revenge, as our great Sanderson terms it, to say that Joseph appealed to the life of Pharaoh as a witness is ridiculous; and without a very forced construction indeed, the words can never be supposed to include in them a curse, and therefore their most easy signification must be, what we call indicative: 'By the life of Pharaoh,' that is, as sure and certain as Pharaoh liveth, 'ye are spies,' just as we say, 'By the sun that shines, I speak truth,' that is, as sure as the sun shines; neither of which can with any propriety be called oaths, but only vehement asseverations.

The words which Joseph's steward, sent to apprehend his brethren, makes use of, are, ² 'Is not this the cup in which my lord drinketh, and whereby indeed he divineth?' and the words wherein Joseph accosts them, when they are brought before him, are, ³ 'What deed is this that ye have done? Wot ye not, that such a man as I can certainly divine?' And from hence ⁴ some have imagined, that Joseph was a person addicted to magical arts, and by virtue of this single cup, could discover strange and wonderful things. But in answer to this, others have observed, ⁵ that the word nashah, which we render to divine, was formerly of an indefinite sense, and meant in general to discover, or make a trial of; and accordingly they have devised a double acceptation of the steward's words, as if he should say,—By this cup (viz: left in a careless and negligent manner) my master was minded to make an experiment, whether you were thieves, or honest men; or say,—By this cup, wherein he drinketh, my ^a master discovers and finds out the temper and dispositions of men, when they are in liquor. But both of these senses seem a little too much forced, and are far from agreeing with the other words of Joseph.

It must be acknowledged, therefore, that as magical arts of divers kinds were in use among the Egyptians, many years before Joseph's time of coming thither; and that as Joseph, by his wonderful skill of interpreting dreams, had gained a great reputation for knowledge, and perhaps among the populace, might pass for a diviner, he took an occasion from hence, in order to carry on his design, to assume a character that did not belong to him. There is no reason, however, to infer from the words, that ^b the art of divining by the cup, as it came afterwards to be practised, was then in use in Egypt; ⁶ because the words before us, according to the sense of the best interpreters, do not relate to this cup as the instrument, but as the subject of divination; not as the thing with which, but as the thing concerning which this magical inquiry was to be made. And so the sense of the steward's words will be, 'How could you think, but that my lord, who is so great a man at divination, would use the best of his skill to find out the persons who had robbed him of the cup, which he so much prizes?' And this tallies exactly with the subsequent words of Joseph, 'Wot ye not that such a man as I,' 'I, who have raised myself to this eminence, by my interpretation of dreams, and may therefore well be accounted an adept in all other sciences, should not be long at a loss to know who the persons were that had taken away my cup?' This seems to be the natural sense of the words; the only one, indeed, that they will fairly bear: ⁷ and though they do not imply that Joseph was actually a magician, yet they seem to justify the notions of those men who think, that he carried his dissimulation to his brethren so far, as to make them believe that he really had some knowledge that way.

The royal psalmist, in his description of the sufferings of Joseph, ⁸ tells us, that he was not only sold to be a 'bond-servant,' but that 'his feet were hurt in the stocks, and iron entered into his soul,' which signifies at least that he endured very hard usage, before 'the time came that his cause was known,' and his innocence discovered; and of all this his brethren, when they sold him into slavery, were properly the occasions. So that, could we conceive, that any angry resentments could harbour in a breast so fully satisfied of a divine providence in all this dispensation, we might have imagined that Joseph took this opportunity to retaliate the injuries which were formerly done to him; but this he did not. He desired indeed to be informed in the circumstances of their family, without asking any direct question; and therefore he mentions his suspicion of their being spies, merely to fish out of them, as we call it, whether his aged

^b Julius Serenus tells us, that the method of divining by the cup, among the Assyrians, Chaldees, and Egyptians, was to fill it first with water, then to throw into it thin plates of gold and silver, together with some precious stones, wherein were engraven certain characters; and after that, the persons who came to consult the oracle, used certain forms of incantation, and so calling upon the devil, were wont to receive their answers several ways; sometimes by articulate sounds; sometimes by the characters which were in the cup rising upon the surface of the water, and by their arrangement forming the answer; and many times by the visible appearing of the persons themselves, about whom the oracle was consulted. Cornelius Agrippa, (De Occult. Philos. b. 1. c. 57.) tells us likewise, that the manner of some was, to pour melted wax into the cup, wherein was water, which wax would range itself in order, and so form answers, according to the questions proposed.—Saurin's Dissertation 38; and Heidegger's Hist. ^a What may seem to give some small sanction to this sense, is that known passage in Horace:—"Kings are said to have supplied liberal potatoes to him whom they wished to serutinize, if he was worthy of their friendship."

father, and his younger brother were yet alive. For upon their return, we may perceive, especially considering that it is the first minister of a mighty state that speaks to a company of poor indigent shepherds, a wonderful tenderness in his expressions: ¹ 'Is your father well; the old man of whom you spake, is he still alive?' besides the instructions which he plainly gave his steward to bid them be 'of good cheer.' When he understood that his father and brother were both alive, and as yet had not matters prepared for the removal of his father and family, the eagerness of his affections may perhaps be thought to have carried him a little too far, in demanding his brother to be brought to him; but we are not to doubt but that Joseph, by the Divine Spirit wherewith he was endowed, did certainly foresee what would happen,² and that his father's grieving a little time for Benjamin, would be so far from endangering his health, that it would only increase his joy, when he saw him again, and dispose him the better for the reception of the welcome news of his own advancement in Egypt; which, had it come all upon him at once, and on a sudden, might have been enough to have bereaved him of his senses, if not of his life itself, by a surfeit of joy.

Upon their second dismissal, after a very kind entertainment, it may be thought perhaps a piece of cruelty in Joseph, to have his cup conveyed, of all others, into Benjamin's sack, and thereupon to threaten to make him a bond-slave for a pretended felony: but herein was Joseph's great policy and nicety of judgment. He himself had been severely treated by the rest when he was young, and therefore was minded to make an experiment, in what manner they would now behave towards his brother; whether they would forsake him in his distress, and give him up to be a bond-slave, as they had sold him for one; or whether they would stand by him in all events, make intercession for his release, or adventure to share his fate.

This, perhaps, may be thought, was carrying the matter a little too far: but, without this conduct, Joseph could not have known whether his brethren rightly deserved the favour and protection which he might then design, and afterwards granted them. Without this conduct we had not had perhaps the most lively images that are to be met with in Scripture, of injured innocence, of meekness and forbearance, and the triumphs of a good conscience in him; and of the fears and terrors, the convictions and self-condemnations of long concealed guilt in them. Without this conduct, we had not had this lovely portraiture of paternal tenderness, as well as brotherly affection; we had never had those solemn, sad, and melting words of Jacob, ³ 'If I am bereaved of my children, I am bereaved,' enough to pierce a tender parent's heart; or those words, ⁴ 'Joseph is yet alive, I will see him before I die,' enough to raise it into joy and exultation again. In a word, without this conduct, we had never had that courteous, that moving, that pleasingly mournful speech, wherein Moses makes Judah address Joseph, in behalf of his poor brother Benjamin, which exceeds all the compositions of human invention, and ^a flows indeed from such natural passions, as art can never imitate. So that, upon a review of his whole conduct, Joseph is far from deserving blame, that all this seeming rigour and imperiousness of his did eventually produce a great deal of good; and was in reality no more than the heightening the distress, or thickening the plot, as we call it in a play, to make the discovery, or future felicity he intended his family, more conspicuous and agreeable.

It must be acknowledged, indeed, that Moses has done justice to the history of Joseph, and employed most of the tender passions of human nature to give it a better grace; but we must not therefore infer, either that he hath transcended truth or committed an error, in recording the quality of the persons employed to embalm his father. What has led some into a great mistake concerning the origin of physic, and that it was of no vogue in the world until the days of Hippocrates, was the great superiority of skill and genius which he demonstrated both in his practice and writings. The truth is, the divine old man, as ⁵ one expresses it, did so totally eclipse all who went before him, that as posterity esteemed his works the canon, so did it look upon him as the great father of medicine. But if we will credit the testimony of ⁶ Galen, who, though a late writer, was a very competent judge, we shall find, that he was far from being the first of his profession, even among the Greeks.

Homer, indeed, in his poem of the Trojan war, seems to have cut out more work for surgeons than physicians; and therefore we find the chief of the faculty only employed in healing wounds, extracting arrows, preparing anodynes, and other such like external operations; but if we look into his other work, which is of a more pacific strain, we shall soon discern the use of internal applications, when we find Helen brought in as giving Telemachus a preparation of opium, which, as the poet informs us, she had from Polydama, the wife of Thon, an Egyptian physician of great note. And well might the physicians of Egypt be held in great esteem, "when (as Herodotus relates the matter) every distinct distemper had its proper physician, who confined himself to the study and cure of that only; so that one sort having the cure of the eyes, another of the head, another of the teeth, another of the belly, and another of occult diseases, we need not wonder, that all places were crowded with men of this profession, or that the physicians of Joseph's household should be represented as a large number." True it is indeed, that these physicians, and the very worth our notice and serious consideration. "Since such passages are related by men, who affect no art, and who lived long after the parties who first uttered them, we cannot conceive how all particulars could be so naturally and fully recorded, unless they had been suggested by his Spirit, who gives mouth and speech to man; who, being alike present to all successions, is able to communicate the secret thoughts of fore-fathers to their children, and put the very words of the deceased, never registered before, into the mouths or pens of their successors, for many generations after, and that as exactly and distinctly as if they had been caught, in characters of steel or brass, as they issued out of their mouths; for it is plain every circumstance is here related, with such natural specifications, as he terms it, as if Moses had heard them talk; and therefore could not have been thus represented to us, unless they had been written by his divine direction, who knows all things, as well forepast, as present, or to come."—Dr Jackson on the Creed, b. 1. c. 4.

best of them, were employed in embalming the dead; but then there was a wise designation in this,¹ namely, not only to improve them in the knowledge of anatomy, but to enable them likewise to discover the causes of such disorders as were a baffle to their art. And therefore it was the custom of the kings of Egypt, as Pliny informs us, to cause dead bodies to be dissected, on purpose to find out the origin and nature of all diseases. Thus it appears from the concurring testimony of other historians, that the practice of physic was a common thing in Egypt, as early as the days of Joseph; that the multitude of its professors makes it no strange thing his having a number of them in his family; and that the nature of the thing, as well as the order of the state, obliged the very best of them to become dissectors and embalmers.

This may serve for a vindication of what the sacred historian has related of our patriarch in his private life, and we come now to consider him in his public capacity. As soon as he had foretold the king the long famine that was to befall Egypt, he gave him advice to have the fifth part of the product of the country laid up in store against the ensuing want. The tenth part, according to the constitution of the nation, belonged to the king already, and to advise him to purchase as much more, for seven succeeding years, was to consider him as the public father of his people, for whose support and welfare he was concerned to provide. When himself was appointed to the office of gathering in the corn, he took care, no doubt, to have his granaries in fortified places, and as the scarceness increased, to have them secured by a guard of the king's forces, to prevent insurrections and depredations. When he came to open his store-houses, he sold to the poor and to the rich; and was it not highly reasonable, that he who bought the corn, should likewise sell it? or that the money, which by the king's commission and order, had been laid out for such a stock of provisions against the approaching necessities of his subjects, should return to the king's coffers again, to answer his occasions? When their money was gone, they brought him their cattle; but this they did of their own accord, without any compulsion or circumvention; and might he not as legally exchange corn for cattle, as he did it for money before? His corn he kept up perhaps at a high rate; but had he sold it cheap, or given it gratis, the people, very likely, would have been profuse and wanton in the consumption of it; whereas his great care and concern was, to make it hold out the whole time of the famine. He obliged the inhabitants of one city and district to remove, or make room for those of another; but this he might do, not so much to show their subjection to Pharaoh, as to secure the public peace, by disabling them in this way from entering into any seditious measures and combinations.

It cannot be imagined, indeed, but that, in a time of such general want and calamity, men's minds would be ripe for rapine, violence, and mutiny; and yet we meet with no one commotion, during the whole period of his critical ministry; which bespeaks the skill of the mariner, when he is found able to steer steady in the midst of so tumultuous a sea. In fine, after he had a long while executed his high trust, and the years of famine were come to a conclusion, he gave the people back their liberties and estates, reserving to the king no more than a double tenth out of the produce of their lands, as a tribute of their vassalage; which, considering the richness of the soil, and the little pains required in cultivating it, was an imposition far from being burdensome to the subject, or vastly disproportionate to the benefit they had received.^a

There is but one thing more that I find objected to Joseph, in this public station,¹ and that is, his favour and indulgence to the priests, and priests that were idolaters, in sparing their lands, and laying no tax upon them.

The Jewish doctors have a tradition, that when Joseph was in prison, and his master had bad designs against him, it was by the interest of the priests that he was set free, and that, consequently, in gratitude, he could not do less than indulge them with some particular marks of his favour, when he came into such a compass of power. But there is no occasion for any such fiction as this.² The priests of Egypt were taken out of the chief families of the nation; they were persons of the first quality;

^a Lord Shaftesbury's Characteristics, vol. 3. Miscel. 3.

² Shuckford's Connection, vol. 2. b. 7.

^a This is rather a feeble attempt to vindicate the conduct of Joseph as viceroy of Egypt; but fortunately that conduct stands in need of no other vindication, than to be fairly stated. If credit be due to Diodorus Siculus, all the land of Egypt was, prior to this period, divided, in equal shares, among the king, the priesthood, and army. The people therefore must have been, from the beginning, adscriptitii glebæ; and they were not likely to suffer by being transferred with the soil, which they cultivated, from the vassalage in which they had hitherto been held by a fierce soldiery to the common sovereign and father of his people. But let us suppose, that Diodorus was mistaken, and that not the army but the people at large, shared the soil in equal portions with the king and the priests. Even on this supposition they were gainers by the new regulation of Joseph; for they henceforth enjoyed four-fifths of two-thirds of the produce of the whole kingdom, instead of one-third as formerly. Indeed whatever was the state of the Egyptians before this famine, it was happy for them that the minister, whom they acknowledged to have saved their lives, was not on that occasion influenced by modern notions of civil and political liberty.—“By the policy of Joseph, the whole of the land of Egypt, not occupied by the priests, became the property of the sovereign, and the people with their children his slaves; an event, which, however unpropitious it might be in any other country, was necessary there, where every harvest depended on the Nile, and where the equal distribution of its waters could alone produce a general cultivation. When the lands of Egypt were private property, would it be possible to induce individuals to sacrifice their own possessions, that they might be turned into canals for the public benefit? or, when the canals were constructed, would it be possible to prevent the inhabitants of the upper provinces from drawing off more water than was requisite for their own use, and thereby injuring the cultivators lower down? But when the whole belonged to one man, the necessary canals would be constructed; the distribution of water would be guided by prudence; each district would receive its necessary proportion; and the collateral branches would then, as they are now, be opened only when the height of the river justified such a measure for the public benefit.” (Lord Valentia's Travels, vol. 3, p. 348.)—Our author's supposition, that the people who had sold their lands to preserve their lives, were transplanted into cities far from their former places of abode, that they might, in time, lose the remembrance of their ancient possessions, is a groundless dream. Granaries were formed, and cities and villages built in every district of the kingdom; and when cultivation ceased, the people were transplanted, for the easiness of distribution, from the country into such of those cities as were nearest to them; and when the famine ceased, they were sent back, with seed to sow their former fields.

were consulted upon all affairs of consequence; and, upon a vacancy, generally some one of them succeeded to the crown. It was not likely, therefore, that persons of their high rank and station wanted Joseph's assistance to strengthen their interest, for the obtaining of any immunities; nor is it apparent that they had it. On the contrary, it seems evident from the text, that whatever peculiar favours they were vouchsafed, proceeded all, not from Joseph's good-will, but from the king's immediate direction and appointment; for the 'land of the priests bought he not,' says Moses, (ci chok le cohanim meeth Pharaoh) because Pharaoh had made a decree expressly against it, or, in analogy to our translation, 'because there was an appointment for the priests, even from Pharaoh; and the portion, which he gave them, they did eat, and therefore sold not their lands.'

Why Pharaoh, when he thought fit to lessen the property of his common subjects, did not, at the same time, attempt to reduce the exorbitant riches of the priests, we may in some measure account for, if we consider, that according to the constitution of the kingdom, the Egyptian priests were obliged to provide all sacrifices, and to bear all the charges of the national religion, which, in those days, was not a little expensive; so very expensive, that we find, in those countries where the soil was not fruitful, and consequently the people poor, men did not well know how to bear the burden of religion; and therefore Lycurgus, when he reformed the Lacedemonian state, instituted sacrifices, the meanest and cheapest that he could think of. But Egypt, we know, was a rich and fertile country, and therefore, in all probability, the king and people being desirous that religion should appear with a suitable splendour, made settlements upon the priests from « the very first institution of government among them, answerable to the charges of their function. Add to this, that the priests of Egypt were the whole body of the nobility of the land; that they were the king's counsellors and assistants in all the affairs which concerned the public; ¹ were joint agents with him in some things, and in others, his directors and instructors. Add again, that they were the professors and cultivators of astronomy, geometry, and other useful sciences; that they were the keepers of the public registers, memoirs, and chronicles of the kingdom; and, in a word, that, under the king, they were the supreme magistrates, and filled all prime offices of honour and trust: and considering them under these views, we may possibly allow, that Pharaoh might think that they had not too much to support the station they were to act in, and for that reason, ordered that no tax should be raised upon them.

Thus we have endeavoured to clear the sacred history from all imputations of improbability or absurdity, as well as Joseph's conduct, both private and public, from all unjust censure, during this period of time; and may now produce the testimony of several heathen writers, in confirmation of many particulars related herein.

^a It is the opinion of some, that Mizraim, the founder of the Egyptian monarchy, might, in memory of some Noachical tradition, set apart, at the very first, a maintenance for the priesthood, however degenerate and corrupt. Be this as it will, it is certain, that, in process of time, their allotment increased to such a degree, that they became possessors of one-third part of the whole land, according to Diodorus, b. 1.

That the memory of Joseph, and of the wonderful benefits he did, during the time of his administration, was preserved among the Egyptians, under the worship of Apis, Serapis, and Osiris; that the Egyptian manner of interpreting dreams was taken from what occurs in his history; and that the Charistia, mentioned by ² Valerius and ³ Ovid, namely, festival entertainments, either for confirming friendship, or renewing it when broken, were transcripts of the feast which Joseph made for his brethren, is the general opinion of such learned men as have made the deepest inquiry into these matters.

That the patriarch Jacob went down with his whole family into Egypt, where he found his son Joseph in great power and prosperity, is reported by several pagan writers, who are cited ⁴ by Eusebius; that the Egyptians, according to what Moses tells of them, had an unaccountable antipathy to shepherds, especially foreigners, is related ⁵ by Herodotus; that the priests in that country enjoyed several high privileges, and were exempted from paying all taxes and public imposts, is every where apparent ⁶ from Diodorus; and that Joseph was just such a person as Moses has represented him, the testimony ⁷ of Justin, with which we conclude the patriarch's story, is enough to convince us. "Joseph, the youngest of his brethren," says he, "had a superiority of genius, which made them fear him, and sell him to foreign merchants, who carried him into Egypt, where he practised the magic art with such success as rendered him very dear to the king. He had a great sagacity in the explanation of prodigies and dreams; nor was there any thing so abstruse, either in divine or human knowledge, that he did not readily attain. He foretold a great dearth, several years before it happened, and prevented a famine's falling upon Egypt, by advising the king to publish a decree, requiring the people to make provision for divers years. His knowledge, in short, was so great, that the Egyptians listened to the prophecies coming from his mouth, as if they had proceeded, not from man, but from God himself."

^b Nay, upon the supposition that the whole book were a dramatic composition, this would not invalidate the proofs which we have from Scripture, of the real existence of this holy patriarch, or the truth of his exemplary story. On the contrary, it much confirms them; seeing it was the general practice of dramatic writers, of the serious kind, to choose any illustrious character, and well known story, in order to give the piece its due dignity and efficacy; and yet, what is very surprising, the writers on both sides, as well those who hold the book of Job to be dramatical, as those who hold it to be historical, have fallen into this paralogism, that, if dramatical, then the person and history of Job is fictitious: which nothing but their inattention to the nature of a dramatic work, and to the practice of dramatic writers, could have occasioned.—H'arburton's Divine Legation, vol. 3. b. 6.

fore when, in the Old Testament, we find Job put in company with Noah and Daniel, and equally distinguished for his righteousness, as in the New he is commended for his patience, we cannot well suppose that the Spirit of God, in both these places, intended to delude us with a phantom, instead of presenting us with a real man.

Whether we allow that the book of Job is of divine revelation or not, we cannot but perceive, that it has in it all the lineaments of a real history; since the name, the quality, the country of the man, the number of his children, the bulk of his substance, and the pedigree of his friends, together with the names and situations of several regions, can give us the idea of nothing else; though it must not be dissembled, that in the introduction more especially, there is an allegorical turn given to some matters, which, as they relate to spiritual beings, would not otherwise so easily affect the imagination of the vulgar.

The character which God himself gives of Abraham is this, ³ 'I know him that, he will command his children, and his household after him, and that they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment;' which may well afford another argument for Job's being descended from the house of Abraham, since we find dispersed everywhere in his speeches, ⁴ such noble sentiments of creation and providence, of the nature of angels and the fall of man, of punishments for sin and justification by grace, of a redemption, resurrection, and final judgment,—notions which he could never have struck out from the light of nature, but must have had them originally from the instruction of his parents, as they successively derived them from the first 'father of the faithful,' who had them immediately from God. But, what is an undoubted matter of fact, by his wife Keturah, ⁵ Abraham had a son, whose name was Shuah; and therefore when we read of ⁶ Bildad the Shuhite, we may well suppose, that he was a descendant from that family; who living in the neighbourhood perhaps, might think himself obliged by the ties of consanguinity, to go and visit his kinsman, in such sad circumstances of distress.

In what part of the world the land of Uz lay, various opinions have been started, according to the several families from whence Job is made to descend; but, upon supposition that he sprung from one of Keturah's sons, his habitation is most properly placed in that part of Arabia Deserta which has to the north, Mesopotamia and the river Euphrates; to the west, Syria, Palestine, and Idumea; and to the south, the mountains of the Happy Arabia. And this description receives some farther confirmation from the mention which the history makes of the Chaldeans and Sabæans plundering his estate, who were certainly inhabitants in these parts.

In what age of the world this great exemplar of suffering lived, the difference of opinions is not small, even though there be some criterions to direct our judgment in this matter. ⁷ That Job lived in the world much earlier than has been imagined, is, in some measure, evident from his mentioning with abhorrence, that ancient kind of idolatry, the adoration of the sun and moon, and yet passing by in silence the Egyptian bondage, which, upon one occasion or other, could have hardly escaped the notice either of him or his friends, had it not been subsequent to their times. That he lived in the days of the patriarchs therefore is very probable, from the long duration of his life, which, continuing an hundred and forty years after his restoration, could hardly be less in all than two hundred; a longer period than either Abraham or Isaac reached. That he lived before the law, may be gathered from his making not so much as one allusion to it through the whole course of his life, and from his offering, even with God's order and acceptance, such sacrifices in his own country as were not allowable after the promulgation of the law, to be offered in any other place, but that ⁸ 'which the Lord had chosen in one of the tribes of Israel;' and that he lived after Jacob may be inferred from the character given him by God, namely, that for uprightness and the fear of God, there was none 'like unto him upon the earth,' which large commendation could not be allowed to any whilst Jacob, God's favourite servant, was alive; nor can we suppose it proper to be given to any, even while Joseph lived, who, in moral virtues and other excellencies, made as bright a figure as any in his time. ⁶

^a At the end of the Greek, the Arabic, and Vulgate versions of Job, we have this account of his genealogy, which is said to have been taken from the ancient Syriac:—"Job dwelt in Ausitis, upon the confines of Idumea and Arabia. His name at first was Jobab. He married an Arabian woman, by whom he had a son called Emon. For his part, he was the son of Zerah, of the posterity of Esau, and a native of Bozrah; so that he was the fifth from Abraham. He reigned in Edom, and the kings before him reigned in this order:—Balak, the son of Beor, in the city of Dinhabah; and after him, Job, otherwise called Jobab. Job was succeeded by Husham, prince of Teman; after him reigned Hadad, the son of Bedad, who defeated the Midianites in the field of Moab. Job's friends, who came to visit him, were Eliphaz, of the posterity of Esau, king of Teman; Bildad, king of the Shuhites; and Zophar, king of the Naamahites." According to this account, Job must be contemporary with Moses, and the three friends who came to see him must be kings. But the learned Spanheim, who has examined this matter to the bottom, finds reason to think, that Job was a distinct person from Jobab; was sprung from Abraham by his wife Keturah; and lived several years before the time of Moses.—Cabmet's Dictionary, on the word Job; and Spanheim's Life of him.

^b The Rev. Dr Hales, from a variety of historical and astronomical deductions, calculates the time of Job's trial as happening B. C. 2337, or 818 years after the deluge, 184 years before the birth of Abraham, 474 years before the settlement of Jacob's family in Egypt, and 689 years before their departure from that country. Taking this view of the era of Job—and it is the best supported of any yet advanced—the deduction in the text from the words, 'and there was none like unto him upon the earth,'

Thus may the computation be reduced to a very narrow compass; and though it be extremely difficult to point out the precise time, yet the general opinion is, that he lived in the time of the children of Israel's bondage, and therefore his birth is placed in the very same year wherein Jacob went down into Egypt, and the beginning of his trial in the year when Joseph died; ¹ though it might probably be less liable to exception, if his birth were set a little lower, much about the time of Jacob's death; and then Joseph, who survived his father about four and fifty years, will be dead about sixteen years, at which time Job might justly deserve the extraordinary character which God gave him, and have no man then alive, in virtue and integrity, able to compare with him.

How considerable a figure Job made in the world, both in temporal and spiritual blessings, the vastness of his stock, which was the wealth of that age, consisting of seven thousand sheep, three thousand camels, five hundred yokes of oxen, and five hundred she-asses; the largeness of his family, consisting of seven sons and three daughters; and the excellency of the character which God was pleased to give him, together with the greatness of his sentiments, and the firmness and constancy of his mind in all he suffered, are a sufficient demonstration: and yet we see, that as soon as God submitted him to the assaults of his spiritual enemy, what a sad catastrophe did befall him. The Sabaeans ran away with his asses; the Chaldeans plundered him of his camels; a fire from heaven consumed his sheep and servants; a wind overwhelmed all his children; and while the sense of these losses lay heavy upon his spirits, his body was smitten with a sore disease, insomuch that he who but a few hours before, was the greatest man in the country, in whose 'presence the young men were afraid to appear, and before whom the aged stood up,' to whom princes paid the most awful reverence, and whom nobles, in humble silence, admired; divested of all honour, sits mourning on a bed of ashes, and instead of royal apparel, has ² 'his flesh clothed,' as himself expresses it, 'with worms and clods of earth,' and is all overspread with sores and ulcers.

According to the symptoms which Job gives us of himself, his distemper seems to have been a leprosy, but a leprosy of a more malignant kind, as it always is in hot countries, than our climate, blessed be God, is acquainted with; and those who would have it to be a malady of a more opprobrious name, lose all the sting of the sarcasm, when they are told, that this distemper, be it what it will, was not of Job's contraction, but of Satan's infliction, not the effect or consequence of his vice, but the means appointed for the trial of his virtue.

Their opinion, however, seems to be well founded, who make this distemper of Job not one simple malady, but a complication of many. For since the great enemy of mankind, saving his life, had a full license to try his patience to the uttermost, it is not to be questioned but that he played all his batteries upon him; and accordingly we may observe, that ³ besides the blains pustulated to afflict his body, the devil not only instigated his wife "to grieve his mind, but disturbed his imagination likewise to terrify his conscience. For when the holy man complains, ⁴ 'Thou scarest me with dreams, and terrifiest me with visions,' the analogy of the history will not suffer us to interpret, that God himself did inject these affrightening dreams, but that the devil, to whose temptations he had submitted him, did raise gloomy thoughts, and frame horrid and ghastly objects in his imagination, thereby to urge him to melancholy and despair.

How long this load of various calamity lay upon him, is nowhere mentioned in Scripture; and therefore since it is submitted to conjecture, they who, to magnify the sufferings, prolong the duration of them to a year, and, as some do, to seven, ⁵ seem to be regardless of the tender mercies of the Lord; especially when there are some circumstances in the story, which certainly do countenance a much shorter time. The news of the misfortunes which attended his goods and family, came close upon the heels of one another, and we cannot suppose a long space before he was afflicted in his body. ⁶ His three friends seem to have been his near neighbours; and they came to visit him, as soon as they heard of the ill news, which usually flies apace. When they saw his misery, seven days they sat with him in silence; after this, they entered into a discourse with him, and at the end of this discourse, which could not well last above another week, God healed his sores before his friends who being men of eminence in their country, may be supposed to have business at home, as soon as this melancholy occasion was over) were parted from him.

a Some of the Jewish doctors imagine, that Dinah, the daughter of Leah, was this wife of Job's; but this seems to be a mere fiction. The moroseness and impiety of the woman, as well as the place of her habitation, do no ways suit with Jacob's daughter; and therefore the more probable opinion is, that his wife was an Arabian by birth, and that though the words which we render 'curse God and die,' may equally bear a quite contrary signification, yet are they not here to be taken in the most favourable sense, because they drew from her meek and patient husband so severe an imprecation, 'Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh. What! shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?' (Job ii. 10).—Spanheim's History of Job, c. 6.

b Eliphaz, the Temanite, was the grandson of Esau, and son of Teman, who dwelt in a city of the same name in Idumea, not far from the confines of Arabia Deserta. Bildad, the Shuhite, was descended from Shuah, the son of Abraham and Keturah. It is almost impossible to find out who Zophar the Naamathite was, though some will have him descended from Esau; but as for Elihu, who comes in afterwards, he was the grandson of Buz, the son of Nahor; lived in the southern parts of Mesopotamia; and upon the supposition of Job's being sprung from Abraham, was his distant relation.—Spanheim's Life of Job, c. 11.

that he must have lived after Jacob, because such "large commendation could not be allowed to any whilst Jacob, God's favourite servant, was alive," cannot hold, but must rather be applied to prove, that he lived before Jacob, or any of the patriarchs of Israel. It may be observed, however, that, according to scripture idiom, the passage may be construed to signify merely, that there was none like Job in the land of Uz. Among other reasons for assigning to Job the high antiquity given him by Dr Hales, may be mentioned the following: He is silent respecting the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, which cities lay near Idumea, where the scene of his sufferings is laid. He lived to a patriarchal age, surviving his trial 140 years, while he must have been old when that took place. The manners and customs described correspond critically with all that is known of that early period. But, above all, the astronomical allusions of Job have enabled astronomers to determine his era (as given above) by calculating the precession of the equinoxes.—Ed.

Now, since all this may be included in the space of a month, and a month may be thought time enough for God to have made trial of his faithful servant; when once such trial was made, we have reason to believe, that he would withdraw his heavy hand, because his character in Scripture is, that ¹ 'he doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men.'

The unaccountable greatness of Job's calamities had led his friends into a misconception of him, and made them surmise, that it must be the vindictive hand of God, either for some deep hypocrisy, or some secret enormity, that fell so heavy upon him; and therefore Eliphaz, in three orations, Bildad in as many, and Zophar in two, argue from common topics, that such afflictions as his could come from no hand but God's; and that it was inconsistent with his infinite justice to afflict without a cause, or punish without guilt; and thereupon charging Job with being either a grievous sinner, or a great hypocrite, they endeavoured by all means to extort a confession from him. But Job, conscious of his sincerity to God, and innocence to man, confidently maintains his integrity; and in speeches returned to every one of theirs, refutes their wicked suggestions, and reproves their injustice and want of charity; but always observes a submissive style and reverence when he comes to speak of God, of whose secret end, in permitting this trial to come upon him, being ignorant, he often begs a release from life, lest the continuance of his afflictions should drive him into impatience.

During these arguments between Job and his friends, there was present a young man, named Elihu, who having heard the debates on both sides, and disliking both their censoriousness, and Job's justification of himself, undertakes to convince them both, by arguments drawn from God's unlimited sovereignty and unsearchable wisdom, that it was not inconsistent with his justice to lay his afflictions upon the best and most righteous of the sons of men; and that therefore, when any such thing came upon them, their duty was to bear it without murmuring, and to acknowledge the divine goodness in every dispensation.

When every one had spoken what he thought proper, and there was now a general silence in the company, the Lord himself took up the matter, and out of a whirlwind directed his speech to Job; wherein with the highest amplifications, describing his omnipotence in the formation and disposition of the works of the creation, he so effectually convinced him of his inability to understand the ways and designs of God, that with the profoundest humility he breaks out into this confession and acknowledgment: 'Behold, ² I am vile, what shall I answer thee? I will lay my hand upon my mouth. Once have I spoken, but I will not answer: yea twice, but I will proceed no farther.' This acknowledgment pleased God so well, that he declared himself in favour of Job against his injurious friends, and hereupon putting an end to his sufferings, ^a cured him of all his grievances, and rewarded his faith and piety, with a portion of earthly felicity, double to what he had before, and with the prolongation of his life, beyond the common extent of those times.

This is a brief analysis of the book of Job: and whoever looks into it with a little more attention, will soon perceive, that the author of it, whoever he was, ³ has put in practice all the beauties of his art, to make the four persons, whom he brings upon the stage, keep up each his proper character, and maintain the opinions which they were engaged to defend; will soon perceive, that for its loftiness of style, and sublimeness of thoughts, for its liveliness and energy of expression, for the variety of its characters, the fineness of its descriptions, and the grandeur of its imagery, there is hardly such another composition to be found in all the records of antiquity, which has raised the curiosity of all ages to find out the person who might possibly be the author of it.

Some have imagined, that as it has been no uncommon thing in all ages, for persons of distinction to write their own memoirs, Job himself, or some of his friends at least, who bore a part in the series of this history, might set about the inditing it, if not for any other reason, at least in compliance to his request. ⁴ 'Oh that my words were now written, that they were printed in a book!' But though some family records may possibly be kept of events so remarkable as those that occur in Job's life, ^b yet the poetical turn which is given to the latter part of the book more especially, seems to savour of a more modern composition than suits with the era wherein we suppose Job to have lived.

Others therefore suppose, that the story of Job was at first a plain narrative, written in the Arabian tongue, but that Solomon, or some other poetical genius like him, gave it a dramatic cast; and in order to make the subject more moving, introduced a set of persons speaking alternately, and always in character. But though this was certainly the mode of writing then in vogue, yet how there came so much of the Arabian and Syrian dialect to creep into a book that was composed at a time when the Hebrew tongue was in its very height of perfection, we cannot conceive; nor can we be persuaded, but that, in perfectly cured, and restored to health again.—Calmel's Dictionary under the word Job.

^b St Jerome, in his preface to the book of Job, informs us, that the verse, in which it is chiefly composed, is heroic. From the beginning of the book, to the third chapter, he says, it is prose; but from Job's words, 'Let the day perish wherein I was born, &c.,' (chap. iii. 3.) unto these words, 'Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes,' (chap. xlii. 6.) the verses are hexameter, consisting of dactyls and spondees, like the Greek verses of Homer, and the Latin of Virgil. Marianus Victorius, in his note upon this passage of St Jerome, says, that he has examined the book of Job, and finds St Jerome's observation to be true. Only we must observe, that the several sentences directing us to the several speakers, such as these, 'Moreover, the Lord answered Job and said,' (chap. xl. 1.) 'Elihu also proceeded and said,' (chap. xxxvi. 1.) 'Elihu spake moreover and said,' (chap. xxxv. 1, &c.) are in prose and not in verse. St Jerome makes this farther remark, that the verses in the book of Job do not always consist of dactyls and spondees, but that other feet do frequently occur instead of them; that we often meet in them a word of four syllables, instead of a dactyl and spondee; and that the measure of the verses frequently differs in the number of the syllables of the several feet, but allowing two short syllables to be equal to one long, the sums of the measure of the verses are always the same.—Shuckford's Connection, vol. 2. b. 9.

^a The eastern people have a tradition, that upon God's proposing to make no farther trial of Job, the angel Gabriel descended from heaven, took him by the hand, raised him from the place where he was, struck the ground with his foot, and caused a fountain of the purest water to spring out of it, where Job having washed his body, and drank a cup or two of it, found himself reading the whole, we taste an antiquity superior to that of David or Solomon's time. And yet, this notwithstanding,¹ some have endeavoured to bring down the author of the book of Job to the times of the Babylonish captivity, and suppose the book to have been written for the consolation of the captives in distress. But if we suppose it written for the sake of the Jews, is it not strange, that in a discourse of such a kind, there should not be one single word of the law of Moses, nor so much as one distant allusion to any rite or ceremony of it, or to any of the forms of idolatry, for which the Jews suffered in the time of their captivity? The Jews, I say, certainly suffered for their iniquity; but the example of Job is the example of an innocent man, suffering for no demerit of his own. Now apply this to the Jews in their captivity, and the book contradicts all the prophets before, and at the time of their captivity, and seems to be calculated, as it were, to harden the Jews in their sufferings, and to reproach the providence of God for bringing them upon them. Without troubling ourselves therefore to examine, whether the conjectures of these,² who carry the date of this book even lower than the captivity, and impute it³ to Ezra, that ready scribe in the law of Moses, as he is styled, have any good foundation to support them, we may sit down contented with what is the common, and as far as I can see, as probable an opinion as any, namely, that⁴ Moses, as soon as God put it in his heart to visit his people, either while he continued in Egypt, or while he lived in exile in Midian, either translated this book from Arabic, in which some suppose it was originally, or wrote it entirely by a divine inspiration for the support and consolation of his countrymen the Jews, groaning under the pressure of the Egyptian bondage; that by a proper example, he might represent the design of providence in afflicting them, and at the same time give them assurance of a release and restoration in due time.

This is what most of the Jews, and several Christian writers have affirmed, and believed, concerning the book of Job; but the author from whom I have compiled a great part of this dissertation, has by several arguments, hardly surmountable, gone a great way to destroy the received opinion, and left nothing to depend on but this,—That the writer of this book was a Jew, and assisted therein by the Spirit of God; that it has always been esteemed of canonical authority; is fraught with excellent instructions; and, above all, is singularly adapted to administer comfort in the day of adversity. Not to quit therefore this subject without an exhortation to this purpose,⁵ 'Ye have heard of the patience of Job,' says the apostle, 'and have seen the end of the Lord:' and, therefore,⁶ when we find our spirits begin to flag under the sense of any affliction, or bodily pain; when our patience begins to be tired with sufferings, which are greater than we can bear, and our trust in God to be shaken, because he pours down his judgments upon us; let us enliven our fainting courage, by setting before us such noble patterns as this; and let us be ashamed to sink under our burdens, in their weight far disproportionate to those, which a man made of the same flesh and blood as we are, and supported by no other helps than are afforded us, without murmuring against God, without lessening his confidence in him, without impeaching his justice, and without desponding of his goodness, both patiently endured, and triumphantly overcame.

SECT. V.

CHAP. I.—The sufferings of the Israelites, and the means of their Deliverance out of Egypt.

THE HISTORY.

Not long after the death of Joseph, there happened a revolution in Egypt, and a new king, who had no knowledge of the great services which Joseph had done the crown, perceiving the vast increase of the Israelites, began to fear, that in case of an invasion, they possibly might side with the enemy, and depose him; and therefore he called a council, wherein it was resolved, not only to^a impose heavy taxes upon the people, but to confine them likewise to the hard labour of bearing burdens, and digging clay, making bricks, and^b building strong cities

^a The original words, sare massim, which we translate task-masters, do properly signify tax-gal'ers, and the burdens are afterwards mentioned as distinct things, under another name; so that the resolution in council was, both to lay heavy tributes upon them to impoverish, and heavy burdens to weaken them. Philo, in his life of Moses, tells us, that they were made to carry burdens above their strength, and to work night and day, that they were forced at the same time to be workers and servers both; that they were employed in brick-making, digging, and building; and that if any of them dropped down dead under their burdens, they were not suffered to be buried. Josephus in his Jewish Antiquities, (b. 2. c. 9.) tells us in like manner, that they were compelled to learn several laborious trades, to build walls round cities, to dig trenches and ditches, to drain rivers into channels, and cast up dykes and banks to prevent inundations. And not only so, but that they were likewise put upon the erection of fantastical pyramids, which were vast piles of building, raised by the kings of Egypt in testimony of their splendour and magnificence, and to be repositories of their bodies when dead. Thus, by three several ways, the Egyptians endeavoured to bring the Israelites under; by exacting a tribute of them, to lessen their wealth; by laying heavy burdens upon them, to weaken their bodies; and by preventing, by this means, as they imagined, their generating and increasing.

^b The two cities here mentioned, namely, Pithom and Raamses, are said, in our translation, to be treasure-cities, but not places where the king reposed his riches, but rather his grain or corn: for such repositories seem to have been much in use among the Egyptians ever since the introduction of them by Joseph. Considering, however, the name and situation of these two cities, that Pithom, according to Sir John Marsham, was the same with Pelasium, the most ancient fortified place in Egypt, called by Ezekiel, (xxx. 15.) 'the strength of Egypt;' and by Suidas, long after him, 'the key of Egypt,' as being the inlet from Syria; and that Raamses, in all probability, was a frontier town which lay in the entrance of Egypt from Arabia, or some of the neighbouring countries; it seems hardly consistent with good policy to have granaries, or store cities in any other than the inland parts of a country; and therefore, as these were situated in the out parts of Egypt, it is much more likely that they were fortified places, surrounded with walls, and towers, and deep ditches, which would cost the Hebrews an infinite deal of labour in building, than that they were repositories, either for corn or treasure.—Patrick's Commentary, and Wells's Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 2.

for the king; thereby to impoverish their spirits, as well as wear out and enfeeble their bodies.

This resolution of council was soon put in execution, and task-masters accordingly set over the people, who should keep them to drudgery, and use them with cruelty, and do all they could, in short, to make their lives miserable; but such was the goodness of God to them, that the more they were oppressed, the ^a more they multiplied; insomuch that the king, finding that this expedient would not do, sent for two of the most eminent of their midwives, whose names were Shiphrah and Puah, and gave them strict charge, that whenever they were called to do their office to any Hebrew woman, they should privately strangle the child, ^b if it was a male, and leave only the ^c females alive. But they abhorring such a cruel and impious practice, had no regard to the king's command,

^a Commentators observe, that in this passage of Scripture, where Moses describes the vast increase of the Israelites, he employs a great variety of words in expressing it; and because the words he makes use of are six in all, some of the Hebrew expositors have thence concluded, that the women brought forth six children at a birth, Aristotle, indeed, in his history of animals, (b. 7. c. 4.) tells us that the country of Egypt, where the Hebrew women bred so plentifully, was so strangely prolific, that some of their women, at four times, brought twenty children. But without having recourse to such prodigious births as happened but seldom, we need but suppose, that the Israelites, both men and women, were very fruitful; that they began soon, and continued long in begetting; and then there will be no impossibility for 70 males, in the compass of 215 years, to have multiplied to the number specified, even at the rate of one child every year. For according to Simler's computation, 70 persons, if they beget a child every year, will, in 30 years' time, have above 2000 children; of which, admit that one third part only did come to procreate, in 30 years more, they will amount to 9000. The third of them will, in 30 years more, be multiplied to 55,000; and, according to this calculation, in 210 years, the whole amount will be at least 2,760,000. So that, if there was any thing miraculous or extraordinary in all this, it was, that they should be able to multiply at that rate, notwithstanding their hard labour and cruel bondage.—Patrick's Commentary, and Universal History, b. 1. c. 7.

^b Josephus tells us, that there was a certain scribe, as they called him, a man of great credit for his predictions, who told the king, that there was a Hebrew child to be born about that time, who would be a scourge to the Egyptians, and advance the glory of his own nation, and if he lived to grow up, would be a man eminent for virtue and courage, and make his name famous to posterity; and that by the counsel and instigation of this scribe it was, that Pharaoh gave the midwives orders to put all the Hebrew male children to death.—Jewish Antiquities, b. 2. c. 9.

^c For this distinction in his barbarity the king might have several reasons. As, 1. To have destroyed the females with the males had been an unnecessary provocation and cruelty, because there was no fear of the 'women's joining to the king's enemies, and fighting against him.' 2. The daughters of Israel exceeded very much their own women in beauty, and all advantages of person; and therefore their project might be to have them preserved for the gratification of their lust. Philo tells us, that they were preserved to be married to the slaves of the Egyptian lords and gentry, that the children descended from them might be slaves even by birth. But suppose they were married to freemen, they could have no children but such as would be half Egyptians, and in time be wholly ingrafted into that nation. But, 3. Admitting they married not at all, yet as the female sex, among the Hebrews, made a very considerable figure in Egypt for their sense and knowledge, the care of their families, and application to business, and for their skill and dexterity in many accomplishments that were much to be valued for the use and ornament of life, such as the distaff and the loom, dyeing, painting, embroidering, &c., such women as these would make excellent servants and domestics for the Egyptian ladies, who had no relish of spending their time any other way than in idleness and pleasure.—Bibliotheca Biblica in locum.

but saved male and female alike; and when the king sent for them, and reprimanded them for their disobedience, they had this answer in readiness:—^d That the Hebrew women being of a much stronger constitution than the Egyptian, were generally delivered before they came.

This was a piece of service not unacceptable to God, but to Pharaoh it seemed no more than a mere evasion; and therefore resolving upon a more effectual method to extirpate the Hebrews, he published an edict, wherein he commanded all their male children to be thrown into the river; and that they might be more subject to the inspection of his searchers, ^e he built them houses, and obliged them to live in settled habitations.

Some years before this edict, Amram, who was of the ^d It is generally supposed that the midwives, upon this occasion, told a lie; but there is no reason for such a supposition, though possibly they might conceal some part of the truth, which is not unlawful, but highly commendable, when it is to preserve the innocent; for many of the Hebrew women might be such as are here described, though not every one of them. The answer of the midwives therefore is so far from being a sneaking lie to save their lives, that it is a bold confession of their faith and piety, to the hazard of them, namely, that they saw so plain an evidence of the wonderful hand of God, in that extraordinary vigour in the travail of the women, that do what Pharaoh would, they durst not, would not, strive against it, because they would 'not strive against God.'—Lightfoot's Sermon on 2 Sam. xix. 29.

^e The 'making the midwives houses,' is, by most interpreters, ascribed to God, and the thing is supposed to have been done in a metaphorical sense, that is, God gave them a numerous offspring or family, and a very lasting succession or posterity. For there are five things, say they, which go to complete the greatness or eminence of a family, as such; its largeness, its wealth, its honours, its power, and its duration. And therefore, since the midwives hazarded their own lives to save those of the Hebrew children, and to preserve the Israelites a numerous progeny and posterity, the God of Israel, in return, not only made their own lives long and prosperous, but gave them very numerous families, and an enduring posterity, in whom they might be said to live after death, even from generation to generation. But all this is a very forced construction, and what the original words will by no means bear. We should therefore rather think, these houses were built, not for the midwives but for the Israelites, and that it was not God, but Pharaoh, who built them. The case seems to be this:—Pharaoh had charged the midwives to kill the male children that were born of the Hebrew women; the midwives feared God, and omitted to do what the king had commanded them, pretending in excuse for their omission, that the Hebrew women were generally delivered before they could get to them. Pharaoh hereupon resolving to prevent their increase, gave charge to his people to have all the male children of the Hebrews thrown into the river; but his command could not be strictly executed, whilst the Israelites lived up and down the fields in tents, which was their ancient and customary way of living; for they would shift here and there, and lodge the women in childbed out of the way, to save their children. Pharaoh therefore built them houses, and obliged them to a more settled habitation, that the people whom he had set over them might know where to find every family, and to take an account of all the children that should be born. So that this was a very cunning contrivance of Pharaoh, in order to have his charge more strictly and effectually executed than it could otherwise have been done; and was a particular too remarkable not to be inserted in Moses' account of this affair. The only seeming difficulty is, to reconcile the words in the text to what has been here advanced; but this will be none at all, if the words be rightly translated, and the verses rightly distinguished in this manner:—Exod. i. 20. 'And God dwelt with the midwives, and the people multiplied, and waxed very mighty, and this happened' (or was so, or came to pass,) 'because the midwives feared God.' Ver. 21, 22. 'And Pharaoh built them' (that is, the Israelites,) 'houses, and charged all his people, saying, Every son that is born, ye shall cast into the river, and every daughter ye shall save alive.'—Shuckford's Connection, vol. 2. b. 7.

house of Levi, had married a woman named ^a Jochebed, of the same tribe, and by her had a daughter, whose name was Miriam, and four years after that, a son whom they called Aaron; and in the time of this cruel persecution, his wife was again delivered of a fine lovely boy, whom she was very desirous to preserve. For three months therefore she ^b kept him concealed; but fearing at length a discovery, she resolved to commit him to the providence of God: and accordingly having made a little basket or boat of rushes, she plastered it within and without with bitumen or pitch, to make it keep out the water. Into this she put the poor infant; and leaving it among the flags, by the bank of the river, she placed his sister at a proper distance to observe the event.

As Providence ordered it, Pharaoh's daughter attended with her maids of honour, in a short time after, came to the river to bathe herself; and spying the basket at some distance, she ordered one of the company to go and fetch it out; which when she had uncovered, the surprising beauty of the infant, weeping and making its little moan, so moved her heart with compassion, that she immediately declared her intention to have it brought up, notwithstanding she perceived it was certainly one of those children whom her father, in his edict, had ordered to be drowned.

By this time Miriam, the child's sister, had conveyed herself into the company; and ^c hearing the princess

^a Jochebed was not only of the same tribe, but own aunt likewise to Amram. For the Septuagint, Vulgate, and, after them, many learned expositors, both papists and protestants, have thought that she was no more than his uncle Kohath's daughter, and consequently his cousin-german, because the marriage of an aunt was afterwards forbidden in the Levitical law; yet the plain matter of fact is repugnant to all this. In Exod. vi. 18. it is said expressly, that Kohath, the father of Amram, was the son of Levi. In Num. xxxvi. 59, it is said, that Jochebed was Levi's daughter, and born in Egypt; and here again, in Exod. vi. 20, it is said, that Amram 'took him Jochebed, his father's sister, to wife; and therefore, without subverting the natural sense of these texts, we cannot but conclude, that the nephew married his aunt. For the prohibitions made upon the degrees of consanguinity, do not flow from the law of nature, but only oblige by virtue of the command of God; and therefore, before the command took place, relations of a nearer affinity were allowed to be joined together. Nor can the supposed difference of their age be any argument to the contrary, since Levi might have her when he was an hundred years old, and she, consequently, be very little, if any at all, older than her nephew.—Saurin's Dissertation, 43.

^b Josephus tells us this story:—That Amram finding his wife with child, and being solicitous about the king's edict, prayed earnestly to God to put an end to that dreadful persecution; and that God appeared to him, and told him, that he would in due time free his people from it; and that the son who shortly would be born unto him, should prove the happy instrument of their glorious deliverance, and eternize his own name thereby:—That this made him conceal him as long as he could; but fearing a discovery, he resolved to trust him to the care of providence, arguing in this manner,—That if the child could be concealed, as it was very difficult to do it, and hazardous to attempt it, they must be in danger every moment; but as to the power and veracity of God, he did not doubt of it, but was assured, that whatever he had promised he would certainly make good; and with this trust and persuasion, he was resolved to expose him.—Jewish Antiquities, b. 2. c. 9.

^c The princess is called by Josephus Thermuthis; by Artapanus, as he is cited by Eusebius, (Præp. b. 9 c. 4.) Mereis; and in the Alexandrian Chronicle, Myrrina. But Josephus adds farther, that Thermuthis having sent for several wet nurses, one inquire for a nurse, offered her service to go and fetch one out of the neighbourhood; which when she was ordered to do, she hastened to her mother, who came with all speed, and took the child from the princess, who promised to see her well paid for her care in nursing it.

When the child was of an age fit to be weaned, his mother carried him to court, to show him to the princess; who ^d soon grew so fond of him, that she adopted him for her own, and in remembrance of his being taken out of the river, gave him the ^e Egyptian name of Moses. But his father and mother, ^f who brought him up in his

after another, the child turned its head scornfully from their breasts, and would not suck; whereupon Miriam told the princess, that if the nurse and child were of different nations, her milk would never agree with it, but that if an Hebrew woman was fetched, he would probably take the breast from her; and that, upon this, she was bid to go for one, and immediately brought her own and the child's mother, whom he fell a sucking very greedily, to the admiration of all the by-standers.—B. 2. c. 9.

^d And well might the princess be fond of the child, who, according to Josephus, had charms enough to engage any one's affections. "For, as he grew up, he showed a pregnancy of understanding much above those of his years, and did every thing with such a grace, as gave the world to understand what they might in time expect from him. After three years of age, he was such a miracle of a child for beauty and comeliness of stature, that people would stop and stand gazing on him with delight and admiration wherever they saw him, and his carriage and behaviour was so very obliging, that he won upon the most morose and unsocial sort of men. Thermuthis herself," continues our author, "being as much delighted as any, wanting issue of her own, and having resolved to adopt him for her son, brought him one day to her father, and in merriment told him, that she came to present him with a successor, in case he wanted one. The king received him with an affectionate tenderness, and to gratify his daughter, took off his crown and placed it upon the child's head; but so far was he from being pleased with it, that he threw it upon the ground, and trampled upon it with his feet. This action was looked upon as an ill omen to the king and his government, insomuch that the scribe we mentioned before, being then in the company, cried out to have the child killed: 'For this is the child,' says he to the king, 'which I foretold your majesty would be the destruction of Egypt, and he hath now confirmed the prophecy, by the affront he hath put upon your government, in treading the crown under his feet. In short this is he by whose death alone you may promise yourself to be secure. For take him but out of the way, the Hebrews shall have nothing more to hope for, and the Egyptians nothing more to fear.' This speech gave some uneasiness to Thermuthis; and therefore she immediately took the child away, without any opposition from the king, whose heart God had disposed not to take any notice of what the scribe had said."—B. 2. ibid.

^e Both Philo, Josephus, and Clemens Alexandrinus, will have the word Moses to be derived from the Egyptian mo, which, according to them, signifies water, and ises or yises, which means preserved, as much as to say, saved from the waters, or preserved from drowning. It is very likely indeed that the princess should give the child a name from no other language than her own; but then it is to be considered, that the Hebrew word moshah, from whence the name naturally flows, and to which the princess herself owns she alludes, might have the same signification in her tongue as it has in the Hebrew, where it always signifies a drawing out of the water, (2 Sam. xxii. 17; Ps. xviii. 16; and Isa. xliii. 2.) It cannot be doubted but that Moses had another name given him by his own parents at the time of his circumcision; but what that name was, we have no certainty, nor can we tell from what authority it is that Clemens informs us that it was Joachim.—Patrick's Commentary.

^f Besides the education which his own parents gave him, Philo acquaints us, that from his Egyptian masters, he was taught arithmetic, geometry, physic, music, and hieroglyphics, otherwise called enigmatical philosophy; that from the Chaldeans he learned astronomy; from the Assyrians their character or manner of writing; and from the Grecians all their liberal arts and sciences. But that was not a time for the Egyptians, who excelled the rest infancy, had taken care to instruct him in such things as related to the religion and history of his ancestors; and therefore when he arrived to maturity, he left the court, and coming to live among his brethren, was himself an eye-witness at what a merciless rate the Egyptian task-masters treated them.

This raised his resentment and indignation to such a degree, that seeing one day an Egyptian abuse a Hebrew in a very gross manner, he stepped in to his assistance, and perceiving nobody near, slew the Egyptian, and buried his body in the sand.

The next day, as he walked out again, he found two Hebrews in contest with one another; whereupon he admonished them to consider that they were brethren, and would have decided the quarrel between them: but he who was the aggressor, rejected his arbitration with contempt, and upbraided him with the murder of the Egyptian the day before. This gave Moses some uneasy apprehensions, that as the thing was now blown, it might not be long before it reached Pharaoh's ear, and endanger his life; so that he thought it the ^a best way to leave

Egypt, and to secure himself by flying into the country of Midian beyond the Red Sea.

In the plains of Midian, there is a well, common to all the natives of the place: here it was that Moses had stopped to refresh himself, when seven of the daughters of Jethro, ^b the chief man of the country, came to draw water for their flocks; but when they had filled their troughs, a parcel of rude shepherds, being minded to serve their own turn first, seized on their water, and frightened the damsels away; which Moses perceiving went to their assistance, and forcing the shepherds to retire, drew the young virgins more water, and gave it to their flocks.

Hereupon taking their leaves, they made haste home; and while their father was wondering at their speedy return, they informed him how civil a certain stranger had been, both in watering their flocks, and protecting them from the insults of the rusties; which made Jethro send and invite him to his house, and treat him in a manner suitable to the civility he had shown to his daughters; insomuch that Moses, after he had tarried there some time, was so pleased with his courteous reception, that he expressed a willingness to take up his abode with him, ^c and become his shepherd. This proof the world in all sorts of learning, to send for masters from Greece, which rather stood in need of Egyptian teachers; for to 'be learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians,' as St Stephen asserts of Moses, (Acts vii. 22.) was to have the best and most liberal education that the whole world could at that time afford.

^a Josephus, who has given us several particulars of Moses' life, which in modesty perhaps he might not think proper to record of himself, has assigned a farther reason for his leaving Egypt, of which it may not be improper, in this place, to give the reader this short abstract. "When Moses was grown to man's estate, he had an opportunity offered him of showing his courage and conduct. The Ethiopians, who inhabited the upper land on the south side of Egypt, had made many dreadful incursions, plundered and ravaged all the neighbouring parts of the country, beat the Egyptian army in a set battle, and were become so elated with their success, that they began to march towards the capital of Egypt. In this distress, the Egyptians had recourse to the oracle, which answered, that they should make choice of an Hebrew for their general. As none was more promising than Moses, the king desired his daughter to consent that he should go, and head his army; but she, after having first expostulated with her father, how mean a thing it was for the Egyptians to implore the assistance of a man whose death they had been committing, would not agree to it, until she had obtained a solemn promise upon oath, that no practices or attempts should be made upon his life. When Moses, by the princess's persuasion, had at last accepted the commission, he made it his first care to come up with the enemy before they were aware of him; and to this purpose, instead of marching up the Nile as the custom was before, he chose to cross the country, though the passage was very dangerous, by reason of the poisonous flying serpents which infested those parts; but for this he had a new expedient. The bird ibis, though very friendly to every other creature, is a mortal enemy to all serpents; and therefore having got a sufficient number of these, he carried them along with him in cages, and as soon as they came into any dangerous places, he let them loose upon the serpents, and by their means and protection, proceeded without any harm or molestation. He entered the enemy's country, took several of their cities, and obliged them at last to retreat into Saba, the metropolis of Ethiopia. Moses sat down before it; but as it was situate in an island, with strong fortifications about it, in all probability it would have cost him a longer time to carry it, had not Tharbis, the king of Ethiopia's daughter, who had the fortune once to see him from the walls behaving himself with the utmost gallantry, fallen in love with him. Whereupon she sent privately to let him know, that the city should be surrendered to him upon condition that he would marry her immediately after. Moses agreed to the proposal; and having taken possession of the place, and of the princess, returned with his victorious army to Egypt. Here, instead of reaping the fruits of his great achievement, the Egyptians accused him of murder to the king, who having already taken some umbrage at his valour and great reputation, was resolved to rid himself of him; but Moses having some suspicion of it made his escape, and not daring to go by the common roads, for fear of being stopped by the king's guards, was forced to pass through a great desert to reach the land of Midian."

^b The word cohen signifies indifferently either priest or prince; and accordingly, in these early ages, both these offices were frequently united in one and the same person. It seems, however, that Jethro was scarce a prince in that country; for then one would think that the shepherds would not have dared to have been so insolent to his daughters; and yet if he was a priest, it is made a matter of some contest between two famous rabbins, whether he was an idolater, or a worshipper of the true God. Aben Ezra is of opinion, that as he was descended from Midian, the son of Abraham, by Keturah, in all probability he professed the true religion; nor can he suppose that Moses would have married his daughter, had he been bred up in a false one: whereas Moses, it is plain, not only owns his alliance with his family, but, upon his arrival in the camp of Israel, invites him to offer sacrifices to the Lord, (Exod. xviii. 11, 12.) as one who adored the same God with the Israelites. Kimchi, however, on the other hand, affirms, that at first he was an idolatrous priest, but afterwards, when he came to Moses in the wilderness, and was particularly informed of all those great and wonderful things which God had wrought in Egypt for the deliverance of the Hebrews, he became a convert to the worship of the true God; and for this he produces a passage in the same chapter, ver. 11, 'Now I know that the Lord is greater than all gods: for in the thing wherein they dealt proudly he was above them.' But besides this, there is a farther difficulty in relation to this Jethro. In Exod. iii. 1. he is expressly called 'the father-in-law of Moses,' and yet the father of the young women, whom Moses defended at the well, and whereof he certainly married one, is said to be Reuel, (ii. 18.) and not Jethro: either therefore this Reuel must be their grandfather, who, being head of the family, might, in a larger sense, be called father, as we find instances of the like nature in Gen. xxxi. 43; 2 Kings xiv. 14, &c.: or, as others will have it, this Reuel, or Jethro, was one and the same person, under different denominations. Upon supposition, therefore, that he was descended from the family of Cush, it is imagined, that while he continued in Idumæa, his name might be Reuel, but upon his removal into Midian, to avoid the wars and tumults in his own country, he came to be called Jethro, as being the only remainder (for so the word signifies) of the Cushites in that country.—Bibliotheca Biblica, and Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 3. c. 4.

^c It can hardly be supposed, but that a person of Moses' education would, in the space of forty years, which he abode in Midian posal Jethro very readily embraced: and to attach him the more to his interest, gave him his ^a daughter Zipporah in marriage, by whom he had two sons, whereof the elder he named Gershom, which signifies a stranger, alluding to his own condition in that country; and the younger Eliezer, importing, God my help, in grateful acknowledgment of God's having delivered him from the hands of Pharaoh, who sought his life.

While Moses lived in the family of Jethro, the king, who was upon the Egyptian throne when he left the country, died; but his successor, who was no less a tyrant, and oppressor of the Israelites, laid such heavy burdens upon them, as made their lives extremely miserable, till at length their complaints reached heaven; and as the time of their deliverance grew near, God remembering the covenant which he had made with their forefathers, began to look upon them with an eye of pity and compassion.

Moses was to be his instrument in bringing about their deliverance: and therefore, while he was feeding his father-in-law's flock, and as they wandered in their feeding, followed them as far into the desert as ^b Mount find some other employment for himself than keeping sheep; and therefore some have imagined, that in this time he wrote the book of Job, as we mentioned before, to comfort the Israelites, by the example of his admirable patience, under their heavy oppression in Egypt, and the book of Genesis likewise, that they might the better understand what promises had been made to their ancestors, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and that the time for their accomplishment was approaching. Nor can we suppose, but that the several arts and sciences, which he had been taught in his youth, he took care, in this place of happy retirement, to cultivate and improve.—Patrick's Commentary.

^a It may be made a standing observation, that divine authors do not relate all the passages of a story, as other authors delight to do, but such only as are most material. We may therefore suppose, that a great many things intervened between Moses' entrance into Jethro's family, and his marriage to his daughter; especially considering that his children were so young at the time of his return into Egypt. The observation of Philo, however, is not altogether to be neglected, namely, "That men of a great genius quickly show themselves, and are not made known by length of time;" and therefore he thinks, "That Jethro, being first struck with admiration of his goodly aspect, and then of his wise discourse, immediately gave him the most beautiful of all his daughters to be his wife, not staying to inquire of any body who he was, because his own most excellent qualities sufficiently recommended him to his affection."—De Vita Mosi, b. 1.
